The court reversed the board by 6 to 2 on the general laws clause but split 4 to 4 on the foreman's provisions, leaving in effect the lower court decision that the strike for this clause was illegal.

Minimum Wage Bill Passed by Senate

Administration Wins In Test with Coalition

ments which, he said, would "weaken or dilute" the Administration-backed measure introduced by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.).

In telegrams to the leaders of both parties and to members of the Senate Labor Committee which had reported the bill, Meany said the McNamara bill represented the "irreducible minimum in wage and coverage extensions long overdue."

The Senate action set the stage for a showdown with the House, which in March rejected an Administration-backed compromise and substituted a watered-down measure providing a $1.15 minimum for presently covered employes and extension of coverage to only 1.3 million new workers, with a $1 wage floor and no ceiling on hours.

Bill Goes to Conference

As the sharply differing Senate and House versions headed toward a joint conference committee, it was uncertain what form the final bill would take.

The situation was strongly reminiscent of that which prevailed in the post-convention session of the 86th Congress, when the Senate and House passed minimum wage bills substantially the same as the ones they approved this year. In 1960, efforts at a compromise collapsed when members of the conservative Republican - southern Democratic coalition—then in a dominant position among the House conferees—refused to recede from the narrow House measure.

The crucial Senate vote on coverage came on an amendment introduced by Sen. A. S. Mike Monroney (D-Okla.) which would have exempted from coverage retail enterprises which do not have units in at least two states. On the vote, 13 Republicans teamed up with 43 Democrats to oppose the amendment, while 19 Republicans and 20 Democrats supported the attempt to curtail coverage.

The Senate earlier defeated, by a 63-34 vote, a substitute offered by Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.). Dirksen originally moved to give presently covered workers $1.15, and to give 1.2 million newly covered workers $1.05. Before the vote, he accepted an amendment by Sen. Thruston B. Morton (R-Ky.) which would have given presently covered workers $1.25.

After the Dirksen defeat, the Senate in rapid-fire order rejected three other efforts to weaken the measure. It turned down, 63 to 34, a proposal by Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.) to knock out all new coverage; defeated 61 to 35 a plan by Sen. Spessard L. Holland (D-Fla.) to eliminate all retail establishments; and rejected, 58-38, a proposal by Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.) to allow the Secretary of Labor to suspend a minimum wage increase for a particular industry on a showing that it would cause unemployment or an increase in the cost of living.

As passed by the Senate, the measure would:

- Raise the minimum from its present level of $1 to $1.15 four months after enactment, and to $1.25 two years after that.
- Give newly covered workers $1 minimum the first year, $1.05 the second, $1.15 the third and $1.25 the fourth.
- Put no ceiling on hours for newly covered workers the first year. In the second year, overtime would be payable after 44 hours, with the ceiling dropping to 42 hours the third year and 40 hours thereafter.
- Extend wage-hour coverage to 2.4 million retail and service workers, 140,000 laundry workers, 30,000 telephone operators and 1 million employes of construction firms.
- Provide minimum wage protection, but not overtime coverage, to 110,000 employes of local transit companies, 100,000 seamen and 33,000 seafood processing workers.
- Set up a new test for coverage under which employes of retail establishments would be brought under the act if the firms do at least $1 million worth of business a year and purchase at least $250,000 worth of goods in interstate commerce. In chain operations, individual stores making less than $250,000 in gross sales would be exempt.
- Retain specific existing exemptions from coverage for hotels, motels, restaurants, lunch counters, caterers, hospitals, nursing homes, movies, amusement or recreational establishments operating on a seasonal basis, and gas stations doing less than $250,000 gross business.

measure, under which federal grants would be made available to the states for use, at their option, for either classroom construction, teachers' salaries, or both.

- Another House Education subcommittee gave approval to the Administration's $2.4 billion college aid bill calling for a five-year program of federally financed but state-administered college scholarships.

The bill provides a first-year authorization of $26.25 million. It also provides a long-term, low-interest loan program for constructing college classrooms, laboratories and libraries.

- The Senate formula for financing the Kennedy Administrations' $394 million depressed areas bill prevailed in House-Senate conference, setting the stage for another House showdown between liberal and conservative forces.

The Senate-passed bill called for long-range financing, while the House bill had favored annual congressional review of loans and grants. The House conferees receded only after reportedly receiving word from the President that he favored long-term financial commitments.

- The House Agriculture Committee rebuffed the Kennedy Administration and voted 27 to 3 to continue without change for two more years government recruitment of Mexicans to work on U.S. farms. The Administration and the AFL-CIO had called for a major overhaul of the Mexican contract labor program.
- A Senate Banking subcommittee wound up hearings on the Administration's $3.2 billion housing and urban redevelopment measure, and Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.), subcommittee chairman and sponsor of the bill, forecast floor action by early May.

The AFL-CIO is on record as endorsing the measure as "a forward-looking approach," but has urged considerable broadening of many of its provisions.

The federation urged that the Federal National Mortgage Association be authorized to purchase $3 billion worth of mortgages, instead of the $750 million asked by the Administration; that the number of additional low-income housing units to be built be increased from the proposed 100,000 to 400,000; and that $6.25 billion be authorized for urban renewal over a 10-year period, instead of the $2.5 billion spread over four years which the Administration asked.

- The Senate Finance Committee gave its approval to an Administration proposal, already passed by the House, which would temporarily broaden the aid-to-dependent-children program so that help could be extended to the families of jobless workers.

The social security measure sailed through the House following defeat of the GOP substitute introduced by Rep. John W. Byrnes (R-Wis.). The substitute would have raised the minimum to $40 and extended basic pensions to all persons over 72 not presently covered, but would not have raised widow's benefits or permitted early retirement. Voting

The House-passed measure, according to the Ways & Means Committee, would pump an added $780 million into the economy during its first year of operations.

An estimated 2.2 million retirees would share $170 million under the increase in the minimum benefit; 560,000 men would receive $440 million under the earlier retirement; liberalization of work requirements in order to be eligible for benefits would add 160,000 persons to the rolls for a total of $65 million in benefits; and the increase in widows' benefits would mean $105 million for 1.5 million beneficiaries.

To finance the added benefits, the bill would raise the contribution rate by one-eighth of 1 percent each for employers and employes, beginning in 1962. At present employers and employes are each taxed 3 percent on the first $4,800 in earnings.

PRES. KENNEDY, who has long gone bareheaded even in harsh weather, is now beginning to like wearing a hat, Alex Rose, president of the Hatters, reported following this White House chat with the President. Rose said that Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, however, "still needs a little education" along the hat line.

Mitchell Wins GOP Fight in New Jersey

Former Sec. of Labor James P. Mitchell has won the Republican nomination for governor of New Jersey in a three-way fight reflecting a national dispute within the GOP over policies and personalities. Major figures of the Eisenhower Administration, including the former President himself, backed Mitchell in the race.

Mitchell's Democratic opponent in the election will be Richard J. Hughes, a former Superior Court judge, who had the support of retiring Gov. Robert S. Meyner.

Hughes, who had sought elective office only once before, captured the Democratic nomination against token opposition. His total on the basis of unofficial returns with one-fourth of the vote still missing tallied 190,000, and observers noted that in final results his vote might exceed Mitchell's.

Mitchell won the Republican nomination with a minority of the votes cast in the GOP primary but scored a clear plurality over his principal opponent, State Sen. Walter H. Jones, who was backed by most of the Republican county organizations.

The unofficial but nearly complete totals showed 197,000 for Mitchell, 158,000 for Jones, and 95,000 for Wayne Dupont, Jr., a third starter.

The Mitchell victory projected New Jersey's Republican Sen. Clifford P. Case, a liberal spokesman for the GOP, as a power in state Republican affairs.

Case backed Mitchell in the primary against the traditional GOP

county organizations. He charged that the party leaders, many of whom had opposed his own renomination for the Senate in 1960, had led the Republicans to repeated defeats in the state in the past eight years.

Norrell's Widow Wins His Seat in Congress

Monticello, Ark. — Voters in Arkansas' 6th Congressional District have elected Mrs. Catherine Norrell (D) to Congress to fill the vacancy caused by the recent death of her husband, Rep. W. F. Norrell.

Mrs. Norrell easily defeated four other candidates for the post which her late husband had held for 22 years.

AFL-CIO to Broadcast Labor News Conference

"Labor News Conference," a new public affairs program produced by the AFL-CIO, will begin Sunday, Apr. 30, on the Mutual Broadcasting System, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler has announced. The program will originate over the MBS network at 4:35 p.m. each Sunday, Eastern Daylight Time.

Two labor reporters representing leading metropolitan newspapers and the wire services will question AFL-CIO officials on the most recent newsworthy developments in the trade union and related fields during the preceding week. The guest and reporters will vary weekly.

300 Cities Now Listed On 6% Roll

Long-term joblessness continued to plague the nation in April as the number of communities with "substantial unemployment" rose to unprecedented levels, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has disclosed.

Goldberg reported that the number of small labor markets with critical joblessness increased by 15 between March and April to a record-setting 199, while the number of major industrial centers with heavy unemployment remained unchanged at March's all-time peak of 101.

In the face of some signs of business recovery, Goldberg declared, the figures underscore the fact that the economy "is still not out of the woods," and that "the hard-core unemployment problem is serious."

'Gratified' at GOP Study

The Secretary said in the light of this continuing problem he was "quite gratified" that the Joint Republican Leadership had ordered an expert study of the impact of automation and technological change on structural unemployment. The GOP action, he said, is a "welcome indication of national acceptance of the problem we face."

The April survey of the labor supply in major and smaller market areas by the Labor Dept's Bureau of Employment Security marked the first time that the summary was made public on a monthly basis. Previously the listings were on a bimonthly basis.

The new high of 199 smaller areas with "substantial unemployment"—which the BES describes as a jobless rate above 6 percent that is expected to persist for several months—topped the previous record of 195 set in September 1958.

The 15 newly added smaller labor surplus areas are: Danbury, Conn., Willimantic, Conn., Cedartown-Rockmart, Ga., Tocca, Ga., Danville, Ill., Kankakee, Ill., Kokomo, Ind., Alexandria, La., Newton, N. J., Forest City-Rutherfordton, N. C., Marion, O., Klamath Falls, Ore., Centralia, Wash., Oskosh, Ind., and West Bend, Ind.

Two of the smaller areas—Cedartown-Rockmart, Ga., and Centralia, Wash.—were also designated as areas with a "persistent labor surplus," entitling them to priority on government contract. This brought the total of small markets in this classification to 90. Twenty major areas also carry this designation.

Although there were no changes in the overall total of major markets with substantial joblessness, the BES figures showed that the job situation deteriorated in three major areas—Saginaw, Mich., Toledo,

Meany Discounts 'Cheery' Forecasts

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has discounted the expected "cheery predictions that the economic weather will improve as rapidly as the temperature climbs."

Warning that there will be no automatic "thaw," Meany said "that only thoughtful legislation promptly enacted can get the job [of solving the unemployment problem] started. The Congress is not going to act," he cautioned, "unless it feels a sense of urgency. An aroused citizenry, demanding action from its representatives, is the answer for America today."

In a signed editorial in the May edition of The American Federationist, official monthly publication of the AFL-CIO, Meany said that official reports reflecting more people working and fewer people idle "just because the weather has improved," will tempt some to "think the worst is over."

But the labor movement "must be more realistic," he said.

He warned that continued mass unemployment is a "practical, immediate and universal problem."

"There are no islands of security for the favorite few nor economic bomb shelters for anyone," Meany wrote. "We are in this together, and together we must grope our way toward a real and lasting solution."

The text of Meany's editorial follows:

"With the arrival of spring, we can expect to read cheery predictions that the economic weather will improve as rapidly as the temper-

Pricing Plot Held Known To GE Brass

By David L. Perlman

Three former General Electric Co. officials have told the Kefauver Senate Anti-Trust subcommittee that GE's top management knew of and approved the price-fixing and bid-rigging conspiracy among 29 leading electrical equipment manufacturers.

Linked to the conspiracy in public testimony were:

- GE Board Chairman Ralph E. Cordiner, who termed the accusation "an outrage."
- Robert Paxton, who retired recently from his $200,000-a-year post as president of General Electric.
- Arthur F. Vinson, a key GE vice president, who was subpenaed to appear before the subcommittee after refusing to testify voluntarily and who swore he knew nothing of any price-rigging.

Vinson was one of 46 individ-

Hits Lobby Charge of 'Socialism'

The American Medical Association has been bluntly accused by Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.) of "misrepresentations, distortions and outright lies" for claiming that legislation to finance health care for the aged through social security constitutes "socialized medicine."

In a major speech on the Senate floor, Anderson turned a withering fire of criticism on the AMA's "propaganda campaign" against the bill. The medical association's charges of "socialized medicine" were contained in one of a series of advertisements currently appearing in 30 major metropolitan newspapers across the country.

The New Mexico Democrat is co-sponsor, with Rep. Cecil R. King (D-Calif.), of legislation backed by the Kennedy Administration and the AFL-CIO which would place the financing of insurance to cover some hospital, nursing home and in-home care for the elderly under the existing social security structure.

The AMA's assault on the bill, and its characterization of it as "socialism," is "consistent" with its long history of opposition to similar social legislation, Anderson declared.

He accused the medical lobby of having opposed the original social security bill, extension of benefits to the permanently and totally disabled, and the use of federal funds to support state agencies working to reduce the maternal death rate.

Hits 'Socialism' Tag

Anderson was particularly critical of the AMA charge that the bill "adds up to nothing more than socialized medicine—controlled by a bureau of the federal government." He also condemned this statement in the AMA ad:

"When the federal government enters the privacy of the examination room—controlling both the standards of practice and the choice of practitioner—the cost includes loss of freedom. Your doctor's freedom to treat you in an individual way. Your freedom to choose your own doctor. When the physician is socialized, his patient is socialized as well."

The senator stressed the fact that it is "plainly stated" in the Ander-

UNEMPLOYED WORKERS endorsed an action program to "Get America Back to Work" at this Detroit rally, first of a series, which was sponored by the Wayne County AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers. The picture shows Pres. Al Barbour of the county central body at the microphone.

Jobless Rally Asks Congress For 'Back-to-Work' Legislation

Detroit—More than 7,500 jobless workers at a labor-sponsored rally here have urged Congress to take speedy action on a "Get America Back to Work" program.

In a resolution, a cross-section of Detroit's 210,000 unemployed urged a series of measures including a moratorium on debts, mortgages, and installment payments for the period that workers are jobless through no fault of their own, and "stand-by" authority for the President to suspend income withholding tax payments temporarily.

Speakers Listed

The meeting, first in a series, was sponsored by the Wayne County AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers and heard talks by UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Michigan Gov. John B. Swainson, Detroit Mayor Louis C. Miriani, and Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.).

Pointing out that 25 percent of the nation's production capacity is idle and 5.5 million workers were totally unemployed in March, the meeting called on Congress to "support Pres. Kennedy's program" and to implement the Employment Act of 1946 by taking these steps, among others:

- Apply federal standards to all state unemployment laws so that workers in each state will get similar treatment.
- Enact a wage law giving at least $1.25 an hour to the 7 million working Americans now being paid 40 cents to $1 an hour.
- Add a health care program to the Social Security structure, and raise the level of Social Security benefits for all covered groups.

Other measures called for in the resolution include an area redevelopment program providing special help for unemployed workers in depressed areas; a speedup in placing government contracts in labor surplus areas; reduction of FHA interest rates to 4.5 percent or less; and a gradual cut in working hours without loss of take-home pay.

The Fair Labor Standards Act should, the resolution concluded, provide for periodic review of the workweek so that workers may, through shorter hours enjoy "an increasing measure of creative and purposeful leisure" instead of "suffering the wasteful idleness of unemployment."

Reuther said the UAW will fight for job security at the bargaining table and on Capitol Hill. The union, he said, in its coming negotiations with the auto industry, will seek an annual wage for blue collar workers, reduction of working hours with no cut in pay, and improved pension and supplemental unemployment benefits. He stressed the need, in addition, for federal aid in helping jobless workers.

Live Music Scant, Union Opposes TV Renewal

The Musicians Union has asked the Federal Communications Commission to deny license renewal to a New Orleans television station which it said "has wholly failed to fulfill its commitments" to use live music on its programs.

Musicians Pres. Herman Kenin said the union petition opposing renewal of the license of Station WWL-TV "marks the first step in an all-out effort to close the shocking gap between promise and performance" by TV stations.

The union, which actively supported the station's original license application over two competitors, said both it and the FCC had been "completely taken in" by promises which weren't kept.

The television station is owned and operated by Loyola University, which cited extensive use of local, live music on its radio station WWL in support of its application for a television license.

In the petition opposing license renewal, the Musicians declared: "It is fair to conclude from the history of Loyola's application that it received its highly valuable and profitable right to operate a television station in one of the nation's major market areas because of its emphatic and persuasive promises of development and use of local live talent and especially live music.

"It is equally fair, then, to judge Loyola's right to a renewal of its license on the basis of how it has kept its programming promises."

The AFM petition asserted that WWL-TV which had estimated in its original application that 24 percent of its programs would be live, actually has used less than 12 percent live programs since it went on the air in September 1957.

The union said the station "never employed a staff orchestra, combo unit or string group." Its staff organist was released in early 1957.

In asking for a full-scale hearing, the Musicians said 1960 amendments to the Communications Act were intended to spur the FCC into taking "a more positive role in the establishment and enforcement of programming standards which will encourage greater use of local live talent and local live programming."

GOP Pushes Anti-Labor Bill In Michigan

Lansing, Mich.—Michigan Republicans have transformed an anti-strikebreaker bill into an anti-picketing bill and have moved through one house of the legislature a measure ostensibly raising unemployment benefits that takes away from workers more than it gives.

A bill barring the importation of professional strikebreakers from outside the state was amended by Senate Republicans to limit picketing in any labor dispute to persons who are members of the local union on strike. Under this provision, small locals could not call for support on members of the same union in other locals in the same city.

The amended bill, disowned by most of its original supporters, passed the Senate with 16 Republicans and two Democrats supporting it and nine Democrats and two Republicans opposed.

The jobless benefits bill, which passed the GOP-controlled House on a party-line 56-52 vote, raises jobless benefits an average of $1.40 a week.

An amendment, however, in effect repealed a State Supreme Court decision holding that workers who are laid off because of a strike at a company plant in another state are entitled to collect unemployment benefits.

The bill also cancels a $162 million deficit balance owed by a number of Michigan companies to the unemployment compensation fund. The companies were faced with liability for higher tax rates to wipe out the deficit.

A labor-backed proposal to raise maximum jobless benefits to two-thirds of the state's average weekly wage was defeated 59 to 44 when it was offered as an amendment. Also defeated was a GOP-opposed proposal to add public members to the Michigan Employment Security Advisory Council, now divided equally between labor and management members.

Take-Home Inches Up:

Living Costs Stick At All-Time Record

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's cost of living remained unchanged at its "all-time high" between February and March, the government has reported.

The Consumer Price Index stood at 127.5 "as lower average prices for commodities offset higher service rates," the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics said. This means the market basket which cost $10 in the 1947-49 base period now costs $12.75.

The spendable earnings and buying power of factory workers "edged up slightly" over the month, according to an accompanying report.

An increase in working time caused the pickup in spendable earnings or "take-home" pay. The average rose about 65 cents over the month to $80.89 per week for a production worker with three dependents and to $73.34 for a worker without dependents, the report said.

"At the same time, consumer prices remained unchanged so that the increase in spendable earnings was fully reflected in higher buying power, up by 0.8 percent over the month," the report added.

Compared to a year ago, the cost of living was up 1.4 percent; spendable earnings were at about the same level as a 3-cent hike in hourly earnings offset a 36-minute cut in the workweek; buying power was reduced by about 1.5 percent, however, because of the increased prices.

No Escalator Raises

The earnings of about 150,000 workers, including those in major aircraft and missile companies, are tied to the March index under union contracts. There was no monthly or quarterly adjustment, however, since the March CPI, at 127.5, was unchanged from both February and last December.

BLS Deputy Commissioner Robert J. Myers told reporters the escalator cost-of-living adjustment clause now covers some 2.5 to 3 million workers under major contracts.

The escalator protection once covered about 4.5 million workers and applied to about 4 million in early 1959. It was dropped in 1960 under railroad and electrical equipment industry contracts and coverage has decreased with falling steel employment, he observed.

Myers said that even though the March CPI was "still at an all-time high," the fact it remained unchanged instead of showing the usual slight increase between February and March should provide "a little satisfaction."

The expectation, he said, was for continued price stability—the 127.5 for March compares to the 127.3 of last October—and "possibly a decline" for April.

He noted that a steady increase in the cost of services exerts an upward pressure on price movements.

"All services" account for 36.3 percent of the market basket, compared to a weighting of 28.5 percent for food, 22.2 percent for other soft goods and 13 percent for durable commodities.

Compared to a 1947-49 base of 100, while "all items" were at 127.5 in March, "all services" reached 152.2 in continuing a strong upward trend of the past five years. Myers pointed out there was less chance to increase productivity in the service industries in the face of rising costs.

'Do Not Patronize' Ban To Be Fought in Court

Sacramento, Calif. — Two broadcast industry unions have announced they will appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, if necessary, a lower court order restraining the unions and their members from giving publicity to "do not patronize" lists of advertisers on struck Station KXTV here.

The unions charge the injunction denies the right of free speech and goes beyond the "secondary boycott" provisions of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The unions are the Broadcast Employes & Technicians, which had held bargaining rights at the station since 1955, and the Television & Radio Artists, certified in 1956. Members struck last Sept. 26 after the station had been sold to a company headed by John Hay ("Jock") Whitney, former U.S. Ambassador to Great Britain and the new management repudiated an oral agreement on a new contract and demanded several backward steps, according to the unions.

When the unions went to central labor bodies and labor meetings with "do not patronize" appeals, management charged them with an illegal secondary boycott of the station's advertisers. The National Labor Relations Board obtained a temporary injunction in federal district court.

The court order enjoins the unions, their members and other labor organizations from "threatening, coercing or restraining" five named advertisers, or "any sponsor advertising over Station KXTV, or other person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce," by doing any of these things:

"Publishing, circulating or distributing leaflets, handbills, unfair lists, 'do not patronize' lists, or by other consumer appeals, direct or indirect, written or oral, . . . appealing to consumers or the public . . . not to patronize or purchase the products" listed or "any sponsor or person advertising or about to advertise over Station KXTV during the strike" or by "permitting any such unfair lists or 'do not patronize' lists to be maintained in existence."

Gary Ellingsworth of AFTRA and Robert A. Lenihan of NABET in a press conference in Washington, D. C. announced the decision of the two unions to fight the injunction in the higher courts. They said:

"It isn't the fate of this small group that's most important, but the implications for everyone in the broadcast and communications industries. If this order is upheld, it will make consumer boycott campaigns exceedingly difficult, if not impossible."

Since the court order, management has filed a suit against the two unions in Sacramento asking $105,000 in damages.

New York Area Contract:

45,000 in ILGWU Win 14-Cent Hike

New York—The Ladies' Garment Workers and four employer groups have agreed to a two-year extension of a contract covering 45,000 coat and suitmakers in the New York area, with wage rises averaging 14 cents an hour and increased employer payments into the union-industry retirement, health and welfare funds.

The negotiations, originally confined to wages under a reopener clause, were broadened at the union's request to include a proposal for higher retirement fund contributions.

The agreement concluded less than two months of intensive negotiations. ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky called it a "token of the maturity in labor-management relations" achieved by the union and management associations.

First Extension in History

The contract extension — from the former expiration date of May 31, 1962, to the new date of May 31, 1964—was the first such extension in ILGWU history here and, Dubinsky said, "marks the confidence of both sides in the continuation of amicable relations."

J. Louis Dubow, an industry spokesman, agreed the new pact is "another example of the enlightened labor-management relations that have characterized the coat and suit industry for many years."

The settlement, announced by Gen. Manager Henoch Mendelsund of the ILGWU Cloak Joint Board, contains these improvements:

- Pay boosts effective June 12.
- An increase from 5.5 to 6 percent in employer contributions to the retirement fund, effective June 5.
- An increase from 4 to 4.5 percent in employer payments into the health and welfare fund and the supplementary unemployment-severance benefits fund.

The new contract also calls for additional wage reopenings at stated periods.

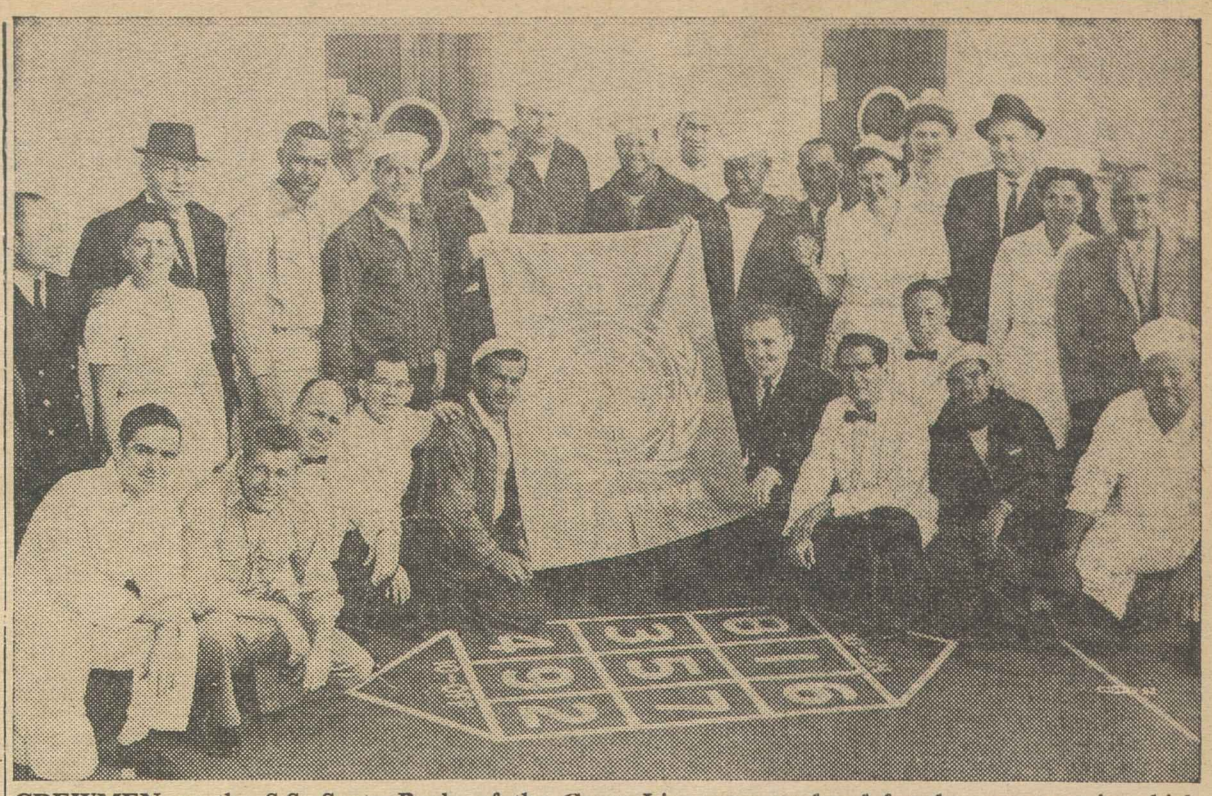
More To Retire

Mendelsund headed the union negotiating committee, which was joined in the final days by Dubinsky. Mendelsund said industry's additional retirement fund contribution will make it possible to retire all eligible applicants who want to retire during 1962.

"The new contribution rate will further strengthen our retirement fund—the first such industrywide fund in the United States—and will enable the fund to carry out its obligations to the workers in full," he said.

Established in 1943, the fund has financed the retirement of some 12,500 workers since 1946. Because it has operated on the principle that pension benefits shall not exceed the yearly income of the fund, an increase in employer payments will enable fund trustees to approve more retirement applications.

The industry's 550 jobbers and 625 contractors do an annual wholesale volume of business approximating $600 million a year. Parties to the new agreement are the Industrial Council of Cloak, Suit & Skirt Manufacturers, the Merchants' Ladies Garment Association, the Infants & Children's Coat Association, and the American Cloak & Suit Manufacturers Association.



CREWMEN on the S.S. Santa Paula of the Grace Line were on hand for the ceremony in which Maritime Union officials presented a flag bearing the United Nations symbol to the crew. Representing NMU at the presentation in New York were Mel Barisic, national union representative; Ed Pogor, port agent; and Harry Baker, union patrolman. The union plans similar ceremonies on 700 deep-sea vessels to make active UN champions of 40,000 union members sailing to foreign ports.

Hillman Foundation Presents Five Awards

New York—The Sidney Hillman Foundation has presented awards of $500 each to five men in the mass communications field for their writings in areas of social problems during 1960.

The 11th annual awards made in the memory of the founder and first president of the Clothing Workers were presented by Jacob S. Potofsky, ACWA president and head of the Hillman Foundation, at a luncheon at the Commodore Hotel.

At the same time, a special award was presented to William L. Shirer, one of the judges in the annual competition over the past 11 years, for his best-selling book, "The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich."

Recipients of the Hillman awards this year were:

Davis McEntire, professor of social welfare at the University of California, for his book, "Residence and Race," which studied minority housing problems.

Sylvan Meyer, editor of the Gainesville, Ga., Daily Times, for editorials and columns on civil rights.

Fred Cook, for his article, "Gambling," Inc., in The Nation magazine.

Walter Peters and Marshall Diskin, producer and director, respectively, of an ABC-TV documentary, "Cast the First Stone," which dealt with discrimination and prejudice.

In presenting the awards, Potofsky said they were based "not so much on technical excellence as on a sense of social responsibility and a willingness to grapple with controversial issues."

The ACWA president outlined other programs of the foundation which, he said, "seeks to perpetuate Hillman's philosophy and his broad-ranging interests and concerns." These programs, he declared, have included the providing of lecturers for colleges and universities, college scholarships, and grants-in-aid for such programs as medical research.

Principal speaker at the award luncheon was Dr. Buell Gallagher, retiring president of City College of New York and one of the judges in the awards competition.

Steel Strike Publicity Hit

Speaking on what he termed "signs of immaturity in industrial relations," Gallagher was critical of what he called "ill-considered" public relations efforts of both management and labor in the record-breaking 116-day steel shutdown in 1959-60.

Gallagher, who served on a special committee set up by the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. to study the steel strike, deplored government intervention in the dispute through the use of a national emergency injunction which forced steel workers back to the mills.

"Collective bargaining," he said, "should be the expected cornerstone of any durable industrial structure, and unless the public health and safety are threatened" there should be no government intervention."

Subsidy Program Urged To Aid Finances of Canadian Rails

Ottawa, Ont.—A Royal Commission on Transportation, making a study of the railroad industry as the outgrowth of a strike threat by the non-operating unions, has recommended a program of subsidies and a gradual ending of public regulation of the carriers in a preliminary report filed with the House of Commons.

Vice Pres. Frank Hall of the Railway Clerks, chairman of the negotiating committee representing the 110,000 non-op employes, said that if the government accepts the subsidy recommendations, the railways no longer will be able to claim inability to pay the wage increases the unions are seeking.

The commission said its proposals are based on bringing about orderly relief from burdens imposed on the rails when they had a virtual monopoly so they may "adjust more effectively to competition from other forms of transport."

Regulation should be retained, it said in the 90-page first volume of a prospective three-volume report, only in areas where competition has not effectively reached the railroads.

Accompanying the proposed loosening of public control was a recommendation that the government give the rails more authority to cut passenger service and to eliminate branch lines.

On subsidies, the report proposed:

- To offset passenger service losses, $62 million the first year, declining to $12.4 million in five years and then ending.
- For the operation of "uneconomic" branch lines, $13 million, leading to their elimination in 15 years.
- To meet the cost of grain shipments, rates for which Parliament set in the Crowes Nest Pass rates law of 1897, a varying subsidy leading off with about $22 million this year. The $22 million was the commission's estimate of a loss the rails set at $70 million a year.

The Royal Commission was set up last December when Prime Minister John Diefenbaker pushed through Parliament legislation banning a non-ops' strike for six months and freezing wages for that period. The enforced truce ends May 15.

Outlawed IWA Coming Back in Newfoundland

St. Johns, Nfld.—The Woodworkers are on the way back in Newfoundland.

The union was driven out of the woods in 1959 after a bitter strike that was smashed by legislation which outlawed it and arbitrarily took away the bargaining rights of two locals.

But the laws enacted at the behest of Premier Joseph Smallwood did not bar a new IWA local from seeking recognition and the right to organize openly.

Now the new local has obtained legal recognition and is signing up loggers, according to H. Landon Ladd, IWA eastern president. The "real test will come when we apply for certification," he said. The probability is that the new local will ask in May for the right to represent 5,000 employes of the Anglo-Newfoundland Development Co.

Ladd said that since the end of the strike, the IWA in the province "although decertified has been active."

The IWA got a big boost a few months ago when the report of a royal commission studying loggers' wages and living conditions in camps of Anglo-Newfoundland and the Bowaters Co. bore out union charges that both were substandard.

It also said that the Newfoundland Brotherhood of Wood Workers, set up by Smallwood to replace the IWA, was not enforcing collective bargaining agreements with the two employers.

Smallwood has vowed to "stop at nothing" to keep the IWA out of the province, but Ladd said the union is "not looking for any fight with Premier Smallwood or anyone else."

"We aren't going in there with a chip on the shoulder," he insisted. "We are strictly in the job of building a union."

Ladd stressed that recognition is not the same as certification. It merely gives the local legal status, and certification as bargaining agent will be necessary before the IWA can legally represent the loggers.

Newfoundland has about 15,000 loggers, many of whom are chronically unemployed or are farmers who work in the woods in the winter.

Cement Union Wins 30 Cents In New Pact

Chicago—The Cement Workers have reached agreement with the Dundee Cement Co. on a new contract with a money package estimated by the union at 30 cents an hour over a two-year period. Sec.-Treas. Toney Gallo said the union will seek the same package from 45 companies with more than 17,000 workers in 137 plants in the United States and Canada.

The Dundee Cement Co., with 100 workers in plants at Dundee, Mich., and Clarkson, Ont., has agreed to these contract changes:

Effective May 1, 1961, a general wage increase of 5 cents an hour and inequity adjustments averaging 3 cents an hour; vacations increased to four weeks after 20 years instead of the present 25; an increase in second shift differentials from 8 to 10 cents an hour, with third shift differentials going up from 12 to 17 cents an hour; life insurance coverage raised from $4,000 to $5,000, with the employer payment rising from 60 percent to 75 percent.

The employer has agreed to help laid-off workers by paying all hospitalization, health and welfare plan costs for the first six months of unemployment, and to improve the supplemental benefit plan.

Effective May 1, 1962, employes will get an additional 8 cents an hour in wages and an increase in maximum sick and accident benefits from $50 a week to $55. The agreement also provides for employer payment of the full cost of the insurance program up to age 65; a wage progression plan for all grades above labor grade; job descriptions, and other benefits.

At Buenos Aires Conference:

Regional ILO OKs Charter of Progress

Buenos Aires — A charter of social and economic progress for the Americas was unanimously adopted by delegates from western hemisphere member states at the seventh regional conference of the Intl. Labor Organization here.

The delegates proclaimed that social and economic policy for all nations should be based on "free democratic government, respect for personal freedom and freedom of association, promotion of a climate favorable to investment, respect for property and the abolition of privilege."

Approval of the declaration represented the first unanimous action by worker, employer and government delegates representing virtually every country in the hemisphere in endorsing a set of economic and social standards.

The statement defined the duties of the three segments of the tripartite organization.

It called on governments to give immediate effect to standards of social legislation adapted to "economic and social realities in harmony with the pertinent ILO conventions and recommendations," and supplementing them with measures needed to eliminate "the obstacles to balanced economic and social development."

Worker Obligations

Workers and their organizations were urged to contribute "maximum effort" to assure "greater economic development and increased production of goods as an essential for the achievement and preservation of their legitimate social objectives."

Employers and their associations were urged to increase the rate of investment, mechanize production, mind the needs of consumers, promote the training of workers at all levels and to "increase the real wages of their workers."

All three groups were urged "to seek together equitable, coordinated and effective solutions, as required, for the orderly implementation of programs of economic and social development and improvement of public services."

Governments in addition were called on to stabilize commodity markets at fair price levels.

The ILO was directed "to give special emphasis to its work in the fields of employment policy, productivity, vocational training, sound management methods, worker education, labor-management relations in both public and private employment, and the integration of indigenous populations."

The resolution also asked international organizations to work with the ILO.

AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Serafino Romualdi was U.S. worker delegate, with Pres. William C. Doherty of the Letter Carriers, Pres. Emeritus Emil Rieve of the Textile Workers Union of America, and Executive Vice Pres. William Dodd of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, as his advisers.

George L-P Weaver, special assistant to Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg, brought a message of greetings from Pres. Kennedy.

Message From Kennedy

"Spurred by our democratic heritage," Kennedy said in his message, "we of the Western Hemisphere are joining together with renewed vigor to fulfill the demands of our peoples for social justice, human dignity and freedom. We are faced with the urgent challenge to provide a better way of life for our children than that which we have known."

The workers group at the opening session succeeded in barring the worker representative from Paraguay on the ground the labor movement he purported to represent has lost its freedom and is dominated by the government.

The workers also defeated with but one dissenting vote a resolution backed by the Communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions praising Premier Fidel Castro of Cuba and condemning the alleged U. S. 'intervention.' Representatives of the Cuban anti-Castro labor front were received with cheers.

Rieve was elected chairman of the Committee on Social Security. Sec.-Treas. Donald MacDonald of the Canadian Labor Congress was elected conference vice-chairman representing the workers.

Kohler Co. Bows to NLRB Order, Ex-Strikers Go on 40-Hour Week

Sheboygan, Wis.—The Kohler Co. has moved a step closer to compliance with a seven-month-old National Labor Relations Board directive aimed at resolving one of the longest and bitterest strikes in U.S. history.

The plumbing ware firm announced resumption of a 40-hour workweek in the wake of an advisory opinion from an NLRB regional official that a short workweek, in effect since the historic ruling on Aug. 26, 1960, did not constitute compliance with the board's order to reinstate striking members of the Auto Workers.

The labor board had ordered the company to restore members of UAW Local 833 involved in the six-year dispute, dismissing replacements, if necessary, to rehire strikers.

Raymond A. Jacobson, compliance officer at the NLRB's Chicago office, advised the company that the 32-hour week failed to measure up to this directive. Replacements remained on the payroll in such numbers, he said, as to result in the reduction of the workweek.

On the heels of Jacobson's opinion, Kohler Vice Pres. L. L. Smith announced the 40-hour week for former strikers. He declared the decision had been made before the agency's letter was received.

Smith conceded that the return to a full workweek would "relieve the company from a possible serious back pay obligation." This was a reference to the UAW's contention that the company had built up a "liability for back pay amount- to hundreds of thousands of dollars" on the basis of eight hours pay lost each week by the 1,150 rehired strikers.

Other Non-Compliances

In his advisory opinion, issued at the company's request, Jacobson said the company was not in compliance with the board directive on several other counts. It failed to:

- Make proper offers of reinstatement to 11 UAW strikers, on the basis of NLRB investigations of these individual cases.
- Offer reinstatement to members of the union who chose to retire at the time of the strike, providing they apply for jobs.
- Rehire 148 strikers who had signed so-called "termination slips" during the strike. These slips were required by new employers. Jacobson held that these workers sought jobs elsewhere only for economic reasons, and that since their "termination" did not have a voluntary aspect, they should not be barred from reinstatement.

In addition, Jacobson said, Kohler strikers have a right to refuse offers of reinstatement from the company until management resumes bargaining in good faith with the union, as the NLRB ordered. He indicated, however, that the board ruling that strikers would be entitled to lost wages for the period between the Aug. 26, 1960, directive and the date of reinstatement would not accrue for strikers refusing jobs pending resumption of negotiations.

The case is now before the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia on the basis of appeals from the board's directive by both the union and the company.

The UAW has asked that the NLRB order be broadened to include reinstatement of 78 unionists —including the members of the strike committee and those found involved in mass picketing—who were excluded from rehiring by the board. The company has asked that the scope of the directive be considerably narrowed.

Union Officers, Insurers Talk L-G Bonding

A committee of secretary-treasurers of AFL-CIO unions has opened a series of informal talks with a subcommittee of the Surety Association of America on bonding rates and claim experience since passage of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said future meetings are scheduled to continue the discussions initiated by the organization of federation secretary-treasurers headed by Toney Gallo of the Cement Workers.

The first meeting held at AFL-CIO headquarters discussed the bonding provision of the Landrum-Griffin Act covering faithful discharge of duty. The union leaders pointed out that there has been no valid claim filed or paid in this category since passage of the act but that the bonding companies have set rates as high as 50 percent greater than for the cost of a simple honesty bond.

The sessions discussed a possible adjustment in rates on faithful discharge of duty bonds as well as various aspects of group bonding policies.

Gallo headed a special subcommittee of the secretary-treasurers group in the meeting which included Arthur P. Gildea of the Brewery Workers, Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers, William A. Smallwood of the Communications Workers and AFL-CIO Gen. Counsel J. Albert Woll.

Representing the Surety Association were its chairman, A. W. Sparrow, and C. C. Varney, William D. Driscoll, F. C. Ayres, John F. Fitzgerald, secretary of the association, and W. J. Zimmerman, assistant secretary.

NLRB Names Head of San Francisco Office

The appointment of Roy O. Hoffman as San Francisco regional director for the National Labor Relations Board has been announced by NLRB Gen. Counsel Stuart Rothman.

Hoffman has been in the San Francisco office since 1948 as chief field examiner and as assistant to the regional director. Before that he served the agency in Cincinnati, New Orleans and Memphis.

Kefauver, 16 Co-Sponsors Propose Cabinet-Level Dept. of Consumers

A bill creating a cabinet-level Dept. of Consumers has been introduced by Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) and 16 co-sponsors.

Kefauver, who introduced a similar bill two years ago, said the need for a high-level voice for the "unorganized and unrepresented" consumer "is considerably greater today."

Lack of consumer purchasing power, resulting in large part from inflationary increases in administered prices areas, "lies at the root of the problem of unused capacity and idle men with which we are currently plagued," the senator said.

The Kefauver bill would bring into the proposed new department the Food & Drug Administration, now under the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare; the Division of Prices & Cost of Living, now part of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics, and elements of the Agriculture Dept. and the National Bureau of Standards.

The proposed Dept. of Consumers would be charged wtih representing the consumer viewpoint in the development of governmental economic policies and in hearings before regulatory agencies.

At present, Kefauver charged, "the regulatory agencies are preoccupied with settling conflicting claims among rival groups of producers."

"Thus the Interstate Commerce Commission is caught in disputes between railroads and trucks," he said, "the Civil Aeronautics Board between large certified carriers and smaller airlines; the Federal Communications Commission between rival applicants for television and radio licenses; the Federal Power Commission between gas producers and utility companies."

Kefauver described as "most heartening" reports that Pres. Kennedy is considering establishment of the position of "consumers' counsel" to take part in regulatory hearings. He declared, however, that legislative action would still be needed to give a consumer's council the power to obtain necessary information on pricing policies from companies seeking rate increases.

Joining in sponsorship of the bill were Democratic Senators E. L. Bartlett and Ernest Gruening of Alaska, Dennis Chavez (N. M.), John A. Carroll (Colo.), Paul H. Douglas (Ill.), Clair Engle (Calif.), Philip A. Hart (Mich.), Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.), Stephen Young (O.), Wayne Morse and Maurine Neuberger of Oregon, John O. Pastore (R. I.), Jennings Randolph (W. Va.), Ralph W. Yarborough (Tex.) and Gale W. McGee (Wyo.), and Republican Sen. Kenneth B. Keating (N. Y.)

Both on Kennedy Priority List:

Congress Passes Area Bill, Aid to Children of Jobless

By Gene Zack

Congress has voted final approval on the second and third of the Administration's five anti-recession priority measures, sending the bills to the White House for Pres. John F. Kennedy's signature.

In quick succession, the House voted final passage of a $394 million depressed areas measure, and then, on a voice vote, approved temporary expansion of the aid-to-dependent-children program to provide emergency aid to the families of the jobless. Both bills had won earlier approval in the Senate.

Approval of the area redevelopment bill by the House marked acceptance by that body of Treasury financing of federal loans to communities with chronic joblessness, with appropriations required for direct grants.

The House originally had demanded annual congressional appropriations for the entire program, but acceded to the Senate on revolving long-term Treasury loans. On passage, 192 Democrats and 31 Republicans voted for the long-term financing preferred by the Administration, while 56 southern and border-state Democrats joined with 137 Republicans in opposition.

Twice Vetoed by Ike

Approval of the bill marked the third time in recent years that Congress had attempted to provide federal aid for communities hard-hit by chronic joblessness. Bills virtually the same as the one sent to Kennedy were vetoed in 1958 and 1960 by former Pres. Dwight D. Eisenhower.

The measure provides $100 million in federal loans to build industrial plants in urban areas; $100 million for plants in rural communities; $75 million for public facilities, including roads, water systems and sewage treatment plants; and $19 million for programs to retrain unemployed workers for new jobs.

The first of Kennedy's anti-recession legislative proposals to win approval by the 87th Congress was a bill calling for temporary extension of unemployment compensation insurance benefits. The measure, passed by Congress in March, is expected to pour $1 billion into the lagging national economy.

The remaining two measures on the Administration's priority list are improvements in the amount and coverage of the wage-hour law, and upgrading of social security benefits.

Both the House and Senate have passed sharply differing versions of minimum wage legislation.

The conflicting minimum wage bills are now in conference, where initial votes indicated the strong possibility that the final version which emerges will more closely resemble the Senate, rather than the House, version.

The fight for social security improvements, meanwhile, shifted to the Senate after the House, by an overwhelming 399-14 vote, approved a modified version of Kennedy's proposals in this area.

The House measure provides a 10 percent hike in cash benefits for widows, a boost in minimum benefits from $33 to $40 a month, and gives men the option of retiring, on reduced benefits, at age 62.

Kennedy had asked for a 13.3 percent hike in widows' pensions and a $43-a-month minimum benefit, in addition to the earlier retirement for men.

Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.), right, listen intently to a General Electric Co. official testify that his superiors had told him to take part in price-fixing meetings with competitors. Anderson Rips AMA 'Lies' on Health Bill son-King bill that "nothing in this legislation shall permit the federal government to tamper with hospital administration or with the practice of medicine." He hurled this series of challenges:

"I defy the AMA to quote a line in my bill that injects the federal government 'into the privacy of the examination room.' This is an old tack by the AMA.

"I defy the AMA to cite anything in my bill that would control 'standards of practice and the choice of practitioner.'

"I defy the AMA to offer one iota of evidence that any doctor would be 'socialized' by my bill, or that there would be a trace of interference in the doctor's 'freedom to treat you in an individual way.'"

Anderson's broadside against the medical lobby was the latest round in a burgeoning battle over the health care measure. Earlier, addressing the National Council on Aging in New York, Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff accused the AMA of "misleading" the public in its series of newspaper ads. He insisted that the bill's provisions "specifically prohibit government interference in the practice of medicine."

On the heels of this charge, AMA Vice Pres. Dr. F. J. L. Blasingame challenged Ribicoff to a nationwide debate on the issue "to end the claims and counter claims" about the effects of the legislation. Ribicoff promptly accepted the challenge and said he would debate with AMA Pres. Dr. E. Vincent Askey, adding that at least two television networks had indicated an interest in carrying the debate.

In his Senate speech, Anderson denied speculation in some newspapers in recent weeks that there would be no effort to seek action on the Administration-backed health measure at this session of Congress.

Declaring that the "speculation is in error," Anderson said "neither the Administration nor the supporters of this proposal in the Senate are shelving their interest in the health of our elderly until next year. We are going to move forward to achieve a program that grows more urgently needed with each passing day."

Anderson's attack on the "deliberately false" AMA ads, he said, was in no way intended as a criticism of either American medicine or of individual physicians. He added that it was his belief "that organized medicine does not speak for all physicians and all persons connected with the healing arts."

The New Mexico Democrat also ripped into AMA claims in the ads that the Kerr-Mills Act, passed last year by Congress and providing federal-state grants for health benefits for the impoverished, constituted "final and complete fulfillment" of the health-financing needs of the aged.

The bill, pushed through by the conservative forces as a substitute for a measure similar to the Anderson-King proposal, provides federal grants to those states which vote added funds for medical care for public welfare recipients.

The AMA claim that Kerr-Mills benefits are "unlimited" and that the bill extends aid to all senior citizens "who cannot meet the cost of a serious or long-lasting illness," Anderson said, "just is not so."

One state, for example, sets a maximum limit on hospital care of only three days, Anderson said, "and even this much—along with any other benefits—is denied to anyone with a gross annual income in excess of $1,000. There are the 'unlimited benefits' the AMA so proudly hails."

He also disputed the AMA claim that the Kerr-Mills program "is now being put into operation in 46 states." Only seven states had a program in operation as of Apr. 17, Anderson said.

Anderson said he endorsed the Kerr-Mills program on the grounds that it would "at least deal with a small part of a larger problem," but that it is not a complete program in itself.

He had this major criticism, however, of the Kerr-Mills Act: the fact that its basic element is "a means test—no matter what language may be used to disguise it. This requires that an elderly person, before he can draw benefits, must be subject to a public agency's audit of his private finances.

"Talk about an intrusion on individual rights! How would the AMA describe this procedure?"

Virginia Labor Backs Byrd Foes in Primary

Richmond, Va.—The Virginia State AFL-CIO has voted strong endorsement of a slate headed by Lt. Gov. A. E. S. Stephens in a Democratic primary battle with the powerful Old Guard political organization of U.S. Sen. Harry F. Byrd.

The state federation said the July 11 primary represents "a contest between moderation and reaction, between progress and stagnation."

Unanimous endorsement of Stephens, who is candidate for governor, and his running mates was voted by 180 delegates to a special statewide AFL-CIO conference. The ticket includes State Sen. Armistead L. Boothe as candidate for lieutenant governor and T. Munford Boyd for attorney general. They are opposed by the Byrd organization slate, headed by State Atty.-Gen. A. S. Harrison, Jr., the gubernatorial candidate and State Senators Mills Godwin, Jr., and Robert Y. Button, candidates for lieutenant governor and attorney general respectively.

While Harrison was not identified with the Byrd organization's now-collapsed "massive resistance" to school desegregation, his running mates were outspoken in demands that public schools be closed rather than integrate.

GE Officials Say Brass Knew of Price Plots

uals indicted by a federal grand jury last year but the government dropped the case. Neither Cordiner nor Paxton was a defendant in the anti-trust case.

George E. Burens, $127,000-a-year GE vice president and general manager before the price-fixing scandal broke, said he had been asked by Paxton to meet with GE's competitors. On one occasion, he said, Paxton had told him in the course of a price discussion: "Well, George, I see no reason in the world why you can't meet with these people and do business with them."

Burens, who was fired by GE after serving a brief jail term on his plea of guilty to the anti-trust law violations, said he had learned of Cordiner's awareness of the price-rigging meetings in 1952 from conversations with the late Henry V. Erben, then GE executive vice president.

After he had told the subcommittee that he disliked price-fixing and had argued with both Paxton and Vinson against it, Burens was asked why he hadn't taken his complaint to Cordiner.

"I assumed that whatever Mr. Vinson told me came from his superiors," Burens replied. "That's the way business is run."

Vinson also was linked to the conspiracy by two other former GE general managers, Clarence E. Burke and Frank E. Stehlik, both of whom were fined and given suspended jail sentences for price-fixing activities.

Vinson's testimony under oath that he had never directed his subordinates to attend price-fixing meetings with competitors led Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), a subcommittee member, to the conclusion that "somebody's crazy or somebody's lying."

The GE executive specifically denied attending a Philadelphia luncheon in 1958 at which, according to previous testimony by four former subordinates, he had approved arrangements for secret meetings with GE's competitors.

Burke told the Kefauver subcommittee that he had been indoctrinated into the mechanics of price-fixing in 1945. He said he learned at that time to camouflage his activities by turning in fake expense statements showing he traveled to a city other than the one where the meeting with competitors was held.

He said he had received a promotion 10 years ago because his superiors considered the man who then held the job "too religious" to disobey the anti-trust laws.

Although he was first demoted from his $75,000-a-year job and then fired when GE decided to oust all officials sentenced in the anti-trust case, Burke said he still "loved" GE.

"Believe it or not," he told the subcommittee, "the GE company is a company to admire."

Earlier, the subcommittee had heard another former GE official, Paul Hartig, describe the price-fixing atmosphere which pervaded the company.

Hartig, now vice president of the Yale & Towne Co. in Philadelphia, said GE's directive forbidding company officials to violate anti-trust laws "was just another policy . . . we had many of them."

Asked what would have happened if he had refused to take part in the price-fixing meetings, Hartig replied:

"You just would not say that. . . . I would run the risk of being transferred to another assignment."

Justice Dept. to Get Identical Bid Lists

Pres. Kennedy has ordered government agencies to inform the Justice Dept. of all identical bids received on federal purchases totaling more than $10,000.

The directive also invited state and local governments to submit such reports. Kennedy said the order was aimed at stepping up enforcement of anti-trust laws by giving the Justice Dept. all information available relating to possible price-fixing conspiracies.

Officer of Roofers Dies in Chicago

Melvin C. Fink, secretary-treasurer of the Roofers, died of a heart attack in a Chicago hotel while attending a meeting of the union's international executive board. He was 43.

He had recently moved from Chicago to Washington, where the union's international headquarters are being transferred, and lived in suburban Silver Spring, Md.

He began his union career as business manager of a local in the Cleveland area and later became an international vice president. He first assumed the secretary-treasurer's post two years ago.

Surviving are his widow, Eleanor, and four children.

A Code For Business?

IN ADJOINING COLUMNS the AFL-CIO News is publishing excerpts from a recent speech by Henry Ford 2d, chairman of the board of Ford Motor Co., warning businessmen that recent scandals in the electrical and automotive industries may arouse popular distrust and revive hostility to American business.

Ford calls for the "establishment of our own formal principles of ethical practice, plus the effective means of self-policing those principles," if business is to avoid codes "imposed on business . . . by a federal legislature."

The AFL-CIO has long urged business to adopt codes of ethical practices along the lines of the codes adopted by the labor movement. The National Association of Manufacturers has produced some generalities, but nothing meaningful has been undertaken to combat the practices that have now erupted in the price-rigging and other cases.

Adoption of a code of ethics, in any case, is only one part of the problem as it concerns mounting public distrust of business ethics and operations.

The other image projected by most business organizations—and especially the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the NAM—is the basic antagonism of large sectors of industry to trade unions and collective bargaining.

As long as business and industry mount campaigns to weaken and destroy unions, in face of public acceptance of trade unionism in part and parcel of American life, so long will there be popular distrust of business and industrial objectives and mouthings about the "American way of life."

Job for the Nation

SIX OF THE NATION'S top high school students will begin four-year collegiate careers this fall under scholarships provided by the AFL-CIO.

There will be hundreds of additional students on college and university campuses who reached there with the help of scholarships awarded by AFL-CIO affiliated unions, state and central bodies and local unions.

But while the labor movement's contribution is important and will provide needed economic assistance for outstanding students, the problem is beyond the resources of any single group, or of private groups as a whole.

This is a job for the nation itself through a program of federally financed scholarships which will help provide the equality of educational opportunity of which we talk much but in the past have done little.

Chilly Spring

THE LABOR DEPT.'S monthly report on unemployment in the nation's key labor areas indicates that "nearly everything's blooming but jobs."

Between March and April the number of major job areas with unemployment exceeding 6 percent of the labor force remained unchanged at an all-time record of 101. The number of smaller areas with substantial unemployment rose to a new peak of 199.

The business press and other government reports disclose a rise in retail sales and new construction, and improvement in many other areas of the nation's economic life. But long-term chronic unemployment is not thawing with the warmer weather.

For the jobless in areas with 6 percent unemployment, the frost isn't off the recession.

Henry Ford 2d Says:

It's Corporation Executive's Job To Keep His House in Order

(The following is excerpted from an address by Henry Ford 2d, chairman of the board of the Ford Motor Co., to the Minneapolis Junior Chamber of Commerce:)

I AM CONCERNED as I am sure many of you are, at a recent chain of events that could arouse broad popular distrust and that could revive old and worn-out hostilities toward American business and industry. Too fast and too close together for comfort we have had a series of falls from grace involving some of our oldest and most respected business firms. As a director of one of the electrical goods manufacturers, and as the chief executive officer of an automotive manufacturing business, my concern is more than academic.

In addition to price-fixing convictions in the one industry and conflict-of-interest charges in the other, congressional committees, in still other industries, have turned up evidence of widespread collusion between corrupt unions and equally corrupt management. Let me note that, whatever differences our company may have had with the UAW (United Automobile Workers Union) we have developed a genuine respect for the determination of its leadership to keep it free of corruption.

In such a decade, America needs more than ever before an atmosphere of mutual trust and confidence among such major elements of our society as industry, labor, and government. Without that confidence, we will not only be far less effective in meeting the goals of our country, we will present to the world at large the image of a quarrelsome, divided and possibly corrupt society. World communism could not ask for a better gift than this.

No doubt there are those who will say that it is neither necessary nor wise for us to wash our business linen in public, that by talking about these things we will draw attention to them and, by so doing, foster the impression that things are much worse than they actually are.

I don't agree. I think what has happened has very grave implications for all of us in business.

OF ONE THING I am sure, the confidence and faith of the American people in business—particularly in the big corporations that play so vital a role in our whole life—will not be strengthened by alibis, excuses, or counter-recriminations.

If we are to preserve the good name of our respective companies, we must be sure that management does everything reasonable in prudence and good sense to prevent such things happening, and takes swift and sure corrective action when the occasional misdeed does occur. At the very least, the top operating executives are responsible for establishing strong and explicit policies concerning the conduct of employes under the law and in conformance with high ethical standards.

These executives also are responsible for communicating these policies to their employes and making sure they are understood. Let me emphasize that this is not a simple or a routine matter. It must be carried out with the utmost thoroughness and intensity. Employes at all levels must be made to feel in their bones their company's codes and policies mean exactly what they purport to mean.

Finally, it is the responsibility of the executives to punish swiftly and impartially violations of those policies at whatever level of the business they may occur.

In other words, it is the job of our corporate executives to keep their own houses in order. If and when they fail to do so, the housecleaning job certainly will be put in less friendly hands.

I believe these recent happenings should alert outside directors to the need to be aware of the pertinent codes and policies of the companies on whose boards they sit. Normally, the outside director has only a broad picture of the business and cannot be completely familiar with the day-to-day operating details. But, when serious improprieties occur, all companies, whole industries and individuals, whether legally responsible or not, suffer the consequences of an inflamed and properly outraged public opinion.

Comforting as it may seem, and true as it may be, I'm afraid it is little use—for instance—to drag out the old bad-apple alibi to explain away things—the idea that there are always a few bad ones in every barrel. In my opinion, it is up to business to find the bad apples in the barrel, if there be any, and clean them out before they contaminate the whole.

I think that we now run a serious risk of having codes with sharp teeth imposed on business, not by chambers of commerce or associations of manufacturers, but by a federal legislature. Because such codes would further restrict the areas of free business action and decision, it is up to us in our various companies and industries to see to the establishment of our own formal principles of ethical practice, plus the effective means of self-policing those principles.

Morgan Says:

Rejuvenated FCC Shows Way To Advance the Public Interest

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

A FASCINATING and possibly portentous example of how a government agency can increase its influence and authority—and thereby presumably its effectiveness—without asking Congress for new supporting legislation is being furnished by the Federal Communications Commission.

Morgan

Not long ago the new chairman of the FCC, Newton Minow, noticed in his morning paper that a television station in the New York City area, WNTA-TV was for sale and that a group was trying to buy it for educational use but its offer was languishing. Minow brings to the commission what might be called a citizen's interest in broadcasting. When he was Adlai Stevenson's youthful law partner in Chicago he hardly knew the difference between amplitude modulation and a disc jockey but as the father of three little girls he was excited and concerned about the actual and potential influence of radio and television for both good and evil, about the media's capacity for enlightenment and inclination to commercialized stuff and nonsense in programming. So the news item that morning set Minow to reflecting on the fact that the only two metropolitan areas in the country which had seven TV channels in operation—New York and Los Angeles—did not have any educational television outlet.

He thought the possible deals revolving around WNTA-TV might make it a psychologically timely move for an FCC investigation of the need for educational television in the nation's two largest cities, and so one was ordered.

The inquiry has not even fully begun but already interesting things have been happening. Variety, the journalistic bible of show business, reported last week that agreement in principle had been reached for the sale of WNTA-TV to an educational citizens group for $5,750,000. One of the most intriguing developments in the deal is that it has been quietly encouraged by the commercial broadcast interests. Variety implied that a reason for this was a kind of "who me?" game in which some broadcasters had been prompted to reexamine their programming services in the light of impending questions from the FCC.

THIS IS ONLY one example of Chairman Minow's activity which by contrast, indicates how flaccid the FCC's muscles of moral persuasion had become in the past due to lack of exercise. By 4-3 votes, the commission recently decided to hold on-the-spot hearings on the license renewal of a radio station in Pasco, Wash., which had put 50 percent more commercial plugs into its programs than it said it would, on the case of a station in Kingstree, S. C., which had let a dirty story slip out over the air and on the application for a license renewal by a radio station in Florida which might have been routine except for the fact the station is owned by two men deeply involved in the TV quiz show scandals of a year and a half ago. Under previous administrations the tendency was to decide such cases automatically in favor of renewal. Minow not only insists that the cases be carefully reviewed but that hearings be held right in the applicant's respective home towns, a procedure almost unheard of in the past.

Another matter on which the FCC shows signs of getting tougher is a controversial practice called the option time rule. Under it, networks reserve the right to use certain hours of broadcast time on their affiliated stations. During such intervals, ordinarily, network programs must be shown. The networks argue this device is essential to their prosperity. The Justice Dept. holds that the practice is a flat violation of the anti-trust laws.

Last September, the FCC voted, in effect, continued approval of it while ordering a reduction in the total option time permissible from 12 to 10 hours a day. The case is already under review by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Washington and last week the FCC instructed its counsel to ask the court to send it back for reconsideration, indicating it may have changed its mind and is now opposed to option time.

Minow concedes, however, that the networks have a real and valid problem on this issue. Without option time, they argue, many of their expensive quality shows, including public affairs programs, won't be taken by local stations which already reject important ones in non-option time. One of Minow's approaches to such instances will be to write to the individual stations, warning them their promised programming is under review.

A fact particularly spurring Minow in his drive to improve the quality of broadcasting is the statistic which shows that children in the United States spend more time watching television than they do in school.

Washington Reports:

Federal Aid Bill Seen Opening Colleges to 100,000 Students

CONGRESSIONAL approval of federal aid to colleges will provide 100,000 more able young men and women the means to continue their education, Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.), chairman of a House special education subcommittee, asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 460 radio stations.

"The best estimates are that 150,000 high school graduates of real ability are not able to go on to college today," Mrs. Green said. "We also have surveys made by universities which show that finances are the main reason for drop-outs among young men and women who begin to go to college."

Rep. Charles E. Goodell (R-N.Y.), also a member of the subcommittee, endorsed the principles of the bill and said it would provide 25,000 scholarships each year for five years at a maximum of $1,000 each. In addition, he pointed out, students can take advantage of loan opportunities through the National Defense Education Act.

"This year," he said, "I believe 135,000 students in college are receiving loans."

"The average cost of attending a private college is $2,260 a year and $1,500 at state universities," Mrs. Green said.

"The program would be administered through a state scholarship agency," Goodell explained, "at least as the bill is now drawn up. There would be a determination of need in each case, an evaluation made also as to other possible sources of income such as supplemental work in college, or aid from family or friends, so that the scholarships may be more widely available."

BOTH STRESSED the need of college aid because "in five years we will have a 30 percent increase in enrollment in our institutions of higher learning," and because the U.S., in this age of space and automation, needs to aid more students to become engineers, scientists, and professional people.

Mrs. Green said that since the increased enrollment requires more college facilities, the measure before Congress would provide $300 million for that purpose.

Mrs. Green said that each high school student awarded a college scholarship under the proposed legislation, would "attend the university of his or her choice." Goodell expressed hope the bill for federal aid would escape the controversy that has "bogged down the public school measure."

"We've come up with a bill that is essentially non-partisan," he asserted.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A SHOWDOWN FIGHT on the issue of tax-deductibility of political advertising by corporations is headed for the courts, and we can expect a decision of some consequence on the question of whether corporations can spend millions in social and economic propaganda campaigns, and charge it off to the taxpayers.

The Timken Roller Bearing Co. has sued to recover nearly $1.3 million in taxes and interest paid under protest when the Internal Revenue Service disallowed the company's claims that advertising and other campaigns fostering a "favorable climate" were deductible as "business expenses."

The Timken company indignantly charges that Internal Revenue had "discriminated against and penalized" the firm by disallowing some of its claims while allowing others, and that its freedom of speech and press were abridged.

Internal Revenue, in making its disallowances, took the viewpoint that some of the Timken claims could not be accepted as reasonable and necessary business expenses under the tax laws—and that the issue was not the corporation's free speech but who would pay for it—the company or the general public.

AND WHAT does the company consider a necessary and proper business expense in the way of advertising?

Among the so-called "institutional" ads were campaigns on "inflation" and the alleged threat thereof, running during a time when the whole issue of what causes inflation was directly involved in legislative proposals in Congress. Housing bills, minimum wage bills, social security bills, the question of "big" or "little" government spending, have been the subject of unremittent public political debate since the end of World War II.

The scare ads on inflation hit heavily on the issue of wages, making glib claims that wage rises drive up prices, when exactly that issue was involved in current negotiations and in state and national law controversies.

Another "institutional" advertisement pictured a Santa Claus mask hung over the Capitol in Washington and the text assailed Washington "bureaucrats" who were charged with trying to beguile the people into thinking that Uncle Sam would give them something for nothing.

No bill was mentioned—but the whole subject of what social services should be financed by taxes was immediately current in Congress, and everybody knew it.

Another advertisement charged "union bosses" with not allowing a vote by "secret ballot" on whether a company offer to its workers would be accepted. Other ads carried a phrase, "The right to work shall not be abridged or made impotent"—but the company explained that this wasn't invented in connection with "recent controversial" state battles over so-called "right-to-work" laws but had been used regularly since 1948 "to express the company's fundamental belief in free enterprise."

Oddly, state "right-to-work" laws became legal just the year before, in 1947, when Congress passed the Taft-Hartley Act.

Another disallowed company "business expense" was for an opinion survey "to obtain valuable information on worker attitudes that will serve as guidance to Timken in its industrial and community relations programs." The company wanted the general taxpayers to pay for this one, too.

THE ISSUE HERE, of course, is not free speech in the broad sense, because nobody has tried to stop the company from publishing its officers' social and economic philosophy in the papers.

The precise issue, surely, is something else—whether the publication of the company's "views" can really be treated for tax purposes as if it occurred in a political and legislative vacuum.

In short, can the company propagandize on public issues—and charge 52 percent of the cost to the Treasury?

THE RUSSIAN MAN in space gives renewed impetus to the U.S. federal aid for college programs, Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.), chairman of a House special education subcommittee, left, and Rep. Charles E. Goodsell (R-N. Y.), also a member of the subcommittee, agreed as they were interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational radio program.

How to Buy:

Water at $1.25 a Pound Seems Costly Even for Frozen Foods

By Sidney Margolius

WHEN YOU BUY one of those frozen meat or fish dinners to eat while you look at TV, or many other ready-cooked frozen and canned foods in the supers today, you often get more of such inexpensive fillers as potatoes, water, flour, celery, etc., than of meat or fish.

The watered hams, about which consumers are complaining, are only one part of a fantastic story of the padding and watering of modern "convenience" foods.

Recently the New York State Cooperative Extension Service advised consumers to read labels on ready-cooked products to know what they are really getting. By law, the label must list the ingredients in order of the relative amount. The first on the list is the largest single ingredient, the second is the next largest, and so on.

But other reports and surveys have shown that most shoppers do not read the ingredients on labels. Most simply look at the picture on the package. Obviously a shopper who can read and doesn't, has no advantage over one who can't.

If that's how people shop nowadays, they are paying a lot of hard-earned money for some cheap ingredients, and the food processors have discovered a wonderful way to get as much as $1.25 a pound for such fillers as rice, flour and even water.

For example, the extension service found one brand of "shrimp" chop suey actually contained, in order of importance, celery, bean sprouts, and shrimp broth, with the shrimp itself in fourth place.

A brand of frozen fish balls had potatoes, not fish, as the leading ingredient.

And do you know what the leading ingredient is in "shrimp croquettes with Newburg sauce?" Not shrimp, but water.

WE DID SOME FURTHER shopping and found a brand of frozen cooked turkey slices, ready for heating, has as its leading ingredient not turkey, but broth, with turkey second, followed by giblets and flour. At 39 cents for a five-ounce package, you pay $1.25 a pound for this dish.

Or take a widely sold brand of frozen cooked meat balls. The leading ingredient is beef and pork all right, but the second is water, followed by non-fat dry milk and bread crumbs. At 61 cents for a 10-ounce package, these semi-meat balls come to 98 cents a pound.

Potatoes at least have some nutrition. But if you pay 69 cents for a famous brand of canned "chicken chow mein," the first and leading ingredient is good old water. Other fillers in this product are celery, starch and bean sprouts. The Foods already breaded for the frying pan are rarely a good value because you pay a meat or fish price for bread crumbs and flour. Frozen breaded veal patties at 45 cents for 8 ounces come to 90 cents a pound and part of that isn't even meat. At the fresh meat counter you can buy patties for 60 cents a pound or so.

But you have to be careful when buying the patties increasingly offered in the freshmeat as well as the frozenfood departments. These often are called "veal birds," "mock chicken leg" and so on.

Here the problem is the frequent addition of extra suet. The frozen prepared patties must reveal such addition in the list of ingredients. For example, one brand of frozen veal "chopettes" lists "fat added."

But the freshly-ground patties sold in the meat department don't have to say when extra fat is added. One manufacturer now even sells stores a machine to convert beef, veal and lamb trimmings into patties. This manufacturer advertises to butchers that this machine "helps you merchandise a great part of this suet at 55 to 69 cents a pound instead of the 3 cents a pound you get from the renderer . . . you take your trimmings and part of your suet, combine them with the other slow-moving cuts and convert them into fast-selling, profit-making patties."

THE WIDE USE of various fillers in prepared foods shows a serious need for additional legislation to require processors and retailers to state the exact perecentages of starch, water, etc., used in foods. It also shows how badly government protective agencies have let down consumers. It's not enough to say "fat added" or "water" or "flour." We also need to know how much. One brand of bologna or cooked salami may have 10 percent water; another 30 percent.

Otherwise, the loss of confidence as consumers do learn to check the ingredients will be self-defeating for the manufacturers and retailers.

As this department previously reported, cats get more facts than humans. Canned cat foods must state the exact percentage of water. But the cats aren't living so well either. Some canned cat foods on the market are as much as 74 percent water.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Cookbooks Are a Magic Carpet If You Keep Out of the Kitchen

By Jane Goodsell

SOME PEOPLE get away from it all by going fishing. Others putter in basement workshops or read detective stories or get drunk.

Me, I read cookbooks.

Cookbooks are my magic carpet, my dreams of glory and my Arabian Nights. They are my refuge from making beds and cooking three meals a day.

My imagination is fired by a recipe for Vichyssoise or bouillabaisse or oysters Rockefeller. I see visions and dream dreams not of paradise, but of trout almondine and chestnut souffles.

Baked Alaska is my Bali H'ai, and strawberries Romanoff my stairway to the stars.

I dwell, in real life, in the pallid realm of modern short-cut cookery. It is a world of precooked rice, frozen orange juice, packaged puddings and pancake mixes. Cookbooks are my escape, my dream world. I don't mean the new, modern cookbooks that tell how to get dinner on the table in seven minutes flat for 97 cents a person. I'm talking about the old and wonderful recipes that pay no attention to stop watches and price tags.

Crepes suzette lure me like the song of the Lorelei, and pate de foie gras looms in my dreams like the pleasure dome of Kubla Khan.

Sometimes in a moment of madness, I even seize a pair of scissors and cut out a recipe to paste in my loose-leaf cookbook. These impulses usually come on me after an hour or so of dreamy cookbook reading.

It is a state of mind induced by narcosis, like convincing yourself that you are Napoleon Bonaparte.

I never attempt these cherished recipes of mine. I just dream about them as I mold the hamburger into meat loaf and beat the mashed potatoes.

There are armchair travelers, armchair adventurers and armchair lovers. I'm an armchair cook, and a great one.

Cookbooks are my gateway to adventure, and maybe someday I'll cook something truly magnificent.

Cruikshank Says:

States Drag Feet On Health Measure

Kansas City, Mo.—Only a "small segment of America's aged" will receive benefits under the 1960 Kerr-Mills program providing federal-state grants to cover some health services for senior citizens, Nelson H. Cruikshank, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, has declared here.

Addressing a conference of hospital administrators from seven midwestern states, Cruikshank said the program would provide aid only to "those already in dire need who happen to live also in a state where matching money has been appropriated."

He said organized labor at the state level has supported implementing legislation and emphasized that the Kerr-Mill provisions would provide a "needed supplement" to broader legislation, like the Anderson-King bill, to insure health care for 13.5 million elderly under social security.

The Anderson-King bill, backed by the Kennedy Administration and the AFL-CIO, is the 1961 version of the measure originally introduced by former Rep. Aime J. Forand (D-R. I.).

Cruikshank ran the record of the seven states from which the administrators came — Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma and Wyoming—to show that only about 226,000 of the more than 1.5 million people over 65 in these states "can possibly have any protection" under the program.

"And this is the program that doctors and most hospitals pushed in preference to the Forand bill on the grounds the Forand bill didn't take care of all the aged," the AFL-CIO spokesman declared.

The Kerr-Mills bill was pushed through the post-convention session of Congress by a conservative Republican-southern Democratic coalition after GOP leaders had warned strongly that legislation placing health care for the aged under social security faced a veto from then Pres. Dwight D. Eisenhower.

As passed by Congress, the measure set up a program of federal grants to help states provide an additional $12 a month for medical care for the 2.4 million persons receiving state old-age assistance benefits. The federal share ranges from 50 to 80 percent, depending on the per capita income of the states. To receive federal aid, state legislatures were required to appropriate added funds to cover their share of medical assistance.

Cruikshank gave this rundown on the seven midwestern states:

Arkansas—A bill implementing the federal program goes into effect July 1, covering in-patient care in hospitals, nursing home care and out-patient clinic visits. However, indications are that eligibility criteria would rule out aid to elderly couples with more than $1,500 annual income.

Colorado—The legislature adjourned Apr. 1 without taking action on implementing legislation.

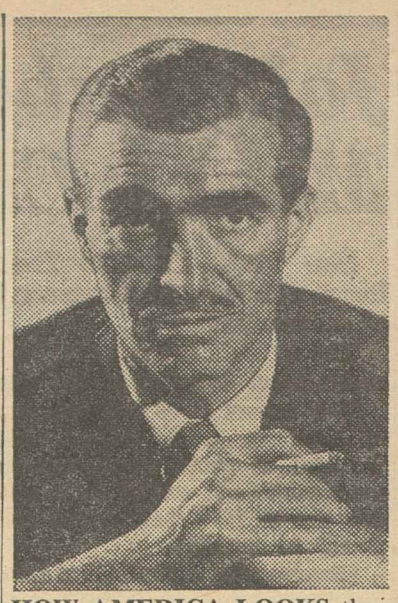
Kansas—The legislature has adjourned without action.

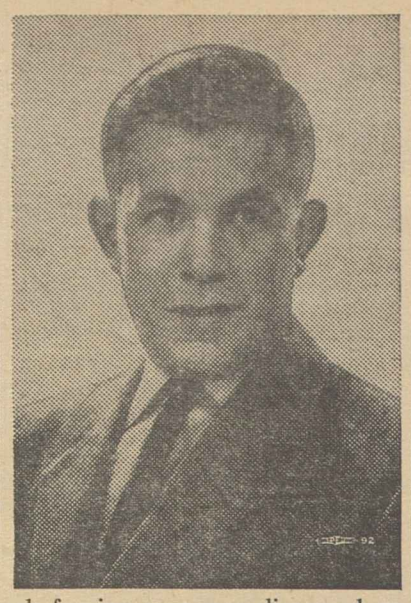
Missouri—A bill has been introduced, "but there seems to be little prospect of enactment."

Nebraska—A bill has been introduced, but there has been no action to date.

Oklahoma—This was one of the first states to act, the program having gone into effect in October 1960. The program is "so full of restrictions and limitations it's doubtful many people will be aided." For example, hospitalization, up to a maximum of 21 days, is provided only if an illness is "life-endangering or sight-endangering."

Wyoming—The legislature adjourned Feb. 19 without taking action.





HOW AMERICA LOOKS through foreign eyes was discussed on "Briefing Session" by Kenneth G. Crawford, left, Washington columnist for Newsweek magazine, and Kenneth W. Thompson, a political scientist and former university professor.

Briefing Panelists See Improved U.S. Image

America's "image" in the eyes of the world is created by deeds, not words; and it will be improved if our goal is to be respected rather than liked, according to the most recent "Briefing Session" panel.

Appearing on the weekly public affairs program presented jointly by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center were Kenneth G. Crawford, veteran foreign and Washington correspondent, and Kenneth W. Thompson, a political scientist who specializes in international affairs. Their views were nearly as alike as their first names.

Both agreed that the Kennedy Administration has improved the American image abroad, even though as yet it has had little chance to do more than re-state our aims and outline new objectives. But they noted that our actions—such as our United Nations vote on behalf of Angola—have reinforced the prinicples expressed by the President.

"I think our image should be precisely what Pres. Kennedy has sought to make it—namely, the defender of freedom and the supporter of social, economic and political development of peoples around the world," Thompson said.

One difficulty, Edward P. Morgan, host and moderator of the program, pointed out, is that the remaining colonial powers, such as Britain, France and Portugal, are also our staunch allies. Thompson acknowledged this, but said the Angola decision indicated that "the margin of choice is wider than we had thought."

Crawford deplored America's "tendency to feel that we must be loved."

"It seems to me that this is a fallacy," he said. "Before the first World War, Great Britain for many years kept the peace, on the balance of power principle. For most of that time it was called Perfidious Albion. Nevertheless, it was respected.

"I think we should not confuse love with respect. I think what we need is respect, respect for what we are doing, and respect for the reasons we are doing it. We do not have to be loved, and we shall not be as the world's great power."

Thompson, while generally in accord, warned that "respect is very often something that comes at the end of the road rather than the beginning;" and the end is not months or years away, but possibly generations.

Turning to our continuing contest with the Soviet Union, the panelists conceded the Russians had an advantage in being able to put forward "simple and appealing propositions" to the new and uncommitted nations. Though these propositions are both cynical and irresponsible, they said, this is not quickly apparent.

Crawford, on a more optimistic note, felt that some Soviet propaganda, specificially on the Castro regime, was beginning to "wear thin."

Our own domestic behavior is vital in shaping our world image, the panelists agreed. The average citizen, Thompson said, can best improve the world's opinion of the United States by improving matters in his own community. But both men felt that Americans abroad, whether tourists or troops, left a better impression than is popularly believed.

Housing Plight Listed as Next Briefing Topic

A major domestic problem, "Housing America," will be examined in the next production in the Briefing Session television series. The guest panelist will offer two viewpoints—that of an active housing administrator and that of of a commentator and critic.

Ira S. Robbins, currently a member of the New York City Housing Authority, has been a housing official for more than 30 years. He served New York state under Governors Herbert H. Lehman (D) and Thomas E. Dewey (R) as counsel, deputy commissioner and acting commissioner of housing.

From 1948 to 1958 he was executive vice president of the Citizens' Housing & Planning Council of New York.

Robbins was a member of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller's 1959 task force on middle income housing. He has been president and board chairman of the National Housing Conference and is a member of the board of governors of the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials.

Douglas Haskell in 1930 created the first regular column of architectural criticism in the United States, and he has been a prolific writer and editor in the field ever since. He is himself an architect and practices the profession between his editorial undertakings. He is frequently called upon to write or edit the architectural sections in such standard reference works as the Brittanica, and he has served as an adviser to numerous housing groups, including the Public Housing Administration.

Administration Pushes Farm Worker Reforms

A showdown battle between the Kennedy Administration and powerful corporate farm interests appeared to be shaping up as Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg called on Congress to halt the importation of Mexican farm workers unless major reforms are made in the program.

"At a time when unemployment is a major problem in the United States, there can be no justification for continuing such a program unless action is taken to protect the interests of U.S. farm workers," Goldberg declared.

He placed the Administration "solidly behind" a bill introduced by Rep. Merwin Coad (D-Iowa) which would provide employment priority and wage safeguards to domestic farm workers as a condition for a two-year extension of the Mexican labor program.

The Coad bill—if Rules Committee clearance can be obtained—is expected to be offered as a substitute for a straight two-year extension of the present program which won 27-3 approval from the House Agriculture Committee.

In testimony opposing extension of the program, the AFL-CIO had denounced it as "imported colonialism" and Assistant Labor Sec. Jerry R. Holleman charged that by providing cheap labor for 50,000 of the biggest farms, it discriminates against smaller farmers who use family labor.

Goldberg, in a public statement supporting the Coad bill, declared:

"It is my view and the view of the Administration that the power and authority of government should not be used in a manner which tends to perpetuate or lower the already depressed economic conditions of U.S. farm workers.

"Evidence accumulated by the Dept. of Labor proves beyond doubt that the mass importation of Mexican labor has had, and is having, an adverse effect on the wages, working conditions and employment opportunities of U.S. farm workers.

"It is extremely important that the Administration's position be understood. We are against any extension of Public Law 78 (the Mexican farm labor program) without reform. We are solidly behind the bill introduced by Congressman Coad."

Key provisions of the Administration-backed bill provide:

- Growers seeking to employ Mexican workers must first offer employment to U.S. workers at wages at least equivalent to the average farm wage in the state.
- Eligibility to employ Mexican workers would be restricted to employers who make reasonable efforts to attract U.S. workers by offering —and actually providing—conditions of employment at least equal to those they are required by law to offer Mexicans.
- Mexican workers would be confined to employment in seasonal and temporary jobs, and to employment not involving the operation of machinery.
- The Secretary of Labor would be authorized to limit the number of foreign workers who may be employed by any employer to the extent necessary to assure active competition among growers for the services of U.S. farm workers.

Birch Society Linked to 'Right-to-Work' Drive

The National Council for Industrial Peace has linked the "ultra-right wing" John Birch Society to the drive to enact or toughen so-called "right-to-work" laws in state legislatures this year.

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and former Sen. Herbert H. Lehman (D-N.Y.), co-chairmen of the citizens' organization which has fought compulsory open-shop laws, said admitted members of the John Birch group have been active in the so-called "right-to-work" movement.

"Alliance of the two highly reactionary right-wing groups has been especially virulent in Indiana and Kansas," they stated.

The industrial peace council also pointed to attempts in several states to enact bans on union shop contracts through "obscurely-worded" amendments to state labor laws or fair employment practices acts. The council said such "back-door approaches" have been made in California, Connecticut and Oregon.

Despite the "strenuous campaign" carried on by the "right-to-work" lobby, the industrial peace council's box score showed that no new legislation outlawing the union shop has been enacted in any state.

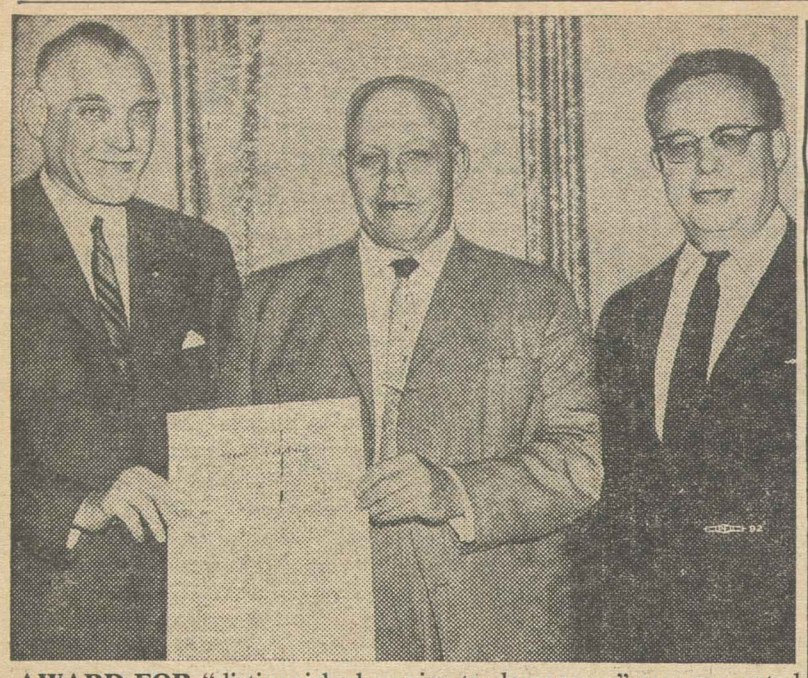
Bills backed by the National Right-to-Work Council have been rejected by the legislatures of Idaho, Kansas and New Mexico, the box score noted. Various versions of "right-to-work" legislation, however, are still pending in legislatures in California, Connecticut, Maine, Oregon, Oklahoma and Texas. In Florida, anti-union groups are expected to seek legislation to implement the state's "right-to-work" constitutional amendment and to outlaw the checkoff of union dues.

Attempts to repeal existing "right-to-work" laws failed in Utah and Indiana. In the latter state, a Republican-sponsored bill to outlaw the agency shop was also defeated.

Use of Military in Civilian Jobs Hit

The executive council of the Government Employes has sharply protested the use of military officers and enlisted men to fill "civilian-type government jobs."

The union, urging congressional action to prevent the Defense Dept. from replacing civilians with servicemen, charged that "the practice of employing military personnel in civilian jobs weakens the military structure of the nation, increases the cost of government, and interferes with the continuity necessary for the efficient operation of the nation's business."



AWARD FOR "distinguished service to democracy" was presented to Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky (left) at 56th annual conference of League for Industrial Democracy in New York. Making presentation was AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. At right is Dr. Leon Keyserling, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisors in the Truman Administration, who was principal speaker at the league's luncheon in Potofsky's honor.

Partnership Based on Equality:

Join Labor To Fight Reds, Meany Challenges Industry

New York—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has challenged the leaders of industry to join forces with labor in a common battle "to preserve the American way of life" against the menace of communism.

The nation's economy is "in trouble," Meany said, at a time when the rising tide of world communism has forced the free enterprise system into a "major struggle for existence."

"We cannot have one segment of American society imbued with the idea of profit, profit, always more profit, and waiting for someone else to save their system for them," he declared.

Meany spoke at the 56th annual luncheon of the League for Industrial Democracy at the Astor Hotel here, at which he presented the league's 1961 award for "distinguished service to democracy" to Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky.

The citation hailed Potofsky for his half-century of service to the ACWA's "pioneering activities" in the fields of industrial organization, collective bargaining, cooperative housing, labor banking, education, health, recreation and union welfare; and saluted him for the "integrity, distinction and vision" with which he has served the trade union movement at large as an AFL-CIO vice president and Executive Council member.

Potofsky called for a determined effort by the federal government to stimulate a higher level of economic growth to avoid having a permanent army of 6 million or more jobless at the end of the present recession.

He urged, in particular, a "massive attack" in the public sector of the economy on problems in the fields of housing, education, health care, roads, river and land development and conservation. At the same time he asked for "serious thought" about reduction of the workweek to 35 or 32 hours to meet the challenges of automation and a growing labor force.

A permanently high level of unemployment, the ACWA president said, will have a "serious effect" on America's efforts to assure democracy and higher living standards for other nations.

Ideological Conflict

"Our enemies abroad claim that our system cannot provide jobs, that only under a totalitarian system can a nation maintain a high level of employment," Potofsky declared. "It is up to us to prove that under a democratic government freedom is not equal to insecurity, poverty is not a necessary partner of liberty."

In a panel discussion during the two-day conference staged by the LID, Boris Shishkin, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, called discrimination because of race, creed or color, a "major blight" on the national scene.

Shishkin placed particular emphasis on discrimination in employment and in housing. He called on Congress to carry through on Pres. Kennedy's "bold initiative" in creating the new President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, by enacting "without further delay" an enforceable federal Fair Employment Practices Act. He also urged the President, by Executive Order, to halt discrimination in all housing involving federal grants, loans, mortgage insurance or guarantees.

Meany told the several hundred luncheon guests that the recent chain of events in the Far East, in Africa, and on America's doorstep in Cuba offers "convincing proof" of the struggle which Communists are waging to topple the free enterprise system.

In the face of this threat, he said, the time has come for management and labor to enter into a "partnership based on absolute and complete equality" and work toward the preservation of the existing economic machinery in this country.

"If we do not," he warned, "not all our military machinery and not all our free world alliances will be enough, and our system can succumb without a shot being fired."

It is not enough, the AFL-CIO president declared, for management to deal with labor "only because the law says it must, and only to the extent that it is compelled to do so." Instead, he said, in the interests of "intelligent self-preservation," management should sit down with unions to explore ways to meet the challenges of the '60s.

Meany paid tribute to Henry Ford 2d for his recent criticisms of industry based on the exposure of unethical practices in the electrical and automobile industries, and declared that Ford had "finally gotten around to a code of ethics which labor had long ago."

Asks Further Step

He challenged the industrialist to "go a step further and come up with another code which recognizes completely and without qualification the right of workers to organize and which recognizes the part labor can play in preserving the American way of life."

The principal luncheon speaker, Dr. Leon Keyserling, former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under former Pres. Harry S. Truman, warned that greater national efforts are needed to end the "roller-coaster prosperity," of constant economic ups and downs, which has characterized the period since the end of the Korean War.

"At the top of each economic upturn," Keyserling said, "we have more unemployment than we did during the previous peak of so-called prosperity." He said the situation is so acute now that at the top of the 1959 upturn, the U. S. "had more unemployment than we did at the bottom of the 1953-54 downturn."

While praising the current programs placed before the Congress by Kennedy the economist said that they "do not measure up to the needs of the situation," and warned that unless America "elevates its sights" it will have 9 million unemployed by 1965.

Kennedy Hails Labor Ethical Code

New York—The ethical standards established by organized labor have made a "lasting contribution" to the nation, Pres. John F. Kennedy has declared.

In a telegram to the 56th annual luncheon of the League for Industrial Democracy, Kennedy said labor's ethical practices codes are a recognition that "in order not to be mastered by others, we must first be masters of ourselves."

Kennedy praised Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob F. Potofsky, recipient of the LID's 1961 distinguished service award, as a "labor statesman of great accomplishment."

Meany May Day Call Hails Freedom Battles

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has voiced American labor's solidarity with the "stirring struggles" of workers throughout the world "to win freedom from hunger and tyranny and to share in the benefits of modern industrial progress."

In a May Day message—marking labor's traditional holiday in a large part of the world—Meany called on trade unionists everywhere "to redouble their efforts to free the entire world from the perils of war and dictatorship, from the evils of poverty and oppression."

Declaring that "the struggle for liberty and equality is at the heart of the American tradition," Meany hailed efforts in Algeria, South Africa and Angola "to break the last chains of the old colonialism."

He warned against "the steady expansion" of Communist imperialism, citing the crushing of Tibet, invasion of Indian territory, infiltration in the Congo, armed aggression in Laos and South Vietnam, a base in Cuba and threats to the freedom of West Berlin. Meany reminded the world of "the heroic Hungarian and Tibetan freedom fighters, momentarily overwhelmed by the . . . new imperialism of Soviet and Chinese communism."

The AFL-CIO president said the free world "must use all its resources—military, economic, social, moral"—to meet the common threat to peace and freedom.

He said American labor backs "the firm position taken by Pres. Kennedy" in resisting Soviet expansion.

Warning that economic stagnation in the U.S. "represents as great a threat to our national security as Communist aggression," Meany declared:

"The wheels of our factories must be kept turning; our productive potential must be realized; the millions of unemployed must be absorbed; the depressed areas of our country must be relieved; the shortage of schools, decent housing, hospitals, roads must be overcome."

The initial efforts of the Kennedy Administration to meet these problems, Meany said, "must be deepened and accelerated" so that the nation "can play its true role in the world of aid to the needy, of support to the just."

Meany pledged that American labor will "continue to fight for the elimination of racial discrimination in our own country" and "will use all our strength to influence our government to aid the cause of freedom everywhere."

IUD Seeks Relief for All Situs Pickets

Broadening of pending situs-picketing legislation so that it will "insure relief" to all workers from the National Labor Relations Board's Denver Building Trades rule has been urged by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Testifying before a House Labor subcommittee, IUD Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey said a bill introduced by Rep. Elmer Holland (D-Pa.) would protect all workers from the application of the Denver secondary boycott restrictions at common work sites. A bill sponsored by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), Carey said, would bring relief only to building trades unionists.

The AFL-CIO and the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept. are strongly supporting the Thompson bill. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany opened the hearings by citing Executive Council resolutions backing the Thompson measure to redeem bipartisan pledges over the past seven years to correct the inequities of the Denver ruling.

The Kennedy Administration has urged passage of the Thompson bill pending court clarification of several cases involving industrial unions. Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has pledged that if the courts uphold the NLRB against industrial unions the Administration will support remedial legislation to correct the situation.

Al J. Hayes, president of the Machinists, asked that situs-picketing legislation be clarified to "prevent its misinterpretation and misuse." He asked that the bill make clear that the picketing rights it would confer could not be used against union crews sent by missile manufacturers to install certain equipment at construction sites.

Pilots International Hit Turboprop Setup

Chicago—The Intl. Federation of Air Line Pilots Associations has protested to Canadian and U.S. aviation officials against the operation of a new Trans-Canada Air Lines turboprop plane with only two crew members in the cockpit.

Fair L-G Enforcement Pledged by Goldberg

"Vigorous enforcement" of the Landrum-Griffin Act to prevent corruption by either management or labor has been pledged by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg.

In letters to heads of major management associations and to the presidents of national and international unions, the Cabinet official said the law would be administered "with reason and fairness."

Goldberg emphasized that the department's primary objective would be "to achieve voluntary compliance" with the requirements on reporting and disclosure.

At the same time, however, he stressed there should be "no question that we will deal with corruption through vigorous enforcement of the law."

The Secretary told union officials that "few people know better than I that the vast majority of union officers are dedicated citizens" who are "devoted to safeguarding the rights and advancing the interests of the members of their organizations."

"Yet," he added, "we must frankly acknowledge that many reputations are being questioned in the public mind because of dishonest, corrupt and unethical practices of a few who have betrayed their trust as labor leaders."

In his letters to management, Goldberg repeated his praise for the vast majority of union leaders, declaring that unions, "by their very nature as organizations of trust to their members and the public, have a special responsibility to dedicate themselves to the highest ethical values."

Management, the Secretary continued, "also has a serious moral obligation." He added:

"Most of our dedicated business leaders have displayed a keen awareness of moral responsibility. But, again, we must acknowledge that the record has been tarnished because of those who sought to bribe their way to advantageous positions in their industrial relations and pursued unethical courses for expedient gains."

Carpenters Pick Eldridge as Editor

Indianapolis, Ind.—Pres. Maurice A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters has announced the appointment of James A. Eldridge of Indianapolis as editor of the Carpenter, the union's official publication.

A former Indianapolis newspaperman and a lecturer, until his appointment Eldridge was publicity director of the Indianapolis office of the Bobbs-Merrill Co., book publishers. He formerly was midwest field director of the American Association for the United Nations. He succeeds Peter E. Terzick, who is now treasurer of the union.

AFL-CIO Scholarship Winners Named

Six June Graduates Selected for Awards

Six June 1961 high school graduates will enter college this fall on full four-year scholarships awarded by the AFL-CIO, bringing to 18 the number of students thus honored since the program was inaugurated in 1959.

The six winners—from both union and non-union families—were chosen on the basis of tests conducted by the National Merit Scholarship Corp., in which some half million high school students took part.

The students receiving this year's federation scholarships are:

- Georgie Anne Wiggins, Sunapee, N. H.
- Phyllis Margaret Storm, East Pittsburgh, Pa.
- Mary Florence Cogar, Concord, Calif.
- David Skipwith Cannell, Annapolis, Md.
- Kerry Ronald Pennington, Birmingham, Ala.
- Harry Michael Whalen, LaMoure, N. D.

In announcing the winners, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reiterated labor's continuing interest in broadening educational opportunities in the U.S.

"The AFL-CIO looks forward to the day when all of America's young people have the opportunity to complete a college education," he declared.

"Federally financed scholarships for college study would be a long step forward toward a stronger democracy and would show the world that, in America, opportunities are equal.

"In the meantime, however, the AFL-CIO is happy to prove its interest in furthering educational opportunities by these awards."

The AFL-CIO awards range up to $1,500 per year, depending on the actual costs involved at the accredited college or university of the individual student's own choice and the funds available to the student. They are subject to change if the family financial circumstances change during the year.

The federation program is only a part of the constantly expanding effort by American trade unions in this field. Scholarships offered by national and international unions, their affiliated locals, and state and local central bodies add up to a labor investment in education of more than $500,000 a year.

Under the AFL-CIO program, two scholarships are granted annually in each of three geographical sections of the country. One scholarship in each section is set aside for a student from a trade union family while the other is entirely unrestricted.

Here are brief biographical sketches of this year's winners:

Georgie Anne Wiggins, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George I. Wiggins, is the valedictorian in her class at Sunapee, N. H., High School. She has demonstrated outstanding ability in mathematics, science and dramatics; won $250 for her essay on her school's mock town meeting; is editor of the school yearbook and represented her school at the Boston University Scholastic Press Association Conference. Her father is general manager of the Federal Machine Tool Co., Newport, N. H., and her mother is a registered nurse. She plans to major in bio-chemistry at Cornell University.

Phyllis Margaret Storm, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Paul Storm, ranks first in a class of 228 students at Turtle Creek High School, East Pittsburgh, Pa. She is assistant editor of the yearbook, vice president of "Quill and Scroll," participated in the Westinghouse Science Honors Institute and received the Bausch & Lomb honorary science award. Her father is a crane operator at Westinghouse Electric Co., and a member of Local 601, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. She will major in chemistry at the University of Pennsylvania.

Mary Florence Cogar, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Cogar, is the top student in mathematics at Clayton Valley High School, Concord, Calif. Her interests include biology and gardening, and she devotes considerable time to working with children as a Cub Scout den mother, teaching a summer bible school class and working with underprivileged children. Her father is a service station operator and a member of Machinists Lodge 1173. She will prepare for a career as an elementary school teacher at the University of California in Berkeley.

David Skipwith Cannell, son of Mrs. H. S. Cannell, ranks first in his class at St. Mary's High School, Annapolis, Md. He is a member of the National Honor Society, president of the school science group, member of the student council, the Sea Explorers and the Science Seminar of Annapolis. The oldest of five children, he has contributed to the family income by holding parttime jobs since the death of his father, an economist and writer. His mother teaches at the Anne Arundel County High School. He will major in physics at Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Kerry Ronald Pennington, son of Mr. and Mrs. Keith E. Pennington, ranks among the top students in his class at Ensley High School, West Birmingham, Ala. He is feature editor of the school paper, and has held office as president, vice president, treasurer and publicity chairman of his Sunday School and youth group. He has been an active member of his school's ROTC unit. His father is a billing clerk at U.S. Steel Corp., and has been a member of Steelworkers Local 1013 for 12 years. He will major in electrical engineering at Georgia Institute of Technology.

Harry Michael Whalen, son of Mr. and Mrs. Harry C. Whalen, ranks first in his class at LaMoure, N. D., High School. He is editor of the school paper, president of his church youth group and secretary of the Letterman's Club. He has worked as a newspaper carrier, a printer's assistant and as a service station attendant. Both parents are active in the Farmer's Union, and both work at the cooperative farm equipment and service station run by the Farmer's Union. He will major in physics at Concordia College, Moorhead, Minn.

Parley to Mark Norris Centennial

The 100th anniversary of the birth of the late Sen. George W. Norris, Nebraska Republican whose name is synonomous with liberalism, will be observed with a centennial conference in Washington on May 16 and 17.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers are members of an initial committee of sponsors.

FILMS FOR LABOR

FILM DIVISION—DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION
AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR AND CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS

NEW CATALOGUE of "Films for Labor," describing 50 sound films available from the AFL-CIO Film Division, has just been printed and can be purchased from the Pamphlet Div., Dept. of Publications. The department also announced that starting May 1 all films which are 16 mm wide, will rent at $3 per showing except for a few at $7.50.

NLRB Election Power Transferred to Regions

workers in the face of employer opposition.

Employer petitions and decertification petitions also may be processed by regional directors.

In announcing the delegation of election powers to the 28 regional directors, the new chairman of the NLRB, Frank W. McCulloch, termed it "one of the most far-reaching steps ever taken with respect to election cases."

"It should provide a major speedup in NLRB case handling in line with the policy of Pres. Kennedy for the independent regulatory agencies," he continued.

"By relieving the board of a substantial part of its total case load, the new plan will free the board to reduce its large backlog and dispose of its other cases involving unfair labor practices more promptly and carefully."

The order delegating representation election powers to the regional directors appeared to accept substantially the principles recommended by the AFL-CIO in a memorandum on the issue submitted to the labor board on Oct. 15, 1959.

Authority in Landrum-Griffin

The Landrum-Griffin Act contained a section giving the NLRB statutory authority to delegate its representation cases to the regional directors. The section was written into the bill at the initiative of Senate conferees headed by then Sen. John F. Kennedy, when the final language of the legislation was devised in a joint Senate-House committee.

The AFL-CIO memorandum pointed out that Congress had granted the authority because of "concern over the slowness of representation proceedings," and urged the board to adopt rules and regulations to carry out "to the fullest possible extent the congressional intent."

The federation warned, however, that new rules and regulations should be so devised as to "expedite" proceedings and not simply add "one more delaying step" by allowing the regional directors first to issue an order and then by administrative practice make the order broadly subject to review by the board itself.

McCulloch's announcement made it clear that the intent is to speed up procedures.

Stuart Rothman, NLRB general counsel, backed up McCulloch's viewpoint in a statement agreeing on "the importance and desirability" of the delegation of powers.

"The Office of the General Counsel," he pledged, "will do everything possible to ensure dispatch, thoroughness and fairness in all areas of representation case work which fall within its responsibility."

The board announcement said that review of a regional director's election order or denial of an order will be reviewed only on "restricted" grounds, which it limited to four.

These were spelled out as allowing review only if a regional director's order raised a "substantial question of law or policy" because of a violation of established precedents; a "clearly erroneous" decision on a "substantial factual issue"; "prejudicial error" in the conduct of a hearing; or the presence of "compelling reasons" for reconsideration of an important board rule or policy.

Influence of Kennedy Appointees

The NLRB, as formerly made up wholly of members named by then Pres. Eisenhower, asked for proposals on delegation of its representation cases on Sept. 15, 1959—the day after the Landrum-Griffin Act was signed into law.

It was in response to this request that the AFL-CIO submitted its recommendations on Oct. 15 of the same year. Other interested groups also submitted recommendations.

No decision was issued until after the advent of the Kennedy Administration and the President's appointment of two new members—McCulloch and Board Member Gerald A. Brown—to fill vacancies created by expiration of the terms of Eisenhower appointees.

New List of Labor Films Now Available

A completely revised AFL-CIO film catalogue, "Films for Labor," which includes descriptions of 50 new movies, has just been published and is now ready for distribution, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education has announced.

All the films are 16 mm size and carry sound tracks. Featured are three new films which can be obtained from the AFL-CIO Film Division — "'Land of Promise," which the AFL-CIO produced for TV use on Labor Day; "Harvest of Shame," the Columbia Broadcasting System film on the problems of migratory workers; and "Our Election Day Illusions: The Beat Majority," which deals with reapportionment and gerrymandering.

The department also announced that beginning May 1, all films will rent at $3 per showing except for a few expensive ones like "Harvest of Shame" and "Automation — Weal or Woe," for which the price will be $7.50.

The catalogue includes a description of how to use the AFL-CIO Film-of-the-Month program most effectively. It can be obtained from the Pamphlet Div., Dept. of Publications, 815 Sixteenth Street, N. W., Washington 6, D. C. Single copies, 25 cents; 10 or more copies, 23 cents each; 100 or more, 21 cents each.

Pilots Cited For Deeds in Plane Fire

Chicago—Two airline pilots have been cited for outstanding performance in "ditching" a burning Northwest Air Lines plane in the Pacific Ocean on July 13, 1960, and supervising a rescue operation in which all but one of 58 passengers and crewmen were saved during a Tokyo-to-Manila flight.

Capt. David Rall, Seattle, Wash., and First Officer Travis Everett, Fall City, Wash., were nominated for the annual award of the Order of Daedelians, flyers' fraternity, for the outstanding 1960 action in furtherance of air safety on commercial airlines. The award was presented at Kelly Air Force Base, Texas.

Representatives of the Air Line Pilots, Air Transport Association and the Federal Aviation Agency nominated the men. The plane was over the ocean when a propeller tore loose, ripped into the fuselage and caused a wing to catch on fire.

Rall and Everett, both ALPA members, landed the plane on the water, got passengers and crew on rafts, and signaled rescuers.

Strike Insurance Reprints Available

Reprint copies of an article, Strike Insurance: A Threat to Collective Bargaining, from the March American Federationist, are now available.

The analysis of the recently-developed anti-labor weapon was written by John Barry, assistant editor of the Guild Reporter, official organ of the American Newspaper Guild. The reprint may be obtained from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington 6, D. C.; single copies free, $10 per 1,000.

New Office Set Up:

Goldberg to Act on Automated Jobless

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has outlined plans for "energetic" action by the Labor Dept. to help workers displaced by technological changes and to expand the job-finding and guidance functions of the U. S. Employment Service.

He told the House Labor Subcommittee on Unemployment & Automation that one proposal being considered by the Administration would enable the government to pay the transportation costs for unemployed workers referred to jobs in other communities.

Goldberg also announced that he has set up a new Office of Automation & Manpower within the Labor Dept. which will keep abreast of fast-changing technological developments and "develop proposals for both training and retraining" of workers.

Ford Co. Hailed in Plant Sale for Job

The Ford Motor Co. has been praised by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg for demonstrating "enlightened self-interest" in the sale of its abandoned Chester, Pa., plant.

Goldberg told a House Labor subcommittee that Ford turned down an offer, from a firm planning to scrap the plant and equipment, in favor of a lower bid from an employer promising jobs at the plant for local workers.

Although Ford received less money, Goldberg pointed out, "Scrap can't buy automobiles but employed workers can."

He called for the cooperation of states, cities, labor and management, declaring that all these groups as well as the Federal Government have been "derelict in the past" through "indifference to the plight of the displaced worker."

He told the subcommittee, headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), that "we must consider many more measures of longer terms and even greater depth to tackle the hard-core unemployment generated by technological change."

Automation Defended

Defending "automation and other technological advancement as an essential and desirable development for maintaining the strength of the U. S. economy, "Goldberg said productive capacity now idle could be utilized in meeting the nation's needs for slum clearance, highways, public buildings and other public works projects, all of which he emphasized would provide more jobs in private industry.

Warning that 1.8 million persons face technological displacement during the coming year, Goldberg said management must do more than it has in the past to meet its responsibilities to its workers. He declared:

"Management has got to stop automatically resisting proposals to ease the human burden of automation, whether they are made by labor unions or public officials.

"Retraining programs, allowance payments, vesting of pensions, care in the location and relocation of plants, and a host of other schemes should receive management's most serious attention."

Goldberg added that "labor, for its part, must meet management half-way. It must abandon restrictive practices . . . Both sides must concentrate on devices to increase labor mobility. Both sides must jointly explore these problems."

Labor and management together, he declared, "must now make a major contribution to ending hard-core unemployment. I feel they have made only a minor contribution thus far."

For the states and communities, particularly in the depressed areas, Goldberg outlined a two-part program, with federal assistance.

Local and state governments, he said, "must be ready with plans and projects for the development of their own economic life. They must have on the shelf important public facilities and natural resources programs."

More Education Urged

He called also for improved educational facilities and standards "to educate young men and women to the needs of a technological society."

To re-shape the U.S. Employment Service into a more effective job placement and guidance agency, Goldberg emphasized, the cooperation of the states is essential since the network of employment offices throughout the nation is state-operated, although federally subsidized. He said the Labor Dept. will shortly propose a reorganization of the employment service but "it is not my intention to federalize it."

Goldberg said the new Office of Automation & Manpower, to be headed by Deputy Assistant Labor Sec. Seymour Wolfbein, will be "a very energetic office" which will examine "all phases of employment and unemployment."

He said it will "serve as a clearinghouse for materials on technological developments, hold conferences with employers and workers affected by technological change, and prepare information materials."

Areas Hard-Hit by Unemployment Rise to Record Levels in April

O., and Charleston, W. Va. These areas moved from Group D, a classification of unemployment ranging from 6 to 8.9 percent, into Group E, a category showing joblessness of between 9 and 11.9 percent.

Steel-Sparked Improvements

At the same time, the situation improved for two markets—Gary-Hammond-East Chicago, Ind., and Steubenville, O.-Weirton, W. Va.—which moved from Group E to Group D.

The improvement in the latter two areas, Goldberg said, reflected generally improved employment in steel. He cited recent tonnage figures from the American Iron & Steel Institute which, he said, showed that steel is now operating at 61 percent of capacity—a 25 percent improvement over December 1960.

In his statement on the GOP study of hard-core unemployment, Goldberg noted that in February, when he toured recession-ridden cities to examine the long-term joblessness picture first hand, he called for "nonpartisan and nonpolitical" solutions.

The Secretary recalled that he had been "criticized for playing politics" during the February tour, but added:

"The criticism of February has now given way to the hard facts of April, as the Area Labor Market release . . . affirms once more. Most Americans realize that changes are taking place in our economic life that gravely affect the employment situations of millions of people, especially older, younger, unskilled and minority workers."

Goldberg offered the GOP the "full facilities" of the Labor Dept. to aid the study, and expressed the hope that from the Republican investigation would come "full and enlightened support of the programs advanced by Pres. Kennedy and this Administration."

The Cabinet officer told reporters that the Administration currently is conducting a full-scale review of the economic situation, with particular reference to structural unemployment, as the basis for possible further recommendations to Congress for legislative action.

Among the subjects discussed within the Administration, he said, is the extent of recommendations which will be made to Congress for a permanent overhaul of the unemployment compensation system. This, he said, is in line with Kennedy's earlier statement that the recently enacted temporary extension of jobless benefits could not be considered a substitute for permanent improvements.

In another action, Goldberg announced appointment of a three-member Missile Site Public Contracts Advisory Committee to investigate the application of the Davis-Bacon Act to construction work at missile sites.

Named were Dr. Thomas Holland, professor of economics at George Washington University, and two well-known arbitrators, Lloyd Bailer and Peter Seitz, both of New York.

N.Y. Times Reprints Employment Series

The New York Times has made available in reprint form a series of four articles by its labor reporter, A. H. Raskin, on the problems of chronic unemployment.

The articles appeared in the Times of Apr. 6-9 and dealt with how automation affects chronic joblessness, what it does to people and what is being done about it.

ature climbs. But will it really improve?

"One thing is sure, however, the memories of this bitter winter recession weather, with growing unemployment in an ever-increasing number of industries and geographical areas, will not soon fade away.

"Certainly the official reports of the Dept. of Labor will reflect more people working and fewer people idle—just because the weather has improved. Those with jobs will be tempted to think the worst is over.

"But we in the labor movement must be more realistic.

"Even if the Dept. of Labor's figures are more favorable than expected, they will still show that some 65 out of every 1,000 American workers cannot find jobs. They will show a continuing "hard core" of close to 2 million workers who have been idle for 15 or more weeks. They will offer little indication that our economy can absorb an additional 1.25 million workers a year, on top of the undigested surplus we now have.

"Over the last decade we have failed to find jobs for a work-force that has increased by 800,000 a year. What will happen when the annual increase nearly doubles as it will shortly? What will happen as automation continues to put one button-pusher in the place of 50 or 500 wage earners?

"This is no academic problem. It is practical, immediate and universal. It concerns the proudest craftsman, smug in his conviction that no machine can touch him; for even if he's right, who will hire his skill? It concerns the most arrogant industrialist, sure he will be first with the best equipment; for who will buy his products? It concerns the most unworldly scientists, technicians or professional men, for they cannot survive without the backing of a prosperous community.

"The day has passed when we can have 'aristocrats' safe from the economic disaster of others. Unless our society works it will collapse; and it cannot work unless there is work for all

"There are no islands of security for the favored few, no economic bomb shelters for anyone. We are in this together; and together we must grope our way toward a real and lasting solution.

"The rising temperatures will not thaw our economic problem. Only thoughtful legislation, promptly enacted, can get the job started.

"And the Congress is not going to act unless it feels a sense of urgency. An aroused citizenry, demanding action from its representatives, is the answer for America today."

Labor Urges Race Ban End In Hospitals

Knoxville, Tenn.—The Knoxville Area AFL-CIO has called on area hospitals to open their doors to all patients and to all qualified doctors regardless of race.

Acting on information that church-affiliated hospitals have a policy of refusing to admit Negro patients or to allow Negro doctors to practice, the local central body adopted by unanimous vote a resolution urging equality of opportunity to those of all races.

Asserting that equal access to medical facilities is essential to the well-being of all citizens, the central labor council declared that the University of Tennessee's "limited and segregated facilities (except for obstetrics and pediatrics) are not adequate to the needs of the Negro population" or for good medical practice.

Big Breakthrough Won on Coverage

By Gene Zack

The Kennedy Administration and organized labor scored a historic breakthrough on minimum wage coverage as the 87th Congress voted to bring 3.6 million workers—most of them in retail and service trades—under wage-hour protection, and to raise the minimum, in steps, to $1.25.

Passage of the 1961 amendments—by a 64-28 vote in the Senate and a 230-196 vote in the House—marked the first time in the nearly quarter-century life of the Fair Labor Standards Act that its provisions were broadened to protect new groups of workers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany hailed the enactment of the "realistic improvements" as a "long step forward," and pledged that passage "is by no means the end of our efforts in behalf of the 'working poor.'"

The bill must be followed, he said, "by other strides toward the final elimination of starvation wages and sweatshop hours from all phases of American life." He singled out, in particular, the nation's laundry, hotel and restaurant workers, who he said "badly need" a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours.

For Pres. John F. Kennedy, in office 103 days, enactment of the bill was an impressive victory cancelling out an earlier setback sustained when the House in March rejected an Administration compromise and the conservative Republication-southern Democratic coalition rammed through what the AFL-CIO termed a "meaningless bill."

The new amendments will go into effect four months after the bill is signed by Kennedy. At that time, the minimum for those presently covered will go to $1.15, and the newly covered will start at $1 an hour.

Shot in Arm for Economy

The bill constitutes a shot in the arm for the ailing U.S. economy in its first year of operation, providing more than $500 million in added purchasing power at the lowest end of the economic ladder. It is estimated that of the 24 million presently covered, 1.9 million are receiving less than the new $1.15 minimum, and that 660,000 of the 3.6 million newly covered currently are below $1.

Here are highlights of the amendments:

Long-Term Idle Set New High

By Robert B. Cooney

Unemployment in April remained at a "relatively high plateau" for the fifth straight month, the government has reported, while the number of long-term jobless spurted upward to a postwar record high.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg released a summary job report showing that unemployment declined seasonally by 500,000 to a total of 5 million, but that the number was "still 1.3 million higher than a year ago."

"The seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment — 6.8 percent in April — showed no significant change" from March figures, the report said. This rate means 68 of every 1,000 Americans in the labor force were looking for work and could not find it.

The AFL-CIO said the April job report leaves no room for "complacency" about the health of the economy. The federation said the jobless totals underscore AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's warning against undue optimism because of the usual spring pick-up and added that "solving America's unemployment problem must be the Number One task before Congress."

Seymour Wolfbein, Labor Dept. manpower expert, told reporters that even with the seasonal improvement "this was the fifth con-

'Work' Laws Harm States, Officials Say

By David L. Perlman

Commissioners of labor in so-called "right-to-work" states have warned that laws banning the union shop may stunt the industrial growth of the states that enact them and damage both workers and fair-minded employers.

The views of state officials best equipped to judge "work" laws were put on public record for the first time as a result of a survey conducted by Maine's Commissioner of Labor & Industry, Marion E. Martin.

Miss Martin, in testimony before the Joint House-Senate Labor Committee of the Maine legislature, said that only two of the 17 labor commissioners replying to her questionnaire felt that "right-to-work" laws had accomplished "some good" in their states.

This mild approval from commissioners in Virginia and Florida contrasted with a damning indictment of "work" laws by labor commissioners of Arkansas, Indiana, Iowa, Nebraska, Nevada and Tennessee, and by the former labor commissioner of Florida.

In nine other states Miss Martin told the legislature, the labor commissioners said the effect of the "work" laws was uncertain either because constitutional provisions had never been implemented by statute or because the laws have been in effect only a short time.

At Special Convention:

Job Security Goal Set by Auto Union

By Eugene A. Kelly

Detroit—Jobs for the auto industry's unemployed workers and greater security for the employed will be the major targets of the Auto Workers in this summer's negotiations with auto employers.

Nearly 2,000 delegates from more than 1,000 local unions endorsed, at a special bargaining convention here, a program giving negotiators great flexibility in details but spelling out clear goals for new contracts with General Motors, Ford, Chrysler and other auto makers.

"We're not looking for a fight—we want solutions" to job insecurity, said UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, presiding at the three-day meeting.

The solution must be sought not only at the bargaining table but also in Congress and the state legislatures — and management must join labor, Reuther asserted, in meeting the problem of shrinking job opportunities.

The convention approved these major goals for negotiations starting in July:

- A reduction in work time by a variety of methods—shortening hours by the day, week or year, early retirement and longer vacations, or worker "sabbaticals," as paid leaves of absence. The program asks that all work time be paid for on a salary rather than an hourly wage basis.
- Preservation and improvement of present contract protections—basic wage rates, cost-of-living increases, productivity increases, supplemental benefit funds, pensions and health plans and overtime controls.

Citing the fact that the auto industry has increased production by 64.7 percent since 1947 with 5.7 percent fewer workers, the delegates listed various ways to meet the problem:

- Establishment of a national workweek adjustment fund fi-

Kennedy Unit Asks Action to Ease Automation Impact on Employment

A joint assault by government, industry and labor on the impact of automation is needed to solve the nation's "intolerable" unemployment situation, a tripartite Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy has reported to Pres. Kennedy.

Meeting in their second session at the White House, representatives of labor, management and the public reached unanimous agreement on a broad approach to achieving "full technological efficiency without significant and lasting unemployment."

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, chairman of the advisory committee, characterized the recommendation as a "significant first achievement."

The statement adopted by the committee—seven of whose members are drawn from the ranks of labor, seven from management, and seven representing the Administration and the public—declared pointedly that "with full employment the problems of adjustment to technological change are more easily solved; without it they can never be adequately met."

Its recommendations called specifically for:

- "Broad new retraining programs" by both government and private facilities to help workers displaced by automation and newcomers to the work force, to acquire new skills. In this regard, the advisory committee said, "unemployment compensation systems should encourage retraining programs."
- Development of "both government and private collective bargaining policy" that will permit movement of workers "with due recognition for the economic costs of moving and of retraining, the value of employe rights which have accumulated with service (e. g. pension and seniority), and the human factors involved."
- Establishment of more accurate yardsticks to measure the impact of technological change.
- Improvement of government

Long-Term Jobless Set Postwar Record

secutive month that unemployment has stayed at this relatively high plateau."

He stressed the trend among the long-term jobless—those out of work 15 weeks or longer.

The long-term jobless group usually increases by about 100,000 between March and April, he noted. This time it jumped by 266,000 to 2.1 million, a postwar record topping the previous peak of 1.9 million for the same month in the 1958 recession.

The number of long-term jobless has doubled in four months.

The figures showed a monthly average of 956,000 for 1960 and a total of 1 million last December.

Jobless in Canada at 11.1 Percent Level

Ottawa, Ont.—Canada's March unemployment statistics showed a drop of 14,000 from the February peak of 719,000 out of work, the first decrease in nearly a year but still leaving a total sharply higher than the level of 1960.

In mid-March 705,000 were jobless — 11.1 percent of the labor force, compared to 9.8 percent in March 1960.

There was a wide variation in unemployment rates. In the first three months of the year the national average was 11 percent, but 33 percent of all laborers were without jobs and 30 percent of construction workers.

The unemployment rate for transportation workers was 17 percent and for service workers 7.5 percent. Only 3.5 percent of professional and office workers were jobless.

Since then, the average jumped to 1.3 million in January, to 1.6 million in February, to 1.9 million in March and to 2.1 million in April.

Those bearing the brunt of long-term unemployment, Wolfbein said, are "the unemployed older workers, the Negro, the people in the goods-producing industries, especially manufacturing, and the unskilled workers."

900,000 Out 6 Months

"Among the long-term unemployed," the report observed, "were 900,000 without jobs for more than half a year."

The number of those jobless 27 weeks or longer increased by 122,000 from March to a total of 923,000 in April; there were 500,000 in this group in April 1960.

The summary, with a more detailed report due May 11, showed employment edging up to 65.7 million in April. This was 400,000 below a year ago.

The report said non-farm employment rose seasonally by 200,000 to a total of 60.7 million.

Agricultural employment, however, remained "stock still" at about 5 million, Wolfbein said, when a rise of about 500,000 had been expected. He said this was attributed to "a very wet season" which delayed planting.

Asked to forecast unemployment figures, Wolfbein said that if only seasonal influences obtained, the jobless total would show 4.7 million in May, 5.5 million in June with the influx of students into the work force, 5.1 million in July and 4.5 million in August.

Air Line Employes Sign Cunard Pact

Chicago—The Air Line Employes and Cunard Eagle Airways (Bermuda) have signed a first agreement giving cargo agents wages up to $450 a month.

The union is affiliated with the AFL-CIO through the Air Line Pilots. The air line serves New York, Miami, Nassau and Bermuda.

Victor J. Herbert, union president, said the agreement also provides improved vacation benefits, guaranteed sick leave, severance pay, shift differentials, uniform allowances, the union shop and the checkoff. The initial contract expires Dec. 7.

In Joint Committee's Eyes:

U. S. Economy Seen Running 'Fast Enough to Stand Still'

By Saul Miller

A grim picture of the American economy running "only fast enough to stand still" in 1961 and facing a high level of unemployment by the end of 1962 has been painted by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

The prospect of a 6 to 7 percent rate of unemployment at the end of 1961, the majority of the committee declared, is based on the assumption of prompt enactment of Pres. Kennedy's legislative program and "substantial increase in expenditures by state and local governments."

The majority report of the joint House-Senate group called for additional action in a number of fields, with top priority directed toward reducing long-term interest rates and programs for aiding and retraining job-displaced workers.

The committee specifically called for a Treasury Dept. review of the tax structure "with a view to recommending a downward revision of taxes—not a temporary tax cut—and that it make further periodic reviews for the same purpose every five years."

A Republican minority and a Democratic senator dissented from the majority views, the GOP members declaring that the country is recovering from the 1960-61 recession with "little direct help from the government" and expressing skepticism that "greater federal investment in education, health, housing, research and resources development will accelerate the nation's long-term economic growth."

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) said he dissented with reluctance but felt that the report "underestimates two big economic problems facing America. . . . the enormity of the unemployment dilemma in its full long-term significance . . . [and] neither the Administration nor this report has even come close to providing the answer . . ."

Gap Seen Widening

The majority report said that while the recession is at a "turning point," the most optimistic forecasts indicate that the "gap between the nation's production and its capabilities to produce could widen" in 1961. Present indications of the scope of recovery from the recession point to increased output of only 2 to 3 percent by the end of 1961, the report said, adding:

"An economic recovery of such magnitude will not wipe out the employment deficits of the past year, nor at best do more than keep pace with the nation's growing labor force."

'Staggering' Losses

Economic losses in 1960 the report termed "staggering." If unemployment during the year had been maintained at 4 percent instead of the actual rate of 5.6 percent there would have been an increase in output of $30 to $35 billion. The loss of this output, the majority said, is equal to $500 per American household.

The production gap has been widening, the report warned, and at the level of unemployment "prevailing at the end of the first quarter of 1961, our current production gap is about $50 billion annually."

As a first step toward economic recovery and growth, the committee recommended prompt enactment of the Kennedy program. In addition it called for:

- Federal Reserve monetary policies to help reduce unemployment to a 4 percent rate by bringing down long-term interest rates. This would include having the FRB abandon its "bills only" policy and invest substantially in long-term government securities, supply member banks with greater reserves and lower the discount rate.
- Legislation to provide, for a limited time, federal grants on a matching basis to local communities for public works projects that can be started within 90 days and finished in 12 months.
- A program for large-scale retraining of workers, and where necessary relocating them, including a new kind of "GI Bill" available to all workers who are displaced by technological improvements and incentives to business firms to establish schools to retrain workers about to be displaced. Also, permanent liberalization of the unemployment insurance system and coordination of state employment agencies into an "effective national system."
- Development of retirement and recreational areas for retired workers.
- More flexible private pension systems.
- Creation of a capital bank for municipal securities to reduce the interest burden on state and local governments.
- A federal capital budget.
- Accelerated enforcement of the anti-trust laws and budgets for the anti-trust enforcement agencies which "are more realistically related to the magnitude of the tasks . . ."

Regulations Due Soon On U.S. Job Bias Ban

Proposed rules and regulations will be issued shortly for carrying out Pres. Kennedy's executive order prohibiting employment discrimination in government contracts, representatives of management and labor have been informed.

Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, chairman and vice chairman respectively of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, met May 2 with 48 of the nation's 50 largest defense contractors and on May 3 with 39 labor spokesmen.

Reporting on the meeting with corporation executives, Johnson said that the businessmen expressed no objection to the executive order and indicated no insuperable difficulty arising from it.

Goldberg said that 39 union representatives, including AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and eight other members of the federation's Executive Council, pledged the desire and intention of cooperating in carrying out the non-discrimination directive.

The proposed rules and regulations, Johnson said, would be issued for scrutiny and a public hearing will be held before they are made final. Goldberg and Johnson emphasized that the President's committee will not function as a "policing" agency in the field of employment discrimination.

The greatest possible reliance will be placed on persuasion, education and conciliation, they said, in seeking to eliminate cases of discrimination because of race, creed or color in government employment and government contracts.

Sanctions provided in the President's executive order nevertheless will be used "whenever the circumstances require," the Vice President and the Secretary said. Such sanctions include cancellation of contracts, public hearings and recommendations to the Justice Dept. for possible court action.

GE's Officers Declare Ignorance of Price-Fix

General Electric's top officials have flatly denied—to the Kefauver Anti-Trust subcommittee and to the company's stockholders—that they knew that high-ranking GE officials were conspiring with competitors to fix prices and divide up businesss.

Robert Paxton, president of GE during the height of the conspiracy, told the Kefauver subcommittee that he must have been "pretty damn dumb" but he didn't know what was going on. Paxton, who said his salary last year was "roughly $300,000," recently announced he was retiring as president because of ill health.

His denial contradicted earlier testimony by a former GE vice president, George E. Burens, who said Paxton had suggested that he meet with competitors "and do business with them."

At the annual stockholders' meeting in Syracuse, N. Y., GE Board Chairman Ralph J. Cordiner said he "did not know" about the price-fixing. He said he had ordered two investigations of himself by attorneys inside and outside the company which he implied cleared him of taint.

GE management, which went into the meeting with proxies guaranteeing them solid control, easily defeated a series of motions by Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers which called for:

- An impartial investigation into the question of whether management had known and approved of the price-fixing conspiracy.
- Court action to recover bonuses paid by GE to officials convicted in the anti-trust cases.
- Dismissal of all employes involved in price-fixing, now and in the future.
- Civil damage suits against those responsible for GE's violation of the anti-trust law.

Carey, who voted 25 shares of GE stock held by the IUE pension fund, and two women representing an association of small shareholders were heckled by catcalls and shouts of "throw them out" as they addressed the meeting.

Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) said that transcripts of testimony at the Senate hearings are being sent to the Justice Dept. for consideration of possible perjury action. In addition to Paxton, GE Vice Pres. Arthur F. Vinson has denied under oath testimony linking him to price-fixing.

The denials of both Paxton and Vinson were backed by testimony of William S. Ginn, the highest-ranking GE official sentenced for price-fixing. Ginn said the only company official higher than himself who took part in the conspiracy was a vice president who has since died.

Paxton, in his testimony, admitted that he had come across instances of price-fixing in the company as far back as the 1930's but said he thought it had been stamped out.

In 1950, he said, Ginn admitted to him discussing prices with competitors. He said he had called Ginn a "damned fool" but did not report the incident to Cordiner.

He conceded, in response to a question from Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), that in his own mind there was a distinction between violations of anti-trust laws and other criminal behavior such as stealing.

Supreme Court Rules:

Job Freeze Denied In Railroad Merger

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that rail workers are entitled to wage protection, but not to job protection, for a maximum four-year period following a railroad merger.

In an 8-to-1 decision, the high court turned down a union appeal seeking to block the merger of the Erie Railroad with the Deleware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad. The Maintenance of Way Employes and the Railway Labor Executives' Association had contended that protection provided employes under the terms of merger did not meet legal requirements of the Transportation Act of 1940.

At issue was interpretation of a section of the law which requires that merger agreements between railroads protect employes from "being in a worse position with respect to their employment" for a period equal to their accumulated seniority but not exceeding four years.

The Interstate Commerce Commission and the railroads argued that this requirement was met by a provision that discharged employes be paid their former salaries for four years, less what they may make in other employment. The unions contended that the language of the law protected workers against dismissal.

In a dissent from the majority ruling, Justice William O. Douglas commented that the legislative history of the law—so far as determining the intent of Congress at the time—is "at best, ambiguous." He said he "would resolve the ambiguity in favor of the employes."

He added:

"The toll which economic and technological changes will make on employes is so great that they, rather than the capital which they have created, should be the beneficiaries of any doubts that overhang these legislative controversies when they are shifted to the courts."

Chief Justice Earl Warren, speaking for the majority, wrote that the unions had not protested other mergers in past years providing similar wage protection.

He said the court is "unwilling to overturn a long-standing administrative interpretation of a statute, acquiesced in by all interested parties for 20 years, when all the sign-posts of congressional intent . . . indicate that the administrative interpretation is correct."

Warren, discussing the law's legislative history, pointed out that a House-passed provision clearly prohibiting railroad mergers that would "result in unemployment or displacement of employes" was changed before final passage.

He said that to assume that the present language prohibits dismissal of employes as a result of a merger, "it would be necessary to say that a substantial change in phraseology was made for no purpose."

The chief justice also said that on one occasion in the past the RLEA itself had argued that the law did not impose a mandatory job freeze.

Death Rate at New High Among Fire Fighters

The 1960 death rate among fire fighters reached a new high for recent years, a survey of the record has revealed.

The death and injury list, compiled in 1,200 communities by the Research Dept. of the Fire Fighters, showed that 68 per 100,000 were killed in the line of duty during the past year, compared to 66 per 100,000 the previous year. In 1958, 37 per 100,000 lost their lives, and in 1957 the toll was 54 killed per 100,000.

The survey also revealed that 21 out of every 100 fire fighters suffered injuries in the line of duty. This compares to the general injury rate of workers of 3 of 100.

The survey showed that hazards facing fire fighters are becoming greater as science and technologies advance.

It has been reported that more than 45 radiation releases have occurred through fire or explosion in the United States since 1955. The number of industrial plants using radioactive materials has mushroomed to 6,700. Construction techniques are also making fire-fighting more difficult, and the increasing density of traffic flowing through city streets poses as a particular hazard to fire fighters.

Other causes of death and injury were burns, asphyxiation, structural collapses, electrical shock, heart attacks from over-exertion and accidents due to false alarms.

Injuries stemmed from multiple factors, including collisions, falls, smoke inhalation, falling objects, sprains and strains, flying glass and metal, burns, ascending and descending ladders, nails, etc.

With the 1960 death rate among American workers established at 22 per 100,000, the Fire Fighters' study revealed that its members sustained three times as many deaths as the average worker.

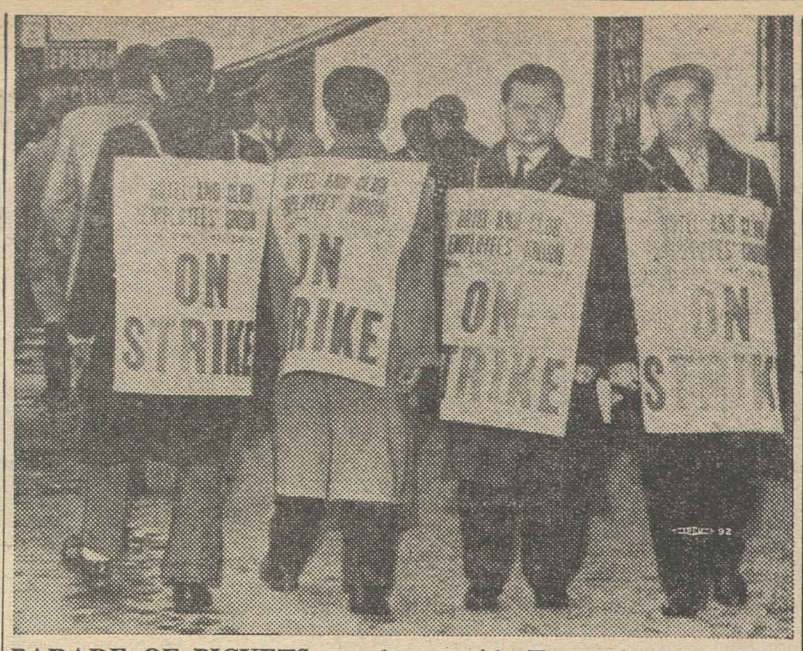
"Although the firefighting profession is considered and recognized as extremely hazardous, it is imperative that all safety measures be carefully observed and every possible means initiated to reduce the number of deaths and disabling injuries to fire fighters," Pres. William D. Buck of the union said in a message to all affiliates.

"It is of deep concern that many fire department personnel rosters are not brought up to full strength. One man can hardly be expected to do the work of two and three men at a fire without proportionately increasing the possibility of his death or injury.

"Officials in many communities, too, must come to the realization that fire fighters must be supplied with proper and adequate protective clothing and equipment."

In the United States, fire fighters were killed in the line of duty in Baltimore, Buffalo, Chicago, Denver, New York, St. Louis, San Antonio, Meridan, Conn.; Champaign, Evansville and Rock Island, Ill.; Davenport and Des Moines, Ia.; Louisville, Ky.; Portland, Me.; Lynn, Mass.; Madison Heights, Mich.; Manchester, N.H.; Hoboken and New Brunswick, N.J.; Auburn, N.Y.; Akron and Bucyrus, O.; Albany, Ore.; and Lancaster, Pa.

Canadian fire fighters were killed in Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, New Westminster, B. C.; Prince George, B. C.; Halifax, N. S.; Scarborough, Ont.; and York Township, Ont.



PARADE OF PICKETS marches outside Toronto's Royal York Hotel, largest in the British commonwealth and scene of many labor conventions. Management has hired many strikebreakers to replace 1,200 members of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes who struck after last-ditch negotiations for a new contract failed.

Hotel Walkout Ends 29 Years of Peace

Toronto, Ont.—The Royal York Hotel, host to hundreds of labor conventions including the founding sessions of the Canadian Labor Congress, has launched a hard drive to crush the first strike in its 29-year history.

The first pickets of Local 299 of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes were hardly in front of the giant hotel on Apr. 24 when management gave the signal to start a smoothly functioning strike-breaking machine that takes advantage of every legal protection.

The hotel, which introduced a 2.5-cent hourly raise to new employes after being deadlocked with the union for eight months on a new contract, has hired 750 strike-breakers to try to keep the 1,600-room hostelry operating.

The Royal York, which enjoys tax concessions because it is railway-owned (Canadian Pacific), also offered the strikers the 2.5 cents raise. The union had bargained for a total of 10-cents-an-hour increase spread across 33 months.

The trump card for the hotel has been a tunnel connecting its lower lobby with a railway station across the street.

Because the tunnel is claimed to be on private property, it has not yet been picketed and the hotel has set up an employment office in the station to recruit some of Toronto's 55,000 jobless to break the strike.

Two major international unions have already wired the hotel that they will cancel convention reservations if the strike is not settled. The Toronto Labor Council, which holds a $5,000 Labor Day dinner annually in the hotel, has also warned it will go elsewhere.

The strike cost the hotel a prominent Canadian political leader when Saskatchewan Premier T. C. (Tommy) Douglas, the man expected to lead the labor-sponsored New Party, checked out rather than cross a picket line.

Irish playwright Brendan Behan refused to enter, saying he would rather sleep outside in midwinter than help break a strike. Actors Sir Laurence Olivier and Sir Cedric Hardwicke checked out.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corp. dropped two radio shows originating at the hotel.

The 1,200 strikers have laughed off claims by the Royal York that its service is "normal."

"You can bet that it is not," smiled Archie Johnstone, Canadian vice president of the striking union.

The strikers predicted that they will win the walkout with the dignity of their members—"the same dignity that made the Royal York famous."

The sudden break in more than a generation of labor peace is attributed by experts to a warning shot by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The CPR faces a possible Canada-wide strike May 16 by its non-operating railway employes. The Royal York's challenge to its hotel union members is considered by railway labor leaders to amount to a show of force.

Local 299 has started a court test challenging the claim that the tunnel is private property. The union contends it is a public passage and can be picketed in an orderly manner to convey information to hotel guests and to members of the union.

Rail Unions Set Program On Legislation

The Railway Labor Executives' Association has adopted a legislative program aimed at strengthening the nation's railroad system and providing greater safety for employes and the public.

The federation of 23 rail brotherhoods:

- Urged congressional action to suspend temporarily the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to approve railroad mergers while Congress studies the effect of recent mergers.
- Asked passage of legislation which would close "loopholes" in the 1958 Transportation Act allowing railroads to discontinue passenger trains.
- Endorsed legislation authorizing federal loans for extension of commuter transportation facilities.
- Opposed legislation which would require railroads to raise their rates for "piggyback" transportation of truck trailer units.

CWA Wins Vote In New England

Boston — The Communications Workers have won their first representation election in the operating company field in New England, scoring a National Labor Relations Board victory involving 149 direct advertising salesmen of New England Telephone & Telegraph Co.

The CWA defeated an unaffiliated guild in the election, scoring 83 votes to 62 for the guild, with 4 not voting.

New England Telephone operates in Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

N. Y. Teachers Get Help In Organizing

New York—Support of all AFL-CIO unions in helping Teachers Local 2 win bargaining rights for almost 40,000 New York City teachers has been asked by the city central labor council.

Council Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., in letters to affiliates, said union teachers have exhausted their resources in trying to organize in nearly 900 schools and need immediate financial contributions. The local, known here as the United Federation of Teachers, has collected and spent $14,000 more than its dues income in a three-year campaign, Van Arsdale said.

"This is one election the UFT cannot afford to lose," the letter asserted. "Our children deserve union teachers."

A date for an election, probably in June, will be set if the Board of Education approves a report by a five-member collective bargaining commission. The report is expected this month.

Meanwhile more than 12,000 teachers have signed "unity" petitions urging merger of the UFT with elementary and secondary teachers' associations and arbitration of unresolved salary issues. The UFT staged a walkout Nov. 7 and 8 in protest against unresolved grievances, including the date of a bargaining election.

44 Cement Firms Face Strike Action

Chicago—Forty-four cement companies face a walkout unless they end a "sitdown" strike and begin bargaining with representatives of their 20,000 workers, Pres. Felix C. Jones of the Cement Workers has warned.

The union has signed one big contract and is willing to accept similar terms with other companies, but eastern employers led by the Portland Cement Association are "dragging their feet," Jones charged.

On advice of the union, all members remained at work after May 1, expiration date of most contracts.

The Dundee Cement Co., Dundee, Mich., contract provides for wage increases totaling 30 cents an hour over a two-year period. The contract also calls for improved vacations, an eighth paid holiday, improved health and welfare benefits, and other improvements.

Bargaining in the industry has been conducted mainly on a plant-by-plant basis. The union has called this "endless circle" bargaining, dominated by eastern employers who want no contract changes except possibly a small wage increase in spite of high 1960 profits.

IAM Research Director Dies

Carl Hundorff, 56, for 15 years research director for the Machinists, died May 3 at his Lewisdale, Md., home after an illness of several months.

A native of San Antonio, Tex., he had been an IAM member for 25 years, and formerly was recording secretary of his local lodge in Port Arthur, Tex., and president of his district lodge.

Hundorff came to Washington in 1943 as assistant research director for the IAM and became head of the department three years later.

During World War II he was an AFL representative on several labor advisory committees in the War Production Board, and was on the health and welfare committee of the Wage Stabilization Board during the Korean War.

He is survived by his wife and two sons.

PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM to stimulate economy and halt upward spiral of unemployment, proposed in letter to Pres. John F. Kennedy, is discussed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on Labor News Conference, new AFL-CIO public affairs radio program carried on Mutual Broadcasting System Sundays at 4:35 p. m., EST. Interviewers were Joseph Gambatese (center), associate editor of Nation's Business, magazine published by U.S. Chamber of Commerce; and Alan Adams (right), Washington labor reporter for Business Week, a McGraw-Hill publication. Harry Flannery (back to camera), AFL-CIO radio coordinator, was program's moderator.

Meany Letter to Kennedy:

Public Works Urged To Spur Economy

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, declaring that the nation's unemployment rate "continues to remain at an intolerable level," has proposed to Pres. John F. Kennedy a three-pronged multi-billion-dollar public works program as a major stimulus to economic growth.

In an interview on Labor News Conference, a new AFL-CIO public affairs radio program carried by Mutual Broadcasting System Sundays at 4:35 p.m., EST, Meany said the proposals were set forth in a personal letter to the President.

Meany proposed:

- A $1 billion emergency federal grant-in-aid program to help accelerate construction of local public works projects already authorized.
- Increased federal loans for state and local public facilities, with particular attention to hard-pressed local governments during periods of excessive unemployment.
- Authority for the President to transfer $2 billion of funds appropriated for Executive Departments to accelerate substantially federal and federally-assisted public projects already authorized.

In addition, Meany asked Kennedy to give consideration to other AFL-CIO proposals "to alleviate continuing serious unemployment problems," including a temporary income tax reduction, a "more vigorous effort" to reduce interest rates, and a maximum 4.5 percent rate on federally-guaranteed home mortgages.

In the radio interview, Meany called unemployment the nation's "most urgent domestic problem," and declared that "it's quite obvious from the constant recurring recessions that there is something basically wrong with the economy."

He urged the President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy, of which he is a member, to study the problem of continued high joblessness. Finding an answer to continued high unemployment, he said, is "the employers' problem, the government's problem, as well as labor's problem."

The federation president was questioned on Labor News Conference by Joseph Gambatese, associate editor of Nation's Business, a magazine published by the U. S. Chamber of Commerce; and Alan Adams, Washington labor reporter for Business Week, a McGraw-Hill publication.

In response to a question, Meany emphasized that organized labor is not opposed to automation but only to "the economic consequences of it." America, he said, "just can't afford to have this growing residue of unemployment."

He pointed out that there were 3 million jobless at the start of the 1953 recession, and that the level was higher at the beginning of each of the succeeding two economic downturns.

"Is the next recession going to start from about 7 million unemployed?" he asked.

If the upward trend continues, the AFL-CIO president pointed out, in a few years 10 percent of the nation's work force will be permanently unemployed. "We can't afford to have 10 percent," he declared. "The political and social consequences would be drastic."

Meany said there was need for a study of the ability of American industry, and particularly the steel manufacturers, to operate at a profit while running at only 40 percent of capacity. He declared pointedly that "the American worker and the American worker's children can't remain healthy eating 40 percent of the time."

In a statement accompanying his letter to Kennedy, Meany pointed out that last January the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged "the immediate speedup of public construction to help counteract unemployment and business stagnation." In February, he said, the council applauded Kennedy's Economic Message pledging an acceleration of construction programs.

"Unfortunately," the federation president declared, "despite the fact that the unemployment rate continues to remain at an intolerable level, Congress has not acted. Furthermore, the prospect for an adequate increase in public works outlays is not reassuring."

On the subject of federal grants for state and local projects, Meany pointed out that Congress has already provided funds for the planning of a substantial shelf of such projects but has failed to act on legislation to help finance construction of these standby programs.

Clark, Kefauver Bills Praised

Meany praised measures introduced by Senators Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) which would accelerate public works projects.

"Today, America suffers from vast unmet public facility needs," Meany told the President. "At the same time, there are hundreds of thousands of idle workers who should now be engaged in public construction and in producing the steel, cement and other materials required for these projects.

"This nation can no longer afford to tolerate the needless human want, the wasted skills and the ignored social needs which continued failure to utilize public works acceleration as a countercyclical tool perpetuates."

Advisory Unit Calls For Action To Ease Impact of Automation

employment services "to meet the new and different demands of worker displacement as part of a technological revolution."

- Recognition that, in the months ahead, unemployment will arise "with special seriousness" among new entries to the work force, unskilled employes, older workers, minority groups and in the depressed areas.

In a press briefing, Goldberg told reporters it was the "unanimous view" that unemployment compensation systems should be "so geared that a person should not have to . . . leave a retraining program" in the middle of it. He pointed out that under present state jobless insurance laws, workers have to accept job offers or lose unemployment benefits.

The committee, Goldberg said, felt that for workers on retraining programs, the invocation of this rule "would be highly undesirable."

Before drafting its automation statement, the advisory body received working papers from three economists: Dr. Seymour L. Wolfbein, director of the Labor Dept. Office of Automation & Manpower; Stanley H. Ruttenberg, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research; and Curry W. Gillmore, director of statistics and economics for Intl. Business Machine Corp.

Goldberg stressed that the papers represented "the views of these three men individually" and did not "purport to be industry views, labor views, government views, on the topic of automation and unemployment."

As he did on the occasion of the tripartite group's first organizational meeting, Kennedy met with the committee for about 20 minutes before it began its deliberations. Goldberg said the President "stressed again the urgency of the committee's work in light of both our domestic problems and our foreign problems."

The Secretary said he had been asked to state that "the sense of urgency which the President imparted is shared by the entire committee."

The advisory committee is scheduled to meet again June 5 to deal with what Goldberg called the "essential question" of how to achieve general prosperity and the "highest practicable rate of overall economic growth" as a barrier against unemployment.

In advance of the next meeting, the Council of Economic Advisers —in conjunction with the Labor, Commerce and Treasury Depts.— will submit a working paper presenting the Administration's views. Goldberg said he would designate a six-member subcommittee to review the document and submit written comments to the other committee members.

New Party Chiefs Offer Proposed Constitution

Ottawa, Ont.—A proposed constitution for the New Party, based on hundreds of suggestions offered in response to an appeal, has been made public by the National Committee for the New Party.

The document will be the basic working paper for the founding convention scheduled for the week of July 31 in Ottawa, and is subject to amendment from the floor, with ultimate approval or rejection by the convention.

The New Party is a political grouping advanced by organized labor, the existing Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and Liberals. It would function in competiton with the long-established Canadian parties — the Liberals and the Progressive Conservatives who now control the federal government.

The proposed New Party constitution provides for a democratic structure which is rare in a political organization and unique in Canadian politics. Its highlights include:

- Vesting of control of party policy in a national convention every two years, and in the interim in an 82-man national council, 50 of whose members would be chosen by provincial conventions.
- A large measure of autonomy for provincial parties.
- Provisions for democratic affiliation of trade unions and other organizations, including the right to "contract out" for any member who does not want to contribute to the New Party.
- Election of a national leader, who shall act as leader in Parliament, by convention; also, convention election of a president, associate president, secretary, treasurer and five vice presidents.
- Setting of dues at $2.50 for individuals and 60 cents a year for affiliated members.

The New Party was not given a name in the draft constitution. A committee spokesman said the name would be dealt with separately.

Ontario Machinists Support New Party

Toronto, Ont.—The Ontario Machinists Council, composed of 26 lodges in the province, at its first constitutional conference formally endorsed the New Party, in which organized labor and the existing cooperative Commonwealth Federation are uniting.

Veteran Housing Leader Retires

Boston—John Carroll, veteran labor leader deemed by some "the father of public housing in the U.S.", has resigned as a commissioner of the Boston Housing Authority because of ill health.

He had served longer on a housing authority than any other person in the country, having been a member of the Boston unit since its inception in 1935 and chairman for five years. He also was a member of the State Board of Housing for eight years, five of them as chairman.

Coincident with his resignation from the housing authority, he also retired as business agent of Cement Masons' local 534 of Boston. During his 45 years as a labor leader Carroll served as president of the Boston and Massachusetts Building Trades Councils and vice president of the former Massachusetts Federation of Labor.

Situs Bills Referred by House Unit

A House Labor subcommittee, dividing along party lines, has voted to report all situs-picketing measures to the full committee without recommendation.

The three Democrats on the subcommittee headed by Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) favored the action; the two Republicans opposed it.

Included among the measures sent to the full committee were the bill by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), backed by the AFL-CIO and the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept.; and another measure sponsored by Rep. Elmer Holland (D-Pa.), endorsed by the Industrial Union Dept.

The goal of situs picketing legislation is to overturn a National Labor Relations Board ruling, sustained by the Supreme Court, that picketing of one employer at a multi-employer job site constitutes an illegal secondary boycott if it induces workers of other employers to refrain from working.

Ailing Botkin Back On Job at IWA

Portland, Ore.—Sec.-Treas. William Botkin of the Woodworkers has returned to his office at IWA headquarters here after a five-week hospital stay. During treatment for a slipped disc, he supervised many of the activities of his office from a bedside telephone.

nanced by a small payroll tax on employers—a 1 percent figure was suggested by Reuther.

- Creation of an automation fund by management to pay the cost of relocating workers and their families, and maintaining them during retraining.
- Higher pensions from company-financed plans and from social security funds.

'30-40-60' Plan Dropped

By a standing vote, the convention dropped discussion of the "30-40-60" plan sponsored by delegates from 15 locals who wanted to direct negotiators specifically to demand a 30-hour week with 40 hours of pay, and retirement on full pension and full social security at 60.

The "30-40-60" supporters carried their campaign to the delegates with signs and demonstrations. Reuther called for an informal straw vote on instructing the resolutions committee, but fewer than 10 percent of the delegates registered their support.

Reuther hailed the convention program as one which would give union bargainers the widest possible scope to meet any management proposal. He characterized the '30-40-60' program as "too narrow."

"It takes away the flexibility we need," he said. "I want that and many other things in our set of tools."

Spelling out its goals in detail, the resolution on bargaining included these provisions:

Salaries for All—The convention said the system of employment by the hour is "obsolete, uneconomic, irresponsible and unjust," and forces one group, the "blue collar" workers, to "bear the brunt of the insecurities of our economy."

The hourly worker "cannot hibernate in bad economic weather—he has to live in good times and bad. The landlord expects his rent on schedule. The finance companies, however friendly, will not reduce payments to match a three-day paycheck, or no paycheck at all," the report said.

Wages—Workers are entitled to assurance that they will share "fully and fairly in the increasing abundance" of a machine economy. The present 2.5 percent annual improvement factor is "grossly inadequate" and the cost-of-living escalator table out of date.

"The UAW serves notice now," the convention said, "that it will permit no tampering with the basic principles" of the cost-of-living and annual improvement factor formulas under which union members for years have been protected.

Short-Time Weeks—Saying that the short-time week is management's responsibility, the convention said the ultimate remedy lies in salaried status, with the details to be worked out by a union-management committee. In the meantime, the resolution called for expansion of the supplementary unemployment benefits plan to make up for wages lost in short workweeks.

Full-Week Layoffs—Saying that SUB plans negotiated in 1955 and 1958 represented a great advance, the convention declared they nevertheless "deny protection entirely to many laid-off workers and their families," and must be improved.

Displaced Workers—The "Okie of the 1960s" whose plant has been closed or sold, or whose job has been automated, needs help. The convention cited several European countries which help displaced workers. Reuther named Sweden, which pays all costs of moving a worker and his family and retraining the worker for a new job—"that's the civilized way to do it," he said.

Contracting Out—The convention said subcontracting of work to employers outside the plant is a bargaining problem. It charged that some employers have "pirated" work by paying lower wages for work performed outside the UAW bargaining unit.

Production Standards—The convention reaffirmed its opposition to all forms of speedup or the imposition of an unreasonable work pace, and insisted that "management negotiate with us adequate protections."

Retirement—The delegates called for higher pension benefits to meet rising living costs; survivor rights in pensions for a worker's widow; vested pension rights for workers who are severed from their jobs by plant movings. They asked management to work out with the union methods of investing pension funds in low-cost housing and similar projects.

Health Care—Calling for better health care plans, the convention said satisfactory solutions have been hampered by the fact that our present medical system "is not organized to provide, and the reactionary forces in the medical profession continue to resist providing," what workers need.

Flexible Workweek—The convention said the standard workweek should be automatically raised or lowered when needed by contract agreements plant by plant, or company by company. If a change in the wage-hour law is needed, the union said management should join in seeking changes.

The UAW financial report showed $52.9 million in UAW resources, including $34.6 million in the strike fund, and liabilities of $389,729. Average dues-paying membership was just over 1 million for the first three months of 1961.

Veto Kills Bill Delaying Fire Safety

Albany, N. Y.—Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R) has vetoed a bill which would have permitted owners of potential firetrap buildings to delay installing water sprinklers for up to a year. The governor said the law already gives adequate safeguards to landlords.

Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers commended Rockefeller for refusing to sign "such a regressive bill." A statewide ILGWU campaign against the measure was launched when Dubinsky, at a memorial service in New York City for 146 workers who died in the 1911 Triangle Shirtwaist Co. fire, urged its defeat, as did Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, Frances Perkins, and others.

The bill would have postponed the effective date of the Abrams Act from July 1, 1960, to Apr. 1, 1962.

The Abrams Act, passed after a fire killed 24 Monarch Garment workers in 1958, tightens safety regulations in industrial buildings.

Harvard Honors BRT President

Boston—Pres. W. P. Kennedy of the Railroad Trainmen has been honored by the Alumni Association of the Harvard University Trade Union Program for "outstanding achievements" in service to the labor movement.

In accepting the citation of merit award from Joseph P. O'Donnell, executive director of the program, Kennedy emphasized the need for a strong labor movement militantly conscious of its stake in Congress."

Negro Fight Against Segregation Finds Inspiration in Labor's Past

The following is excerpted from an address by the Rev. Martin Luther King, delivered at the 25th anniversary dinner of the Auto Workers.

Organized labor has come a long way from the days of the strike-breaking injunctions of federal courts, from the days of intimidation and firings in the plants, from the days that your union leaders could be physically beaten with impunity. The clubs and the claws of the heartless anti-labor forces have been clipped and you now have organizations of strength and intelligence to keep your interests from being submerged and ignored. This is the glorious meaning of your anniversary.

Negroes who are now but beginning their march from the dark crypt of segregation can gain from you real inspiration and encouragement for the hard road still ahead. But though we have a multitude of problems absorbing almost every moment of our time and consuming almost every ounce of our energies, we cannot be unmindful of new problems confronting labor.

Perhaps few people can so well understand the problems of auto workers as Negroes because we built a cotton economy for 300 years as slaves on which the nation grew powerful, and we still lack the most elementary rights of citizens or workers. We too realize that when human values are subordinated to blind economic forces, human beings can become human scrap.

Our kinship was not born, however, with the rise of automation. In the birth of your organization as you confronted recalcitrant antagonists you forged new weapons appropriate to your fight. Thus, in the 30's, when industrial unionism sought recognition as a form of industrial democracy, there were powerful forces which said to you the same words as we Negroes hear now: "Never—you are not ready—you are really seeking to change our form of society—you are reds—you are trouble makers—you are stirring up discontent and discord where none exists—you are interfering with our property rights—you are captives of sinister elements who wish to exploit you."

Both of us have heard these reckless charges—both of us know that what we have sought were simple, basic needs without which no man is a whole person.

In your pursuit of these goals during the middle 30's, in part of your industry you creatively stood up for your rights by sitting down at your machines, just as our courageous students are sitting down at lunch counters across the South. They screamed at you that you were destroying property rights—but nearly 30 years later the ownership of the automobile industry is still in the hands of its stockholders and the value of its shares has multiplied manyfold, producing profits of awesome size.

We are proudly borrowing your techniques, and though the same old and tired threats and charges have been dusted off for us, we doubt that we shall collectivize a single lunch counter or nationalize the consumption of sandwiches and coffee.

There are more ties of kinship between labor and the Negro people than tradition. For example, labor needs a wage-hour bill which puts a firm floor under wage scales. Negroes need the same measures, even more desperately, for so many of us earn less than $1.25 per hour. Labor needs housing legislation to protect it as a consumer. Negroes need housing legislation. Labor needs an adequate old-age medical care bill and so do Negroes. The list might be extended ad infinitum, for it is axiomatic that what labor needs, Negroes need—and simple logic therefore puts us side by side in the struggle.

As we survey the problems of labor, from the chilling threat of automation to the needs in housing and social welfare generally, we confront the necessity to have a Congress responsive to liberal legislation. Here again the kinship of interest of labor and the Negro people expresses itself. Negroes need liberal congressmen if they are to realize equality and opportunity.

In these circumstances, the campaign for Negro suffrage is both a fulfillment of constitutional rights and a fulfillment of labor's needs in a fast-changing economy. We, the Negro people and labor, by extending the frontiers of democracy to the South, inevitably will sow the seeds of liberalism where reaction has flourished unchallenged for decades. A new day will dawn which will see militant, steadfast and reliable congressmen from the South joining those from the northern industrial states to design and enact legislation for the people rather than for the privileged.

When that day comes, the crippling fears of insecurity, the torments of frustration, and the doubts clouding our future will be transformed into confidence, into excitement to reach new goals, and in which the brotherhood of men will be undergirded by a secure and expanding prosperity available to all.

Broader Programs of Housing Renewal Urged by AFL-CIO

Pres. John F. Kennedy's $3.2 billion housing and urban renewal program represents "a forward-looking approach which has been sadly lacking in recent years," but Congress should broaden both "the scope of the program and its financing," the AFL-CIO has declared.

Testifying before a House Banking subcommittee headed by Rep. Albert Rains (D-Ala.), sponsor of the Administration bill, Boris Shishkin, chairman of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, called for "prompt action" to help put the nation "back on the road to economic prosperity and full employment" and to meet the housing needs of millions of Americans.

"Homes for American families and jobs for American workers must be the twin objectives in the housing legislation enacted in 1961," the federation spokesman declared.

The AFL-CIO called for these improvements in the Administration program:

- Authorization of $3 billion for the Federal National Mortgage Association's programs of cooperative housing, urban renewal housing and housing for the elderly, and for two proposed new programs for moderate-income families and home improvement.

The Rains Bill calls for only $750 million for these functions, a figure which Shishkin called "most inadequate." Assuming an average mortgage loan of only $10,000, he said this would permit construction or rehabilitation of only 75,000 housing units. "Obviously," he said, "this is not going to make a dent in the existing severe deficiency of housing for moderate-income families."

- Expansion of proposals to extend no-down-payment, 40-year FHA-insured mortgages to moderate-income families so that it will cover housing for sale, as well as rental and cooperative housing.
- Authorization for construction of 400,000 housing units, instead of the 100,000 asked by the Administration, to complete the public housing program envisioned in the Housing Act of 1949.

In asking for a quadrupled effort, the AFL-CIO pointed out that the 1949 law was intended to authorize construction of 810,000 low-rent housing units. "Hobbling limitations on the program," Shishkin said, "have held it to a snail's pace."

- A 10-year, $6.25 billion urban renewal program instead of the four-year, $2.5 billion program called for by the White House. This broadening of the program, labor said, would adhere to Kennedy's annual rate of $625 million for this program—a rate which the AFL-CIO called "the rock-bottom minimum required to launch a significant attack against urban blight and slums"—but would insure a longer-range program.
- Authorization of $450 million, instead of the Administration's request for $207 million, for loans under the proposed extension of the farm housing program.
- Additional authorization for the Secretary of Agriculture to insure loans and make direct federal loans for housing for domestic farm labor.
- An additional authorization of $100 million for community facility loans, instead of the $50 million asked by the President.

At Last, A Start

AFTER FIVE YEARS, millions of words of testimony and debate and two presidential vetoes, Congress has passed and Pres. Kennedy has signed a measure to provide simple justice and assistance to the nation's chronically depressed areas.

These areas have been the price paid for technological progress and the geographical shifting of American industry. They are the exhausted mine villages, the deserted textile towns, the centers of obsolete, rundown plants left to disintegrate as industry has moved elsewhere to reap the profits of automation and the latest in design and technology.

These are the areas that have accounted in large measure for the chronic joblessness that has been plaguing the nation. They are the areas that give the lie to the "affluent society."

The new area redevelopment law is a start towards a solution of rebuilding these areas so that they once again become productive parts of the nation where families can live in dignity and decency.

Five Recession Months

FOR THE FIFTH straight month the Labor Dept. reports no significant change in the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment. Since December 1960 it has ranged between 6.6 and 6.9 percent of the labor force. And the best informed estimates indicate that at the end of 1961 the figure will be essentially unchanged.

Statistics such as these in no way reflect the misery and despair of the chronically unemployed—a group that reached a new post-war high in April. But they indicate the persistence of economic ill health which is not yielding to the routine cures administered to date.

The upswing in business activity from the low of the 1960-61 recession will possibly dent but not make any real inroads on the problem of high chronic unemployment. A long-range program to stimulate economic growth is urgently needed, tied in with specialized programs designed to attack structural joblessness.

Expert Testimony

IN THE LONG and bitter fight against so-called "right-to-work" laws organized labor has pointed out that the public interest was deeply involved because the destructive attacks on union security would replace industrial peace with chaotic warfare.

Now a group of men who live intimately and on a day-to-day day basis with labor relations problems in states with "right-to-work" laws have gone on record substantially in opposition to the statutes.

Commissioners of labor in states with laws banning union security have verified that these laws may stunt the industrial growth of the states which enact them and harm both workers and fair employers.

This expert testimony should once and for all demolish the carefully-contrived arguments of the right-to-workers and expose in the cold light of reality their only purpose—to weaken and cripple trade unionism in their greedy drive for a few more pieces of silver in the cash register.

In Senate Speech:

Executive Stock Option Plans Linked to Corporate Corruption

MOST PEOPLE are well aware that corporation executives get a number of tax breaks denied to the average taxpayer, but few have tied these tax bonanzas in with the corruption that is now being exposed in the business world.

The relationship between the special tax position of big business and corporate corruption was discussed on the Senate floor recently by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.). His purpose was to explain a bill he was introducing which would end the granting of restricted stock options—which he described as "a particular gimmick of tax favoritism"—to corporate executives.

This gimmick entitled the executives to buy stock in their particular companies. However, it is so set up that an official may have an option —acquire the right to the stock—but can purchase it at any time he desires up to three years.

Under the arrangement he can buy the stock at the later date at the market price at the time the option is taken out. So, at no risk, he can watch his profits grow and grow and grow.

Since under the Republican-sponsored tax law of 1954 this profit is not considered a compensation connected with employment, he pays little tax on it, getting the advantages of capital gains.

This is the way Gore explained the workings of the restricted stock option gimmick:

"A corporation executive who is paid a large salary and so is, therefore, in a relatively high tax bracket, may wish to reduce his overall, effective tax rate while at the same time receiving increased compensation.

"The executive persuades the board of directors to set up a generous stock option plan conforming to the statute, Sec. 421 of the Internal Revenue Code, so that he can get the reduced tax treatment afforded the profits realized from the restricted stock option.

"It may not be very difficult to persuade the board of directors to do this, since many members of the board will also be officers of the corporation and eligible for the same generous treatment."

Gore pointed out some objections to restricted stock options as follows:

1. They lower the effective tax rate on corporate executives, depriving the Treasury of as much as $100 million a year.

2. The options serve to water the stock of other stockholders since the share of the stock in the hands of legitimate purchasers is lessened with each option purchase.

3. The practice discourages the vigorous growth of new and smaller companies to oppose corporate monopolies by enabling the big firms to hold on to executives so they will not start competing businesses.

"This sort of sharp practice may be symptomatic of our times," he declared. "But it brings into question the entire role of the corporation in American life, business and society and particularly the question of corporate control.

"WHO REALLY CONTROLS the corporation and who, in turn, is served by the corporation? These are grave questions involving the national interest. Willful men, in their reckless scramble for personal power, prestige and pecuniary benefits are using our great corporations for their own advantages, forsaking the national good, the general public and even the actual owners of the corporation, its stockholders."

Gore then recalled the conviction of 29 major electrical manufacturers, including General Electric and Westinghouse, for price-fixing and bid-rigging.

"One wonders if the large amounts of stock options held by General Electric and Westinghouse executives might have motivated some of them to act 'in a more extraordinary way' in entering into collusive agreements to fix prices, thus violating the law of the land and doing as yet unmeasured damage to their customers," he declared.

There are no figures available on the profit picture or the total impact of stock options but the Securities & Exchange Commission does provide some information.

Some 44,672 shares of GE stock were purchased under option by 17 officers and directors the past five months. The value of the options is a deep secret, but SEC does report that GE stock was selling for $68. In 1958 it sold for $57.

"If the option price was 95 percent of the 1958 price, the profit from these purchases was $618,-700," Gore noted.

The Tennessee senator quoted the economic writer, J. A. Livingston, on stock options to emphasize his point further:

"Executives have become an overprivileged class in a democratic society. Their power to overpay themselves with legal sanctions could, if unchecked, erode the very structure on which they and their corporations depend for survival . . . Corporate power could become synonymous with grab-bag morality." (PAI)

Morgen Says:

Just What Did the Doctor Order On Health Care for the Aged?

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

THE EXCITING POLEMICS of the Kennedy-Nixon debates may well pale comparatively into a pattycake affair if an impending event of the forensic season materializes—a debate supposed to be between Abraham Ribicoff and the president of the American Medical Association on the subject of medical care for the aged. The Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare has agreed to meet Dr. E. Vincent Askey, AMA head, in a public forum on the issue. Though, the AMA said the protagonist would be someone else—not Dr. Askey. Sec. Ribicoff said he had accepted Askey's challenge and would be glad to debate him.

Morgan

Whatever that outcome, the AMA already is in full cry against the Administration's plan to furnish medical assistance to senior citizens and finance it by broadening social security taxes slightly. Already Sec. Ribicoff has denounced the AMA advertising campaign for making "misleading and untrue statements" about the President's program.

There are supposed to be two sides to every argument, including how best to provide for the elderly, but the AMA, so far, has refused to examine and discuss the case on its merits. Instead it has loosed a paper flood of printed propaganda about "socialized medicine" clearly calculated to kill the Administration program by drowning it in fear.

The ethical standards of medicine are, by and large, a credit to the profession but no patent medicine man ever denounced a rival's product with more exaggerated counterclaims than the AMA is using against this legislation. Here is a Dr. Jekyll-and-Mr. Hyde equation come to life. If the average doctor practiced medicine as recklessly as his closed-shop professional association, the AMA, practices the deceptive art of propaganda, he would have his license lifted in a twinkling as a quack.

What basis is there for such harsh charges? In big ads in some 39 newspapers across the country, the AMA professed to list the pros and cons of medical aid for the aged. In discussing the Kerr-Mills law, limited legislation passed last year after the Forand bill had been defeated, the ad stated flatly that this law "is now being put into operation in 46 states." According to Health, Education & Welfare Dept. figures, in only seven out of 50 states is this law in effect insofar as new provisions for medical care are concerned, beyond the expansion of the old age assistance program. Only six other states so far have submitted plans or enacted laws that will result in operation of these provisions by summer.

BUT THE POINT the AMA has hammered most frantically on is the allegation that under the Administration plan, patients will lose their right to choose their own doctor. This consideration is not even at issue in the current package. The AMA knows this. It has studied the legislation. It knows what is in it. And yet its propaganda not only persists in charging that the normal doctor-patient relationship will be destroyed, it compounds the falsehood with a fantastic innuendo that Josef Goebbels would have envied. This, I realize, is a brutal comparison. But it's about time the AMA was called to account for its brutal tactics. The AMA has distributed to doctors for distribution in turn to their callers a leaflet headed "An Open Letter to My Patients." At one point this little document makes, in effect, the shocking charge that, under the Administration's plan of medical care for the elderly, doctors will be forced to violate their Hippocratic oath by revealing professional secrets. Lost with the freedom of choice of doctor, says the leaflet, "will be one of the basic principles of my responsibility to you. A principle expressed in the physician's pledge—'I will hold in confidence all that my patient confides in me.' "

This is the most irresponsible kind of false propaganda. In a recent interview on ABC's Issues and Answers program with this correspondent and my colleague Peter Clapper, Sec. Ribicoff said, "the truth of the matter is that the doctors are in no way involved in this bill. . . . This bill provides health care for the aging (for) hospital costs and nursing home costs (and) out-patient costs and has nothing to do with doctors. Every patient in America will have the right to choose his own doctor. The doctors' bills will not be paid. They are not controlled. They are not in any way affected by this bill, so the doctors are outside this legislation in each and every respect."

Ribicoff went on to say that the AMA nevertheless attempted to intimidate individual doctors who speak their minds for the bill. Which raises this interesting question for the debate: How much of the AMA position is just what the doctors ordered?

Washington Report:

Sparkman, Javits Join To Urge Passage of Senate Housing Bill

SEN. JOHN J. SPARKMAN (D-Ala.), chairman of a Senate housing subcommittee, and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), a committee member, have urged passage of the housing bill now before the Senate as the best means of making jobs and helping reduce current high unemployment.

"A million and a half housing units built annually would mean 3 million jobs directly, not considering the additional jobs that result from the lumbering camps to the furniture factories," Sparkman observed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. "The best producer of jobs is the construction industry, and home building is the major part of that industry."

Javits said it is estimated that "something like 10 percent of the economy is directly affected by the home-building industry, and that can make the difference between recession and reasonable prosperity with full employment."

The 1961 bill would provide not only for urban renewal, public housing and housing for the elderly, the senators explained, but also includes a new provision for middle-income housing. This is designed, as Javits put it, for "the people in the housing gap, those who are not eligible for public housing but cannot pay the rents demanded by private housing builders." He said this part of the bill would aid people who live in what he called "hand-me-down housing."

THE ADMINISTRATION BILL, sponsored by Sparkman, would aid middle-income home builders with a program for 40-year mortgage loans with insurance up "to 100 percent of value," Sparkman said, "so that it would not be necessary to pay anything down."

Javits has introduced his own middle-income housing bill, which proposes "direct loans to limited profit companies." He said this plan has worked well in New York, "where we now have 30,000 units going with loans of about $400 to $450 million outstanding, all approved by the voters."

Sparkman observed that the Javits proposal would have to be referred to the Senate Finance Committee, because it involves tax legislation, but an effort could be made to find a common ground.

Sparkman pointed out that although the Senate has passed comprehensive housing bills several times in recent years, they have finally failed because of presidential vetoes or House failure to approve. The main obstacle in the House, Javits said, is the public housing proposals. He urged voters to write their congressmen and urge approval of the 1961 bill.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A CASE CAN BE MADE that passage of the minimum wage bill represents a breakthrough in social legislation such as this country has not known since Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal domestic reforms were brought to a halt after 1938.

It is clearly a major breakthrough for Pres. Kennedy and his still-young Administration. Majority Democratic leadership in the House has been restored, at least for purposes of this bill, and a coalition built to beat down the long-controlling conservative machine run by Representatives Charles A. Halleck (R-Ind.) and Howard W. Smith (D-Va.).

The significance is underscored by previous events in the House.

Late in March Smith and Halleck whipped Speaker Sam Rayburn and the Administration even after the Labor Committee bill had been watered down—and seriously watered down—to a "compromise" that would have given newly added workers only a $1 wage floor and no overtime coverage whatever.

Smith and Halleck defeated the compromise on a 186-185 teller vote and made it stick on a 216-203 rollcall.

Yet six weeks later, a stronger bill—with 3.6 million additional workers moving to a $1.25 wage floor and overtime payments beginning after two years—was passed by the House by the startlingly large margin of 230 to 196.

IN THE QUARTER-CENTURY since Roosevelt won his last major reform—it was, incidentally, the original wage-hour law—there have been many improvements and expansions of New Deal measures.

The minimum wage itself has been lifted twice—to 75 cents in 1949 and to $1 in 1956. Disability insurance was added in 1956 to the social security law, and great numbers of groups previously unprotected were given the benefits of the system.

But the McNamara-Roosevelt bill represents a tremendous stride in the direction of giving service trade workers the basic wage-hour protection that industrial workers have previously had—and this was precisely the barrier that had never before been breached.

This was where the Halleck-Smith coalition had always made its principal defense. The line has now been broken—and it can never be re-established. For if in principle retail store workers are recognized by Congress as deserving protection so are hotel and restaurant workers, so are laundry workers, so are many other service trade employes.

Passage was obtained in 1961 only after these groups—many of them among the most exploited workers in the country—were dropped from the bill. But the principle of great expansions into the service field has been established.

FOR THE KENNEDY ADMINISTRATION, many tests still lie ahead. A victory on wage-hour in the House does not necessarily mean that the same majority can be held on other controversial upcoming reform proposals—permanent and much stronger unemployment compensation, for one, and a comprehensive school-aid bill, and the Anderson-King bill for health care tied to the social security system.

But Halleck and Smith were deprived, this time at least, of their once almost total control of sufficient southern Democratic votes to beat Mr. Rayburn on economic issues. More than the usual number of northern Republicans slipped away from them. Maybe some southern Democrats and the moderately liberal Republicans will discover that they like voting with Kennedy and Rayburn instead of the GOP-Dixiecrat right-wingers.

"WRITE YOUR CONGRESSMAN," Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.), right, urged as he and Sen. John Sparkman (D-Ala.) were interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 460 radio stations. They referred to a 1961 housing bill, which they agreed would pass the Senate, but might get stalled in the House.

How to Buy:

Furniture, Appliances, TV Sets Offer Real Buying Opportunities

By Sidney Margolius

SOME REAL BUYING opportunities are available this spring for families in the market for furniture, appliances and TV sets.

While appliance prices already had been reduced, the recession now also has forced a crack in furniture prices.

You also can find special prices—and some genuine bargains—on vacuum cleaners, carpet sweepers and smaller electrical housewares such as mixers and fry pans.

But the bargain of the month is refrigerators. Already running about one-third below prices of 10 years ago, tags are being cut again this spring. Refrigerators priced at about $400 a few years ago now can be bought for as little as $250-$260.

Here are tips on selecting best values:

REFRIGERATORS: Biggest price cuts are on the two-door frost-free models, now widely available at about $320-$350 for 13 cubic feet.

The "frost free" designation means you don't have to defrost either the freezer or the refrigerator sections. You also now can buy two-door refrigerator-freezers, with automatic defrost for the refrigerator section but not for the freezer compartment, for around $250 for a 12-cubic-foot size. Single-door refrigerator-freezers, with self-defrost refrigerator section but not "frost free" in the freezer section, now are available for around $180 in the 12-foot size.

If you don't need a very large freezer compartment, the single-door type is low in cost and adequate for most families. It would provide about 88 pounds of freezer compartment space in the 12-cubic-foot size.

If you want more freezer space, then the two-door type with the freezer mounted on top is a good value. A two-door model provides more freezer space than the single door. A 12-cubic-foot size will provide about 100 pounds of freezer space.

If this is all you need, then it is not really necessary to spend $80 more for a model with frost-free freezer. The type with self-defrosting for just the refrigerator section is perfectly satisfactory. You actually need to remove frost from the freezer section only once or twice a year. The no-defrost feature in a top-mounted freezer compartment is really a bit of a sales gimmick.

The no-defrost freezer feature may be more desirable if you buy a model with the freezer section mounted at the bottom. Then the frost-free feature is more of a convenience because the freezer area is not only larger but harder to get at to remove the accumulated frost.

Your best value is in the standard rather than the deluxe model of a manufacturer's line.

When you compare prices of different brands, check especially the freezer-compartment capacity. This is the expensive part of a refrigerator-freezer. You are likely to find two 13-cubic foot boxes, one $300, the other $320. But the $320 box in this example has 150 pounds of freezer capacity compared to 116 pounds for the $300 box.

Agriculture Dept. Sets Watered Food Hearings

If you're a cat, the government requires that canners state on the label how much water is contained in cat foods. But if you're a human being, packers need not tell you the amount of water injected into hams, bologna, cooked frozen foods, many other products.

As the result of protests, the U.S. Agriculture Dept. will hold hearings on watered pork products in Denver on May 8 and Portland, Ore., May 11. Any consumer can voice his opinions then or can write them to the Administrator, Agricultural Research Service, U. S. Agriculture Dept., Washington 25, D. C.

EDUCATIONAL FUTURE for "Americans at Work" was launched with the gift of 22 films from the AFL-CIO public service series to the University of Alabama. Barney Weeks, left, president of the Alabama Labor Council, makes presentation to M. O. Hulsey, state supervisor of trade and industrial education. In rear is Spencer V. Johnson, one of five assistant state supervisors who attended the ceremony. "Americans at Work" films are being made available to selected educational bodies with the cooperation of the American Vocational Association.

From Soup to Nonsense:

For the Traveler Back Home, Frustrations Are Just Starting

By Jane Goodsell

THERE'S NO PLACE like home when you return from a trip—the suitcases filled with dirty laundry, the desk piled high with bills, the depleted bank account. But there's one bright thought to lighten the gloom of anti-climax: everybody will be waiting impatiently to hear about your trip.

That illusion is shattered even before the souvenirs you've brought home have fallen to pieces.

I've been trying to talk about our trip to Mexico ever since we got back, but I can't find anybody to listen.

I hadn't been home 10 minutes before my next-door neighbor phoned to welcome me home.

"I'm dying to hear about your trip," she said. "You must tell me all about it."

"Well," I began, "Mexico is a fascinating country, full of contrasts. For instance . . ."

"Oh, speaking of contrasts," she interrupted, "I must tell you about the darling sofa pillows I bought. They're a brilliant purple to contrast with the blue sofa, and they absolutely make the room. You must come over to see them, and then you can tell me all about Mexico."

I went to see the sofa pillows, but I didn't get to tell her all about Mexico. In fact, I didn't get to tell her anything about Mexico because everything I said reminded her of something she wanted to talk about instead.

I started to tell her about the marvelous tacos we had at a little restaurant in Mexico City, which reminded her of a wonderful recipe for tamale pie, which in turn reminded her of the church supper at which she'd first tasted it. The church supper reminded her of the new minister.

She's not the only one. Last night at a party I started to describe the place near Oaxaca where we'd watched pottery being made. The lady across the table interrupted to say that she'd been taking ceramic lessons from a man in Raleigh Hills, and the man on my right said that, speaking of Raleigh Hills, they're building a new ice skating rink there, which reminded the gentleman on my left of the ice skating he'd done as a kid in Minnesota.

EVEN WORSE ARE people who've been to Mexico themselves. They can hardly wait to point out the errors we made and the high spots we missed.

"Where did you stay in Guadalajara?" they ask, and I tell them.

"Oh, what a shame!" they say pityingly. "That's such an ordinary tourist hotel. Now, if you'd only talked to me before you left, I could have told you about a little out-of-the-way hacienda, full of charm and authentic color. . . ." And there I am, listening again.

I give up. I'll never get to tell anybody about my trip. But just wait till other people try to tell me about their vacations.

Consumer Finances Survey:

2 Out of 3 Families In Debt, Study Shows

TWO OUT OF THREE American families are debtors, according to the University of Michigan Survey Research Center.

About half—48 percent—have installment debt, one-third have mortgages, and one-fourth have non-installment credit. Many owe more than one kind of debt.

Following the installment credit splurge of the early Fifties, however, most families have taken a more conservative view of this type of debt. While monthly payments remain a highly popular means of financing new cars, appliances and other durable goods, Americans generally have kept their use of this kind of credit closely in line with their income increases during the past six years.

Early last year, half those with installment debt owed $500 or more.

These findings are reported in a new SRC book, "1960 Survey of Consumer Finances," an up-to-date analysis of the financial position of American families. The books presents comprehensive data on the distribution of incomes, assets, debts, purchases of houses, automobiles, and other durable goods, as well as consumer attitudes and expectations, during the past 15 years.

The Surveys of Consumer Finances represent basic source material for business and government as well as economists and laymen concerned with consumer demand, business cycles and inflation. Complete reports of four recent national surveys of consumer attitudes and inclinations to buy, involving more than 7,000 interviews, are included.

Authors of the volume are George Katona, James Morgan, John Lansing, Eva Mueller, Charles Lininger, Ben Okner, Albert Marckwardt and Jerry Flower of the SRC's economic behavior program.

Between 1956 and 1960, they note, installment debt stabilized at approximately 10 percent of personal income. Installment debt for additions and repairs to homes and personal debt increased during this period, but the use of monthly payments to finance car purchases remained "fairly conservative."

DURING THE PAST THREE YEARS, the proportion of families owing installment debt has not increased. Reflecting rising incomes, however, the proportion of families owing more than $1,000 on the installment plan has doubled (from 7 to 14 percent) since 1955.

Use of installment credit is concentrated in middle income families, those in the $5,000 to $10,000 bracket. Families with income of less than $2,000 are overwhelmingly debt free; only 4 percent of this group owes $500 or more. Similarly, those with incomes exceeding $10,000 annually do not often use this kind of credit.

About one family in eight had debt payments exceeding 20 percent of their income early last year. High debt ratios were fairly frequent in the $2,000 to $7,500 income class, being concentrated in young families looking forward to higher earnings and among those experiencing temporary low incomes.

Interestingly, more than one-third of those making monthly payments had liquid assets—cash in the bank, government bonds, and so forth—sufficient to pay off all their installment debt.

"The proportion of debtors among people with fair-sized or substantial liquid asset holdings has increased somewhat during the last few years," the authors note. "People who buy on time even though they are in a position to pay cash for their goods see installment buying as a means of getting better service or even better price, feel monthly payments are a means of self-discipline, or want to save their cash for a 'rainy day' or some other purpose."

'Right-to-Work' Laws Harmful, Labor Commissioners Agree

sioners failed to answer the request for information.

Miss Martin, a nationally-known Republican, has on several occasions in recent years urged the GOP to break with its past and support progressive social legislation. She has served as state labor commissioner under both Republican and Democratic administrations during the past 10 years.

On the basis of the replies received, Miss Martin told Maine legislators she was convinced that a proposed "right-to-work" law would seriously disrupt Maine's "excellent" labor-management relations.

Following are some of the comments quoted by Miss Martin to the legislature:

Arkansas—Labor Commissioner Clarence R. Thornbrough rejected the often-suggested assumption that a "right-to-work" law helps bring industry into a state. He said:

"I have talked to dozens of people who have brought plants to Arkansas and find they are interested in many things—climate, water, natural resources, transportation, power, availability and cost of labor, etc.—but not a single person has indicated that this law had any major part in the decision to move to Arkansas." He called it a "bad law."

Indiana — Labor Commissioner Hobart P. Butler declared:

"If there are any assets to the law, we are certainly not familiar with them. If there has been any additional opportunity for work for non-union people, our department is unaware of them.

"Indiana is an industrial state and we are continually striving for better labor-management relations. To my knowledge, our experience with our so-called 'right-to-work' law has not been to our advantage. It only adds to conflict and many times stymies better labor-management relations."

Iowa—Labor Commissioner Donald W. Lowe minced no words. He wrote:

"Knowing that Maine is a progressive state, I regret to learn that there is a move to add it to the list of 'right-to-work' states.

". . . In our state [the law] has broken some smaller industrial unions and prevented others from organizing.

"I think one has only to look at the census figures and readily see that most of the 'right-to-work' states have not increased industrially on a par with those that have had strong union organizations.

"It undoubtedly has brought in some small plants that were after cheap labor and we have some plants paying only the federal minimum wage. In my opinion the state would be better off without these."

Nebraska — Commissioner Donald Bastemeyer reported:

"This law in Nebraska has only served the purpose of confusing the whole field of employe-employer relationships and is not good legislation in any sense of the word . . .

" 'Right-to-work' laws have the net effect of legalizing the existence of parasites, or those individuals who would feed maliciously and without cost or self-effort on the gains and efforts of organized groups such as the unions.

"Restrictive labor laws have resulted in a substantial loss of our younger people or at least, in my considered opinion, have constributed much towards this trend."

Nevada—Commissioner George F. Jolly wrote:

"It is my firm belief that every effort should be made to defeat so-called 'right-to-work' legislation, as I do not believe it is of benefit to either the worker or to industry.

"I believe it hinders the negotiation of mutually acceptable contracts between management and labor . . . I further believe it is the right of management and labor to decide whether or not union help shall be employed, rather than a matter for legislative action."

Tennessee — Commissioner W. H. Parham reported:

"The initial effect [of the 'right-to-work' law] was to disturb labor relations that had been in existence for many years and today some of this has failed to subside . . .

"Not even the most rabid supporters of the law make any claim of it having any value . . .

"Apparently there was some hope by supporters of this legislation that it would encourage the growth of industry in the state. This, however, has not developed, and significantly the industries developing in Tennessee are moving into the unionized areas.

"In my opinion the law has weakened rather than strengthened the individual workman; it has hampered unions, has no positive value to the general public and probably is of negative value."

Florida's former labor commissioner, James T. Vocelle, wrote that he considers "that 'right-to-work' laws are un-American and morally indefensible."

Adding her own opinion, Miss Martin told the Maine legislators that a "right-to-work" law:

- Is not needed.
- Is not wanted.
- Does not work.
- Interferes in the right of contract between the employer and the employe.
- Is difficult to enforce.

She concluded: "It is bad legislation, not needed in the State of Maine, and I hope that the committee will report unfavorably on the measure."

Maine Legislators Ask Probe of 'Work' Group

Augusta, Me.—Two Maine legislators, a Republican and a Democrat, have called for an investigation of activities of the National Right-to-Work Committee and its Maine affiliate and an alleged failure to register under the state's lobbying act.

In separate statements, Rep. Cleveland Curtis (R) and Rep. Leonce Jobin (D) charged that efforts to push a so-called "right-to-work" bill through the legislature have been directed by top officials of the National Right-to-Work Committee from an Augusta motel.

The two legislators said no representative of the "right-to-work" group or its Maine affiliate has registered with the Maine Secretary of State as a legislative representative.

Curtis quoted newspaper accounts of activities in Maine of Reed Larson, director of the National Right-to-Work Committee, and an aide. He charged their activities represent "an intrusion from outside the state in an effort to pressure this bill through the legislature."

Jobin said the "origin and inspiration" for the legislative attempt "to undermine the collective bargaining process and to destroy labor organizations" came from the National Right-to-Work Committee. He told the House "there is no doubt" that representatives of the committee have "approached at least a select few of the members of this House."

Jobin noted that the penalty for violation of the lobbyist registration law is only a fine of from $100 to $500, but he added:

"Even if the teeth in the law are baby-sized, they need to be used if this House is to be kept free of inordinate pressures such as this organization and its representatives from outside the state have brought to bear."

He cited a provision in the law requiring the registration of "all persons who for compensation shall approach individual members of the legislature . . . with the intent in any manner, directly or indirectly, to influence action upon proposed legislation."

This, he said, would certainly cover paid officials of the National Right-to-Work Committee and he said the role of the recently-established Maine committee and its financing should be investigated.

A new three-year contract covering 15,000 workers in 1,400 Manhattan apartment building and including a more than 20-cents-per-hour package increase has been concluded by Local 32B, Building Service Employes, and the Realty Advisory Board On Labor Relations, Inc.

The agreement climaxed more than 10 weeks of negotiations which went before the New York State Board of Mediation when the parties were unable to reach a settlement.

The contract calls for a $7.50 wage increase across the life of the pact, including an immediate boost of $3 per week retroactive to Apr. 21, a further $2 increase next year, and an additional $2.50 in 1963.

In addition, apartment building workers will be covered by a medical benefits plan in the form of home and office doctor visits, a program for sick pay benefits, improved termination pay and vacation schedules, plus increased contributions of $1.00 per week to the Union's Welfare Fund to insure continuation of present benefits.

Representing the union in negotiations was Thomas Shortman, Local 32B president and Building Service Employes international vice president, who cited the rent control law as having been a major factor in employers' resistance to granting substantial improvements. The Realty Advisory Board, represented by Pres. Edward F. Gallagher, joined Shortman in praising New York State Mediation Board Chairman George Moskowitz for helping conclude the new agreement.

Building service workers affected by the new pact include handymen, elevator operators, doormen, porters, maintenance and custodial workers.

Briefing Panel Backs Kennedy on Housing

The Kennedy Administration is right in saying that the restoration of old houses can be as useful as building new ones, provided there are proper safeguards; but the 40-year mortgage is a dubious device unless construction standards are strengthened. In any case, there is undoubtedly a need for more housing in America.

This was the gist of a discussion on the latest "Briefing Session" program between Ira S. Robbins, a member of the New York City Housing Authority, and Douglas Haskell, editor of Architectural Forum and a long-time commentator on housing affairs.

"Briefing Session," presented jointly by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center, is a weekly half-hour public affairs series now seen on nearly 70 television stations.

Haskell hailed as "most welcome" the rehabilitation elements in the Kennedy housing proposals. These are in contrast, he said, to "people's ambition (that) cities . . . be razed almost like European bombed cities, and built up from the ground new. It was soon found that you could not afford to do all that straight through America."

Robbins cautiously agreed that rehabilitation was a "good experiment," but warned, first, that it was no substitute for needed new construction, and, second, that it must be applied on an area rather than an individual basis.

The New York expert, who served under Governors Lehman, Dewey and Rockefeller, charged that programs such as Kennedy's were misrepresented in terms of costs. A $3.3 billion program, he pointed out, described the amount of housing that would be built, not its cost to the government.

Edward P. Morgan, host and moderator of the "Briefing Session" series, asked for reactions to the argument that "a person is no more entitled to a subsidized house than he is to a subsidized car."

Haskell retorted that "the car is subsidized by . . . a fantastic federal highway program which gives it the track to run on. . . . Consequently . . . it just cancels out."

Neither panelist had any enthusiasm for a Kennedy proposal for no-down-payment, 40-year mortgages, though neither came out flatly against them. In essence, they agreed such mortgages made very little economic sense, but might be useful if there was some guarantee that the houses would last as long as the debt.

The acute economic impact of home construction was stressed by "Briefing Session" news analyst John MacVane, who noted that when 100,000 homes are not built, a market is lost for "nearly a billion board feet of lumber; over 100,000 bathtubs; over a million electric switches; 32,000 garbage disposal units; almost 2 million gallons of paint," and much more.

These are the figures for 100,000; they would have to be multiplied by seven to represent the difference between the present rate of home construction and the Administration's goal of 2 million new units a year, MacVane pointed out.

Panel Session To Look at Latin America

The current and very touchy question of Latin America will be examined by the next "Briefing Session" panel—as always with a view to looking beyond the headlines of the moment to the deeper issues underlying them.

Guests will be John C. Campbell, director of political studies for the Council on Foreign Relations, and Alberto R. Cellario, South American expert for Life magazine.

Campbell, a Harvard graduate but not a member of the Kennedy Administration, served the government in various fields of international relations from 1942 until he took his present post 13 years later. He has written extensively on international problems, and traveled through Latin America for two years on a Rockefeller fellowship.

Cellario, a native of Argentina, was trained on that country's distinguished newspaper, La Prensa, and among other assignments was a war correspondent in Europe. He fled the country when the Peron dictatorship took control. He has been on the Life staff for almost a decade.

Consumer Aide Asked of Kennedy

The two top officers of the Meat Cutters have urged Pres. Kennedy to appoint a consumer counsel as a member of the top-level White House staff.

Meat Cutters Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman declared, in a letter to the President, that "the ideal solution" would be establishment of a new cabinet-level Consumer Dept. They added that "if such a step is currently unfeasible, we suggest the least the consumer should be able to expect is an office in the White House whose head is directly responsible to the President."

Meany Urges Labor-Management 'Partnership' to Aid Handicapped

Organized labor looks on handicapped workers "just as we look at any other group that suffers from prejudice, discrimination and inadequate opportunity," according to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

"We want to help them win their full status as productive citizens," he told the annual meeting of the President's Committee on Employment of the Physically Handicapped.

The AFL-CIO offers "full partnership," he said, to all who will help in the cause of seeing to it that "it's ability, not disability, that counts."

"The progress of medical science has made it possible for almost every victim of a handicap to fill a useful place," Meany asserted. "That progress must be more strongly supplemented by better rehabilitation services, intensified placement efforts, improved workmen's compensation laws and — most important— closer partnership between labor and management.

"The President's Committee has performed a most useful service, over the years, in working toward these goals."

Meany assured the delegates that labor's representative as committee vice chairman, Pres. Gordon Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, "keeps us in close touch with what you are doing and is constantly urging us to do more on our end."

Attending the opening session were state winners of the national essay contest for high school students sponsored by the committee and the Governors' Committee on Employment of the Physically Handicapped.

The committees brought the winners of five major prizes to Washington and the AFL-CIO or state labor bodies had the remaining 45 state winners and their parents as their guests. The visitors were given guided tours of the capital city, went to Mount Vernon and the Lee Mansion, attended the changing of the guard at Arlington Cemetery, were introduced to Pres. Meany on an inspection of AFL-CIO headquarters and attended a luncheon in the Willard Hotel.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the luncheon guests that organized labor is primarily concerned with the human values in employment of the handicapped.

"Labor has found that handicapped workers deliver well on the job and when properly placed are able and efficient," he said. "It is the well-established policy of the AFL-CIO that every practical means shall be used to insure equal opportunity in employment for all physically handicapped workers."

Cartoonist Allen Saunders, who draws the Kerry Drake strip, was toastmaster of the luncheon. Gene Barry, the Bat Masterson of television fame, was guest of honor.

Gen. Melvin J. Maas, retired Marine, collapsed at the opening session while telling the 1,000 delegates how he managed to have an active life after losing the sight of both eyes due to a wartime injury. Physicians said he apparently suffered a cardiac spasm and placed him in Bethesda, Md., Naval Hospital for several days.

Pres. J. W. McGovern of the National Association of Manufacturers joined Meany and other labor spokesmen in urging "better acceptance" of qualified handicapped workers by their immediate supervisors. He advocated more education to overcome prejudices against handicapped workers often aroused not only in supervisors and foremen but also in fellow-workers.

At a closing luncheon top awards for aiding the handicapped were presented to Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R. I.) and Director Mary E. Switzer of the U.S. Office of Vocational Rehabilitation.

COPE Area Meetings Set Attendance Marks

A record 4,100 local union delegates have taken part in the first nine of a series of 16 COPE area conferences aimed at stepping up the pace of labor's political education program at key shop and precinct levels.

The series of two-day area conferences, conducted by COPE Dir. James L. McDevitt and his staff, have been held in Pensacola, Fla.; Galveston, Tex.; Oklahoma City, Okla.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Hartford, Conn.; Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill.; Rochester, Minn.; and St. Louis, Mo. Attendance ranged from 334 in Galveston to 909 in Pittsburgh.

Seven additional area meetings remain on the schedule.

Delegates set their sights on the 1962 congressional elections with the aim of assuring a liberal majority in the House and preventing domination by the long-controlling conservative Republican-Dixiecrat coalition.

They set as an immediate task the job of informing rank-and-file union members on the importance of writing their congressmen this session in support of such major issues as medical care for the aged, aid to education and labor-management laws.

At workshops and in discussion groups, the area groups studied ways of strengthening their local COPE organizations, exchanged views on methods of collecting voluntary contributions to support political activity and discussed registration and get-out-the-vote drives.

In conference "buzz sessions," the delegates suggested methods to improve coordination of state, district and local COPE activities with those of other interested groups.

Problems of gerrymandering and the reapportionment of congressional and state legislative districts were on the agenda of most of the conferences. These sessions reflected concern over refusal of many state legislatures to revise districts in line with population shifts to the cities.

Still on the COPE conference calendar are the following area meetings:

Durham, N.C., May 7 and 8: delegates from North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia.

Louisville, Ky., May 13 and 14: Kentucky, Tennessee and West Virginia.

Denver, Colo., May 17 and 18: Idaho, Colorado and Utah.

Las Vegas, Nev., May 22 and 23: Arizona, California, Hawaii, Nevada and New Mexico.

Seattle, Wash., May 26 and 27: Alaska, Oregon and Washington.

Billings, Mont., May 31 and June 1: Montana and Wyoming.

Sioux Falls, S.D., June 3 and 4: Nebraska, North Dakota and South Dakota.

N. J. Federation Picks Murphy as President

Newark, N. J.—Vincent J. Murphy, long-time secretary-treasurer of the New Jersey Federation of Labor, has been named president of the state body.

Murphy was chosen by the executive board to succeed the late Louis P. Marciante as head of the 300,000-member federation. Murphy, a member of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, served as secretary-treasurer of the state federation for the past 28 years.

Calvin's Keynotes:

Boilermakers Told To Fight Reaction

Long Beach, Calif.—The reactionary coalition of "horse and buggy" factions of both major political parties is an "almost impenetrable barrier to progress," but can be defeated by concerted efforts of labor and liberal segments of the nation.

So declared William A. Calvin, president of the 160,000-member boilermakers, in his keynote speech to the union's 21st quadrennial convention here.

Nearly 750 delegates were urged to dedicate themselves not only to retaining already-won gains, but to widen "our united efforts to surmount every barrier erected to retard progress."

The nation's economy has been sick and "plagued by repeated industrial recessions for more than eight years," Calvin said, noting that each new recession starts with a greater number of unemployed.

The tragedy, he said, is that the workers of the nation are hurt, while the recessions have "little, if any, impact upon big business."

Steel and auto, he said, are examples of industries which continue to reap enormous profits while the workers are unemployed and communities in which the industries are located are regarded as distressed areas.

He praised the Kennedy Administration's fight against the reactionary coalition, but declared it is his "firm conviction that no political party, regardless of its leadership, campaign pledges, promises or pronouncements, can be an effective substitute for a strong, solvent and honestly administered labor movement."

Domestic problems are further complicated, Calvin said, by the menace from "the slimy octopus of world communism which threatens everything precious to the hearts and lives of free men and whose strangling tentacles have vacuumed the breath of liberty from the lives of the peoples of Russia, her European satellites and China."

The threat is now being stretched "insatiably to all parts of Asia, Africa and the Western Hemisphere, where past and present political suppression and oppression have retarded majorities in their search for equity and dignity," he said.

Calvin also warned that too many local lodges have members who "embrace any flimsy reason to condemn their officers."

Some say, he declared, that those who work from within their unions to destroy them have merely responded to "the mass brainwashing of congressional committees."

"But I find it difficult to convince myself that members who wilfully violate their solemn and binding obligation to abide by the will of the majority . . . have ever been trade unionists in the first place," he said.

John Henning, California state industrial relations director, told delegates that they can help achieve the goals of organized labor only by devoting the same kind of energy to political activities that they now devote to the field of collective bargaining.

Thomas L. Pitts, California State AFL-CIO executive secretary-treasurer, admitted this state has many unfilled needs, but declared that under the leadership of Democratic Gov. Edmund G. Brown "California is the most progressive state in the nation."

Strong Economy Vital To Freedom—Meany

Philadelphia—Organized labor has a "prime interest in defending the free way of life" because what it has achieved has been won "under freedom and democracy," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the 26th convention of the Firemen & Oilers.

He cited the growth of Soviet power during the past 15 years and pointed out that Red propaganda uses these accomplishments as weapons against other people everywhere.

"The ultimate Soviet aim," Meany said, "is to destroy the free way of life in this country if it is to win the world. We in the labor movement have a particular stake in this battle."

Meany, who was frequently interrupted by applause, emphasized the vital importance of maintaining the U.S. economy in the struggle against communism. He noted that the country is now "economically weak" with millions of workers unemployed and with an economic growth rate below that of most other nations.

"The big challenge now," he declared, "is to put America back to work. We must fight the battle as we would in wartime. We need more housing, more schools, more hospitals, more roads and other resources to build up America.

"The conservative press asks, 'Can we afford this?' I say we cannot afford to do otherwise. We can no longer afford to go down hill with 'recessions as usual'.."

About 400 delegates from all parts of the United States and Canada under the direction of Pres. Anthony Matz undertook to revamp the international union constitution and bylaws so as to bring them into conformity with the Landrum-Griffin Act, as the last convention was held in 1956.

The officers' report showed that about 150 local lodges had been forced to merge because members of many smaller lodges declined to run for office in view of Landrum-Griffin's detailed reporting requirements and its penalties for failure to comply.

Other speakers included Chairman George E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives' Association; Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes Dept.; Pres. James Brownlow of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., and Ruben Levin, editor and manager of Labor, the rail unions' weekly newspaper.

Textbook on Labor On Sale in Detroit

Detroit — "Labor-Management Dynamics," a textbook prepared to help high school teachers present an accurate and objective account of labor relations problems, can be purchased for $3.50 from the Detroit Board of Education, 1346 Broadway, Detroit 26, Mich.

Since publication in the Mar. 11th issue of the AFL-CIO News of an article describing how a committee of union and management advisers worked on preparation of the textbook, a number of readers have asked how they could obtain copies.

'To Strengthen Industry':

Kennedy Announces Textile Aid Program

Declaring problems of the ailing textile industry are "serious and deep-rooted," Pres. Kennedy has announced a seven-point program to "strengthen the industry and expand consumption of its products without disrupting international trade."

His program ranged from government-union-management research programs to expand the market for textile products to an international conference dealing with the problems of both importing and exporting countries.

Several points in the President's program closely paralleled recommendations on international trade policy made by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting.

Kennedy described the textile industry—with 2 million employes and another 2 million workers in related jobs—as "essential to our national security" and vital to the nation's peacetime economy. He emphasized that "unemployment in textile mills strikes hardest at those communities suffering most from depressed conditions."

The President announced that he has:

- Directed the Commerce Dept. to "launch an expanded program of research, covering new products, processes and markets." This, he emphasized, "should be done in cooperation with both union and management groups."
- Asked the Treasury Dept. to review depreciation allowances on textile machinery to "assist in the modernization of the industry."
- Directed the Small Business Administration to help the cotton textile industry obtain financing.
- Directed the Agriculture Dept. to make recommendations "to eliminate or offset" the difference in the price of U.S. raw cotton sold to domestic industries and on the world market. Foreign purchasers presently pay 6 cents a pound less for cotton grown in the United States than do U.S. purchasers. In August, the differential is scheduled to rise to 8 cents.
- Prepared for submission to Congress in the near future "a proposal to permit industries seriously injured or threatened with serious injury as a result of increased imports to be eligible for assistance from the federal government."

Kennedy, while a member of the Senate, was one of the original sponsors of the AFL-CIO-endorsed Trade Adjustment bill, along with Senators Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N. J.). The bill would have permitted the President, as an alternative to raising tariffs, to authorize retraining programs, supplementary unemployment compensation and other benefits for workers and assistance to employers and communities adversely affected by imports.

- Directed the State Dept. to set up "an early conference of the principal textile exporting and importing countries." The goal would be "an international understanding which will provide a basis for trade that will avoid undue disruption of established industries."
- Promised that any application by the textile industry for higher tariff protection against imports would be "carefully considered on its merits."

Kennedy said an interdepartmental committee headed by Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges has been studying the special problems of the textile industry since mid-February. He referred to previous studies as far back as 1935 and added: "I believe it is time for action."

Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America expressed the hope that the program "will lay the foundation for constructive development of the industry."

He said the TWUA is "encouraged" by the emphasis on the need for research to create new products and markets and by the provision for union and management participation.

Pollock said one-price cotton and international trade negotiations are also in line with the union's own program, although he expressed disappointment that the Kennedy program does not provide specifically for import quotas.

The U. S. Chamber of Commerce, declining to take action on members involved in price-rigging cases, has dusted off a 37-year-old statement on "principles of business practices" as a guideline for the business community.

In his keynote address to the chamber's 9th annual meeting in the nation's capital, CofC Pres. Arthur H. Motley, publisher of Parade Magazine, paid fleeting attention to the electrical industry price-fixing scandal.

Anti-trust laws, he declared, "are a proper form of government regulation and . . . must be obeyed. Violators should be punished and all businessmen should recognize that even a relatively few misdeeds of this nature tend to weaken the whole economic system."

Motley declined, however, to acknowledge CofC responsibility for misdeeds of its members.

"The enforcement of the anti-trust laws is the function of the Dept. of Justice," he declared. "Punishment is the business of the courts.

"The duty of the CofC is to support the anti-trust laws, but not to go beyond them in vigilante fashion and try to impose its own brand of punishment on wrongdoers."

The chamber's board of directors subsequently adopted a statement containing virtually the same language and reaffirmed the 1924 statement of principles which declared, among other things, that "unfair competition, embracing all acts characterized by bad faith, deception, fraud or oppression, including commercial bribery, is wasteful, despicable, and a public wrong" and called on business to "rely for its success on the excellence of its own service."

In a letter to Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges, who had expressed an interest in having the CofC develop a code of business ethics, Motley said the chamber was satisfied to stand on the "wisdom and soundness" of the 1924 statement of principles.

At the same time Motley took a swipe at the trade union movement, declaring "it is of overriding importance to recognize that there are many forms of monopolistic and other improper practices by labor organizations which are not subject to restraints and remedies under anti-trust or other laws."

Much of the chamber's three-day session was given over to broadside attacks on the Kennedy Administration and the trade union movement.

Dr. Ernest L. Wilkinson, president of Brigham Young University in Provo, Utah, declared that Kennedy's programs to ease the recession constituted a "derogation" of the President's Inaugural Address statement that the American people should "ask not what your country can do for you" but instead should "ask what you can do for your country."

Wilkinson, and a parade of other speakers assailed the Administration's aid-to-education program, extension of unemployment compensation benefits, the new area redevelopment law, the step-up in surplus foods distribution, health care for the aged through social security, the minimum wage increase coupled with broadened coverage, and proposals for housing and urban renewal.

In the labor field, the 3,000 delegates heard Rep. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.) attack pending situs-picketing legislation as a "major and most immediate threat" to the Landrum-Griffin Act, which he co-authored in 1959 with Rep. Phil M. Landrum (D-Ga.).

The chamber convention adopted a resolution calling for federal legislation to ban industrywide and companywide bargaining, declaring that such negotiations result in a "labor-force monopoly." Delegates also approved resolutions opposing a shorter workweek and calling for state, rather than federal, legislation covering pension and welfare funds.

Chamber Digs Up Some Creaking Economics

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has come up with some refurbished 19th Century economics to support its opposition to wage increases unless an employer faces a manpower shortage.

That's the gist of a new pamphlet, "Productivity and Wage Settlements," prepared by the chamber's Economic Advisory Council.

The 14-page publication discusses the problem of increasing productivity in the economy and concludes that the gains of such productivity should not be directly distributed in the form of higher wages. Wage rates and wage levels, it says, should be left to the "forces of supply and demand."

The advisory council includes Arthur E. Burns, chairman of the Dept. of Economics, George Washington University, and a half-dozen other economists from the University of Chicago, University of Virginia, Cornell University, Bates College, Vanderbilt University and Washington University.

On general wage increases the publication declares:

"If an employer has difficulty in securing enough manpower, this suggests that the remuneration is inadequate; if he has more applicants for jobs than there are openings or has no difficulties in securing adequate help, this suggests that his offering rates are adequate or more than adequate."

Proper wage and salary policy, the publication adds, may provide "for individual payment adjustments in response to improved skill, better performance, etc. Furthermore, wage adjustments from time to time to maintain morale, reduce turnover and reward cooperative teamwork may be good personnel policy and sound business practice."

The publication adds that "such wage policies . . . would help distribute productivity gains over the years . . . " and concludes:

"It is difficult to escape the conclusion that regardless of the conflicting diagnoses and prescriptions and the claims of union officials, the forces of supply and demand—that is the free play of market forces — should determine wage rates and wage levels."

Labor Role 'Decisive' in Social Service Changes

Atlantic City—The influence of organized labor will be a decisive factor in bringing about much-needed changes in the nation's $2 billion a year voluntary health and welfare services, delegates to the sixth annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services were told here.

Dr. Robert H. Hamlin, director of a Rockefeller Foundation study of voluntary health and welfare program, leveled charges of duplication, inadequacy and inefficiency against social and health agencies, both local and national.

He said there are "over 10,000 such agencies, excluding church groups, and this is far too many." He also charged that the "organization and structure of voluntary agencies has not changed in 20 years."

Hamlin cited the "outstanding contribution" to the study by Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers and chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, served on the study group.

Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, said:

"We must not do anything to undermine the confidence of the American people in our voluntary health and welfare agencies, but unless these agencies put their own houses in order, Congress will help them to do so."

Dan W. Dodson, director of the School of Education, New York University, told delegates "the great change in the status of labor lies in the increased respect working people have for themselves because they no longer conceive of themselves as impotent."

Dr. Harold J. O'Brien, Pennsylvania State University, said union organization "does not exist in a vacuum: it is a vital force in a free society." He added that the union leader must be a community leader because "prestige comes to union organization when the leader is also a strong man in his community."

In his keynote address, Perlis defined the community leader as one who serves "the social needs of the community and the human needs of the individual."

He told the delegates the "greatest achievement of the community services program to date has been your ardent participation in community affairs as trade unionists and as citizens with a point of view."

URW, Goodyear Name Umpire

Akron, O.—The Rubber Workers and the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. have named Carl A. Warns, Jr., associate professor of law at the University of Louisville, as national umpire to arbitrate disputes arising from the contract between union and company. He replaces Dr. Charles Killingsworth, resigned.

Warns has been an arbitrator since 1949 in contracts or disputes involving management and the Firemen and Oilers, Distillery Workers, and other unions. At one time he was personnel director and labor negotiator for Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., distillers.

Hailed by Kennedy:

Depressed Areas Bill Signed Into Law

Pres. John F. Kennedy has signed into law a $394 million area redevelopment bill—one of the key measures in his Administration's priority anti-recession program. The measure was essentially the same as bills twice vetoed by former Pres. Eisenhower.

At White House ceremonies marking the enactment, Kennedy announced the appointment of William L. Batt, Jr., Pennsylvania's Secretary of Labor & Industry, to head the new Area Redevelopment Administration, which will operate under the Dept. of Commerce.

The President—for whom enactment of the area redevelopment law meant the fulfillment of a major pledge to hard-hit communities during his campaign for the White House—declared that there was "no piece of legislation which has been passed which gives me greater satisfaction to sign."

The new law, as with the bills Eisenhower vetoed in 1958 and 1960, seeks to create new jobs by helping to attract new industries to urban areas having chronic unemployment and to rural areas with under-employment. It contains safeguards against the use of federal funds to "pirate" industry from other communities.

WILLIAM L. BATT, JR.

Named to Administer $394 Million Depressed Areas Program

It authorizes the borrowing of $200 million from the Treasury to set up two revolving loan funds of $100 million each, one for industrial redevelopment and the other for rural development. From these funds, the government will make loans for the construction of plants and facilities and the purchase of machinery and equipment to help stimulate long-range employment opportunities.

It also authorizes direct Treasury borrowing of another $100 million to finance loans covering up to 100 percent of construction and improvement costs of such public facilities as water and sewage systems. The loans, for as long as 40 years, would be designed to help attract new industry to hard-hit communities.

In addition, the law authorizes an annual $75 million in grants for public facilities in redevelopment areas which could not afford to repay federal loans; $4.5 million in grants for vocational retraining programs in lieu of unemployment compensation; and $4.5 million for technical assistance to areas in substantial need of aid in preparing redevelopment programs. These would require specific appropriations by Congress.

"This bill will help make it possible for thousands of Americans who want to work, to work," the President said at the White House ceremonies.

"It will be of special help to those areas which have been subjected to chronic unemployment for many months and in some cases for many years.

"In this free society we want to make it possible for everyone to find a job who wants to work and support their families, and this bill is an important step in that direction."

Communities eligible for loans or grants under the program must be designated by the Labor Dept. as areas of "substantial labor surplus." The Labor Dept. said that 20 major industrial areas and 90 smaller areas currently meet these requirements.

Eligible Areas Listed

Major areas immediately eligible are Atlantic City N. J.; Altoona, Erie, Johnstown, Pittsburgh, Scranton, and Wilkes-Barre-Hazleton, Pa.; Fall River, Lowell and New Bedford, Mass.; Detroit and Flint, Mich.; Evansville, Ind.; Charleston, Huntington-Ashland and Wheeling, W. Va.; Mayaguez, Ponce and San Juan, P. R.; and Providence-Pawtucket, R. I.

Batt, new administrator for the area aid program, has headed Pennsylvania's Dept. of Labor and Industry since March 1957 and has served as vice chairman of the state's Industrial Development Authority. He served on the task force named by Kennedy prior to his inauguration to study the needs of areas of chronic joblessness.

The task force was headed by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), Senate sponsor of the bill adopted by Congress and signed by Kennedy.

Congress Passes $1.25 Wage, 3.6 Million New Workers Added

will stay at the $1.15 minimum wage for two years, and will then receive $1.25 an hour.

- The newly covered workers, who start at $1 an hour, will go to $1.15 the fourth year, and $1.25 the fifth.
- There will be no overtime benefits for newly covered workers during the first two years, but in the third year, overtime will be payable after 44 hours and the ceiling will drop to 42 hours the fourth year and 40 hours thereafter.
- Protection will be extended to 2.1 million employes of retail chain stores under a new test of coverage which includes firms doing at least $1 million worth of business a year and purchasing at least $250,000 worth of goods in interstate commerce. In chain operations, individual stores with gross annual sales of less than $250,000 are exempt.
- Coverage will also be extended to 86,000 workers employed by gasoline stations doing more than $250,000 gross business a year; 30,000 telephone operators in small exchanges; 1 million construction employes; and 100,000 workers in previously covered establishments, most of them wholesale firms, who had been unprotected because coverage was spelled out only for workers specifically handling goods in interstate commerce.
- Minimum wage protection, but not overtime coverage, also is granted to 93,000 employes of local transit companies, 100,000 seamen and 33,000 seafood processing workers.

Passage was not without its price. The measure was a compromise, worked out in conference committee, between a more liberal Senate bill covering 4.1 million workers and the narrow House bill which would have raised the minimum to only $1.15 and would have given 1.1 million newly covered workers only $1 an hour and no overtime coverage.

In conference, 140,000 low-paid laundry workers and 305,000 employes of automobile dealers, scheduled to be protected by the Senate bill, were dropped from coverage; 17,000 local transit employes were shaved off the Senate figures; and between 16,000 and 25,000 cotton gin workers, shadegrown tobacco workers and employes of small grain elevators—covered by the wage-hour law since its inception in 1938—were dropped in a series of moves designed to crack the House conservative coalition and insure passage.

On the House rollcall for final passage, 197 Democrats and 33 Republicans teamed up to push the bill through, while 138 Republicans and 58 Democrats, all of the latter from southern and border states, opposed it. In the Senate, 48 Democrats and 16 Republicans favored the bill; while 15 Republicans and 13 Democrats voted against passage.

In his statement hailing the action, Meany extended labor's congratulations to Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) and Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), sponsors of the Administration measure, for their work in the conference committee which resulted in "salvaging a good bill following passage of the meaningless House bill."

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg said he was "delighed and highly gratified" by the vote.

Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks said the broadening of coverage to workers in the retail industry was a major step toward bringing "long overdue justice to those who need it most." Noting that more than 400,000 retail employes have the advantage and protection of collective bargaining agreements negotiated by RCIA locals, Suffridge said that for the millions of others the bill is "the first recognition of their rights as American workers."

Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said passage of the bill was of "tremendous significance to the entire labor movement" and an "important victory" for CWA, which had waged a 20-year battle to end the exclusion from wage-hour protection of the 30,000 switchboard operators in small telephone exchanges.

The minimum wage question was a key issue in the 1960 presidential campaign and a major plank in Kennedy's anti-recession program.

Three other priority measures the President recommended—temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits, depressed areas legislation and aid to dependent children—already have been passed. The fifth, improvement in social security benefits, has been passed by the House and is awaiting Senate action.

Meanwhile, another major Kennedy measure—a $2.3 billion program of federal grants to public elementary and secondary schools, which states can use at their discretion for either classroom construction or teachers' salaries—won approval in a Senate Education subcommittee.

By a vote of 8 to 1, the subcommittee headed by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) approved the three-year program. At the same time it rejected Kennedy's request to cut in half appropriations for school districts where the student population is swollen by children of federal employes, and voted instead to continue the so-called "impacted areas" program intact for another three years.

The aid-to-education bill, cleared earlier by a House Education subcommittee, is now under consideration by the full House Education & Labor Committee. Another House subcommittee has approved the Administration's $2.4 billion program for college construction loans and scholarship grants.

Labor Cooperation Asked in TUC Study

The AFL-CIO has urged its affiliates to work with state employment agencies and local employment offices to cooperate in surveys being conducted by the Labor Dept. to evaluate the effectiveness of the Temoporary Unemployment Compensation law passed by Congress.

The Labor Dept. has initiated the survey program to gather data on past employment experience of those drawing the extended jobless benefits. It has stressed that answers to questions will in no way affect claimants' eligibility to receive aid under the program.

In letters to all national and international unions, state and local central bodies and AFL-CIO regional offices, Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the Dept. of Social Security declared it was important for local labor people to participate in the research program.

Labor participation would "help assure that the interviews are conducted in a manner most likely to enhance public confidence in the employment security program," Cruikshank said, and would "see that the purposes of the research are generally understood."

In addition to the questions on past employment, he noted, workers in 14 states—Alabama, Arizona, California, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania and Vermont—will be asked for information on family income.

Udall's Brother Wins House Seat

Tucson, Ariz.—Morris K. Udall (D) has won a special election for the congressional seat left vacant when his brother, Stewart Udall, resigned to become Interior Secretary in Pres. John F. Kennedy's Cabinet.

Udall defeated Mac C. Matheson by a margin of about 2,500 votes—50,285 to 47,730. Matheson unsuccessfully ran against Stewart Udall for the 2nd congressional district seat last November.

The election raises Democratic strength in the House to 262 seats, compared with 172 held by Republicans. There are currently three vacancies. They include two seats formerly held by Republicans—in Pennsylvania and Tennessee—for which special elections will be held May 16, and a contested seat in Indiana.

$2.5 Billion Education Bill Heads Toward Senate Vote

House Unit Also Clears Measure

By Gene Zack

The Senate has cleared its decks for action on a $2.5 billion federal aid-to-education bill that would provide grants over the next three years which states could use for public school construction or teachers' salaries, or both.

Debate was expected to open May 16 on a bill, cleared by the Senate Education Committee, which retains the principles urged in Pres. John F. Kennedy's education message to Congress but calls for more funds and a different method of distributing them among the states.

Under the bill, which cleared the committee by a 12-2 vote, grants would be made under a complex formula based on student population and per capita income in each state. The grants would range from a low of $9.26 per pupil in Connecticut to a high of $27.77 in Mississippi, South Carolina and Arkansas.

This "equalization formula" would add about $252 million to the recommendations submitted by the President, who had asked for a minimum allocation of $15 per pupil, plus adjustments to take into account per capita income.

The Senate Committee departed from the White House recommendations in another major respect. Kennedy, facing squarely the so-called "religious issue" which had been raised in the 1960 presidential campaign, had made it clear that since no funds would be allocated to church schools, students in these schools would not be counted in determining funds allocated to each state.

The committee, headed by Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.), rejected this

Labor Hits Dividends Tax Boon

Special tax benefits on stock dividends, enacted by the Republican-controlled 83rd Congress, represented "a bonanza for the high-income taxpayers," the AFL-CIO has declared in endorsing Pres. John F. Kennedy's proposals to abolish these tax privileges.

Organized labor "strongly opposed" the special deductions at the time of their enactment in 1954, Stanley H. Ruttenberg, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, reminded the House Ways & Means Committee.

"Nothing that has happened since that time," he said, has changed labor's opinion that these loopholes represented "favorable treatment to one class of income receivers at the expense of all others."

Currently the law allows taxpayers with dividend income two special benefits:

- A taxpayer may exclude from his income the first $50 received in stock dividends. In the case of married couples, the exclusion is $100.
- A taxpayer is entitled to deduct from his tax an amount equal to 4 percent of all dividends received above the exclusion.

In his tax message to Congress, Kennedy called these provisions "wholly inequitable" and declared they "greatly overcompensate the dividend recipient in the high-income bracket, while giving either insufficient or no relief to shareholders with smaller income."

Rescinding of the 1954 stock income provisions, the President said, would produce a revenue gain of $450 million annually.

Ruttenberg emphasized that organized labor is not "against dividend income." Dividends, he said, "play an important role in the American economy," since they are "the means of providing a return to the owners of equities in American industry."

The issue before the committee, he declared, is "how dividends should be taxed." He added that "it is our judgment that all sources of income—whether it be wages, rents, dividends or interest—should be treated alike under our tax laws."

The AFL-CIO spokesman pointed out that stock ownership is confined to a "relatively small minority" of American families. He cited a recent study by the University of Michigan Survey Research Center showing that in 1959 and 1960 "only 14 per-

Mills Plans Hearings On Health Care Bill

Hearings on the Anderson-King health care bill will be the next order of business for the House Ways & Means Committee, Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) has announced.

A date for the first public hearing on the subject—health insurance for the aged under the Social Security Act—will be set after the committee finishes hearings on Pres. John F. Kennedy's recent tax message, Mills said.

Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.) said he welcomed the announcement, in view of doubts that had been expressed that any progress would be made on health care legislation in this session of Congress. Anderson, co-sponsor of the Anderson-King bill, said he hopes the House hearings will be followed by hearings in the Senate.

Raise Ends Rail Crisis In Canada

Toronto, Ont.—A dispute threatening a nationwide railway strike has been ended with 111,000 non-operating employes winning the largest single total pay increase in Canadian history.

The non-operating workers will share a $34-million raise under terms of the settlement with the two largest North American rail systems, Canadian National and Canadian Pacific.

The victory could not be measured in terms of the wage increases alone.

Six months ago, the government banned a strike and imposed a wage freeze because the CPR and CNR said they could not afford to pay the recommendations of a government conciliation board.

The actual settlement gave the 15 unions the exact recommendations of the conciliation board—14 cents an hour and four weeks of vacation after 25 years—retroactive to Jan. 1, 1960.

The rail presidents protested that the award, which brings average non-op wages to $1.91 an hour, was exorbitant. They said they had to pay it because the non-operating employes were determined to strike for it.

The settlement also resulted in a victory for labor's demand that railway wages be measured according to pay in the durable goods industries.

The conciliation board upheld this contention and awarded the 14 cents so that the non-operating em-

Heavy Backlog Deplored:

NLRB Considering Delegating Powers

By David L. Perlman

The National Labor Relations Board, bogged down by the greatest backlog of undecided cases in its history, is working on a plan to speed its work by delegating authority to make decisions in unfair labor practice cases to its 64 trial examiners throughout the nation.

NLRB Executive Sec. Ogden W. Fields told a House Labor subcommittee that the five board members "cannot possibly decide all the ever-increasing number of cases coming before them." He said the NLRB "is now moving . . . in the direction of delegating its authority, directing itself to become an appellate body."

The board has already given its regional directors power to act on petitions for representation elections, starting May 15. Fields said the NLRB is "actively considering" revamping its role under the Reorganization Act recently passed by Congress. Reorganization proposals submitted by the President become effective after 60 days unless disapproved by the House or Senate.

The subcommittee, headed by Rep. Roman C. Pucinski (D-Ill.), also heard sharp criticism of the NLRB and particularly of its decisions during the Eisenhower Administration from union officers and attorneys.

Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America told the subcommittee:

"Our bitter experience, particularly during the last eight years, convinces us that the NLRB majority is a biased group which favors employers and aids them in their efforts to deny workers the right to freedom of association in unions of their choice.

"To aggravate this situation, the NLRB's administration of this law, is marked by indifference, laxity and incompetence."

Policy Shifts, Delays Cited in Missile Lag

Management decisions and an "inordinate number" of changes in construction plans—rather than labor disputes—have been "primarily" responsible for delays in the nation's missile base construction program, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. has told Congress.

In a statement filed with the Senate Government Operations Permanent Investigations subcommittee, which has been seeking to pinpoint responsibility for America's space lag, Haggerty emphasized that the BCTD "does not condone unauthorized, irresponsible and unjustified strikes at missile bases."

To "reduce such local work stoppages to a minimum," he told the subcommittee headed by Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.), the BCTD in February "voluntarily and unilaterally" approved an unprecedented peacetime policy of using the full power of the department and its 18 affiliated unions to prevent disruption of the missile program.

Haggerty's statement was placed in the record as McClellan called a temporary halt in the hearings. The action was taken pending what McClellan said would be the issuance of an executive order by Pres. John F.

Peter Henle Takes Post With BLS

Peter Henle, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, has been named assistant commissioner for publications and program planning in the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

A native of New York, Henle was graduated from Swarthmore College in 1940, emerged from World War II as a major in the Air Force, and received a master's degree from American University.

He worked for the former AFL from 1946 to1952, spent a year with the National Labor-Management Policy Committee in the Labor Dept. and returned to the AFL in 1953. He was named assistant director of research upon the AFL-CIO merger in 1955 and has been working in the areas of unemployment, taxation, consumer problems and economic statistics. He is vice chairman of the Federal Statistics Users Conference, which is dedicated to improving federal statistics, and has been secretary of the AFL-CIO Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Peter Henle

Henle will take over the post of Philip Arnow, now serving as executive director of the Presidential Railroad Commission.

Paul R. Kerschbaum, BLS chief of program planning and a BLS staff member since 1945, was appointed assistant commissioner for management and field services. He succeeds Henry J. Fitzgerald, who retired in March.

NLRB Names Feldesman as New Counsel

William Feldesman, law professor at Syracuse University and a prominent arbitrator, has been appointed solicitor of the National Labor Relations Board.

Feldesman, who served as assistant general counsel of the NLRB from 1947 to 1956, was named by NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch to succeed James V. Constantine as the board's principal legal adviser, effective June 5. Constantine will become legal consultant to Board Member Boyd Leedom, former chairman.

Feldesman, 47, served on the NLRB staff for five years before being named assistant general counsel in 1947.

In addition to teaching, Feldesman has been engaged in private law practice as a member of the Rochester, N. Y., firm of Coyle, Marks, Feldesman and Jordan. He is a member of labor arbitration panels of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, the New York State Board of Mediation and the American Arbitration Association.

Bourguiba Welcomed On Visit to AFL-CIO

Pres. Habib Bourguiba of Tunisia, an old friend of the AFL-CIO, dropped in for a visit at federation headquarters in Washington while on his official trip to the United States.

He was greeted by AFL-CIO leaders headed by Pres. George Meany, who said, "It's good to see you again."

"I do not forget the help you gave us," replied Bourguiba. "It is a pleasure to visit those who helped us in our strenuous fight for freedom. I have not forgotten the convention in San Francisco, where you invited Farhat Hached and me."

Bourguiba referred to a convention nearly 10 years ago at which, he recalled, his welcome was deeply appreciated because he was not there the head of an independent nation but a freedom fighter. Hached, general secretary of the General Union of Tunisian Workers and an executive board member of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, was assassinated in Tunisia in 1952 after being denied permission to leave the country and attend an ICFTU board meeting in New York.

Meany emphasized that U.S. labor's faith in Bourguiba and his associates was justified, and praised him for bringing Tunisia into the 20th Century.

"More importantly," said Meany, "you have brought liberty to your people and we are sure that you will also bring them prosperity. Thank you very much for coming to see us."

Among those greeting Bourguiba were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Vice Presidents James B. Carey, Joseph D. Keenan and James A. Suffridge. Schnitzler and Carey had met him at an ICFTU congress in Tunisia in 1957.

Meany and Bourguiba talked briefly in the former's office. The Tunisian president was accompanied by his son, Habib Bourguiba, Jr., his country's ambassador to the U.S., who served as an interpreter. A reception followed in the Executive Council room.

Before leaving the building, Bourguiba presented a bound copy of his speeches to Meany as a "token of friendship" for American labor and in recognition of its encouragement of Tunisian independence.

Union Wins Puerto Rican Leather Plants

San Juan, P. R.—Unionization of three new Puerto Rican plants with 400 employes as the result of a major organizing drive has been announced by Pres. Norman Zukowsky of the Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers.

Initial contracts containing substantial wage increases and other benefits, including health and welfare programs, have been negotiated for workers in two Puerto Rico Tanning Corp. plants in Caguas Juncos, and the recently-established plant of the Billfold Corp. of America at Gurabo.

The union's beachhead in Puerto Rico was established when the Caguas plant of Craftsman Billfolds of Puerto Rico was organized.

The recent successes were gained in a campaign aimed at unionizing the whole of the island's rapidly-growing small leather goods industry. It is being led by Zukowsky with the assistance of Intl. Rep. Ralph Cennamo and Staff Organizers Dionisia Carrillo and Ellalio Marcano.

NLRB Will Appeal Darlington Setback

Greensboro, N. C.—The National Labor Relations Board has served notice of appeal from a federal judge's order prohibiting the board from considering new evidence in the Darlington Mfg. Co. case.

Involved are job rights and back pay for more than 500 Darlington workers who lost their jobs when the company closed its plant in 1956 and went out of business after they had voted for union representation. The Textile Workers Union of America has argued that the Darlington mill was controlled by the Deering Milliken chain. Both companies were headed by Roger Milliken.

After an initial ruling by an NLRB trial examiner that Darlington's conduct was an unfair labor practice but that the Deering Milliken firm could not be held responsible the labor board remanded the case for a further hearing on the basis of new evidence uncovered by the TWUA.

U.S. District Judge C. C. Wyche granted the company's request for a restraining order barring further hearings in the case and requiring the NLRB to make its final decision on the basis of facts already in the record. The judge held that the board "has failed to act with dispatch in the handling and determination" of the case.

Alaska Labor Cleared:

Political Spending Charge Collapses

Anchorage, Alaska—A federal charge of illegal political expenditures by the Anchorage Central Labor Council has collapsed in court with a directed verdict of acquittal.

The indictment, obtained by the Justice Dept. during the term of former Atty. Gen. William P. Rogers, charged that the council made an illegal "expenditure" of $244 from its general funds in paying for four 15-minute television programs publicizing labor endorsement of two Democratic candidates for the Senate and one Democratic candidate for the House.

The indictment charged that during October and November 1958 the televised broadcasts "included expressions of political advocacy" and "were intended to influence the general electorate," including citizens "who were not members of any labor organization."

Declaring that the facts of the television broadcasts were not in dispute—that the only issue was whether federal law had been violated—U.S. District Judge Walter H. Hodge issued a direct verdict of acquittal after the government had presented its case to the jury. The acquittal is not subject to appeal.

Hodge noted that the telecasts were a continuing part of the council's activities, dating back to 1955, and were the only regular means of communicating with union members.

The judge pointed out that the U.S. Supreme Court in 1948 had upheld the right of unions to use their newspapers to publicize political endorsements and he noted that the cost of the television programs was less than the cost of publishing a newspaper.

He emphasized that the telecasts were largely paid for out of a special "TV fund," to which affiliated unions contributed voluntarily. Noting that each union decided by vote of its membership whether to contribute and how much to contribute, the judge added:

"Surely that is voluntary; and that I think is the crux of the situation here."

The judge commented that the Corrupt Practices Act, which bans corporations or labor unions from making contributions or expenditures in connection with federal elections, was designed to prevent corporations and unions from "controlling elections" and to protect the rights of individual union members.

He concluded that "the statute was not designed to prohibit the type of activity disclosed by the evidence in this case," and added:

". . . I am in accord . . . that it not the intent that the statute cover cases such as this any more than a newspaper, which is a corporation or published by a corporation, containing editorials favoring or disfavoring political candidates."

6 Ordered Reinstated In 'Bugged' Trailer Plant

A National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has recommended the reinstatement with back pay of six employes of a Baltimore trailer company, admittedly fired in an effort to break up a Machinists' organizing drive.

James W. Fyle, president of the Intl. Trailer Co., which is now in receivership, testified under oath at the NLRB hearing that the plant had been "bugged" in an effort to overhear conversations of workers and that employes were dismissed on trumped-up charges if "we thought they had ever been connected with a union, or had ever worked at a place where they had a union."

After attempting to unravel the tangled relationship between Intl. Trailer and its sales agent, Gibralter Industries, Inc., Trial Examiner Louis Plost recommended that orders be issued against both companies directing reinstatement of the fired employes and requiring the Gibralter firm to bargain with the IAM.

In December 1960, the examiner noted, Intl. Trailer Co. went out of business and the Gibralter firm took over the employes "and became responsible for remedying International's unfair labor practices."

Until that time, testimony at the hearing revealed, employes didn't know whether they were employed by Gibralter or Intl. Trailer.

The union organizing drive began last summer after the company canceled paid vacations for its employes.

Under questioning at the NLRB hearing, Fyle described how he and Charles F. Painter, president of Gibralter, paid a midnight visit to the home of one of the workers, Thomas C. Collins, to try to get information about a union meeting the night before. In Fyle's own words:

"We questioned him at great length as to what was going on . . . who was involved and who were the ringleaders and the organizers in the plant. We spent a couple of hours there and we kept digging the hole deeper, but we still couldn't get any information out of Collins. . . . It appeared he was a little bit smarter than we had him figured."

After that, Fyle testified, "we thought up an excuse and Mr. Stutsman [the plant manager] fired him."

Describing how management had the plant "bugged" in mid-August, Fyle said the purpose was "to listen in on conversations of the different employes" and "find out who was involved in the union."

He said the bugging was discontinued after four or five days because:

"The speakers we bought were of such intensity that it wasn't of much value. Most of it was garbled. . . . As more and more people got under the microphone, it just became impossible to understand and so we found it impractical."

Describing the selection of workers for dismissal, Fyle said:

"We began literally to clean house . . . anybody that had ever worked at a place that had a union —or we thought by their wages . . . they had at one time been union members, we set up a list and proceeded to go to work . . . we felt that anybody that had been involved in it before probably would be hooked up in it again."

In L-G Reporting Failure:

Labor Spy Charge Names Chicagoans

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has charged a Chicago rug manufacturer and a detective agency with having failed to report payments for spying on workers and their union.

The civil complaints, filed in U. S. District Court in Washington, D. C., together make up the first action brought against an employer or his agent under the reporting and disclosure provisions of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The suits charge that the Illinois State Detective Agency furnished information to the Olson Rug Co. "concerning the activities of . . . employes and the Textile Workers of America" and charge that Olson engaged the agency for that purpose.

Allegations of labor spying also are involved in a current contempt proceeding before the U.S. Court of Appeals in Chicago, where the National Labor Relations Board has asked that the Olson company be cited for contempt of a 1958 decree ordering it to bargain with the TWUA. The union, which won bargaining rights in a 1957 representation election, is still seeking its first contract.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock told a House Labor subcommittee on May 9 that "the evidence which provoked this court hearing was the discovery that the employer had infiltrated detectives into the union's bargaining committee."

The Labor Dept. suits were brought under Sec. 203 of the Landrum-Griffin Act which requires employers and third parties to report to the Secretary of Labor within 30 days after the close of the fiscal year "any expenditure, during the fiscal year, where an object thereof, directly or indirectly, is to interfere with, restrain or coerce employes in the right to organize and bargain collectively."

The complaint against both the Olson company and the detective agency covered the period from Sept. 14, 1959, the effective date of L-G, to Dec. 31, 1959, the end of the fiscal year for both firms.

The suit asks the court to direct the two firms to file reports covering past activities and to enjoin them from violating the reporting law in the future. No penalty is provided in the civil action.

FUND-RAISING DRIVE by Local Div. 685 of Street Railway Employes resulted in presentation of special school bus to Brantford, Ont., School for Retarded Children. Don Houliston, a member of Local 685's fund-raising committee, is shown presenting keys to Mrs. B. R. Dunn, school principal. The Ontario local has raised a total of $6,000 to date for the school.

Rubber Workers Win Pay Hike At Goodyear

Akron, O.—The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., largest firm in the rubber industry, has reached agreement with the Rubber Workers on wage increases for 20,000 workers in 11 plants.

The parties had reached settlement on a master contract, not including wages, on Apr. 15. They reopened negotiations after the union concluded wage settlements for 16,000 Firestone Tire workers, 3,500 at General Tire, and 1,400 at Seiberling Rubber Co.

Goodyear and the union issued a joint announcement of these contract terms:

- Effective June 5, 1961, increases of 7.5 cents an hour in five tire plants, 3.5 cents in six non-tire plants.
- As of June 11, 1962, an additional 7 cents an hour for tire plant workers, 4 cents in non-tire plants.
- One more paid holiday, making eight per year in all plants.

The wage agreement, similar to those reached with the other companies, is subject to ratification by a majority of local unions representing a majority of the affected members. Company and union representatives also must negotiate local supplemental agreements before wage and working conditions agreements go into effect.

Goodyear tire plants are located in Akron, Gadsden, Ala., Los Angeles, Jackson, Mich., and Topeka, Kan. Non-tire plants are at St. Marys, O., Muncie, Ind., Lincoln, Neb., New Bedford, Mass., Windsor, Vt., and North Chicago, Ill.

The master contract previously negotiated provides these agreements on working conditions and the supplemental unemployment benefit plan:

- Extension of SUB benefits in all states, in line with the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act, to increase weekly maximum benefits from $30 to $35 when an employe is eligible for state unemployment benefits, and from $52 to $57 when he is not; employes with five or more years of service may receive optional separation awards in a lump sum after being laid off more than two years.
- Vacation schedule improvements, giving three weeks after 10 years of service, four weeks after 22 years.

Still to be concluded are negotiations between URW and the U.S. Rubber and B. F. Goodrich companies.

Official Says L-G Reports Filed Smoothly

Chicago—The union reporting and disclosure provisions of the Landrum-Griffin Act have been enforced with a minimum of "litigation and headlines," Commissioner John L. Holcombe of the Bureau of Labor-Management Reports has said here.

In a speech at Roosevelt University, Holcombe said that more than 1,200 technical violations of the law have been remedied through cooperation and voluntary compliance as compared with 25 cases now in the courts.

Fears that innocent reporting mistakes would result in local union officers being subjected to fines or jail terms have "not been substantiated," he declared. Some union officials "find the [reporting] load lighter" than before the L-G Act, he added.

He said that "although many thousands of errors were included in the reports filed with us in the past year, not one union officer has been taken to court for a reporting error."

Declaring that "voluntary compliance" will continue to be the prime objective of the government, Holcombe cited the action taken by an international union after government investigators had found evidence of ballot box irregularities in a local union election. The international, Holcombe said, suspended the local officers and appointed an administrator who conducted new elections which reversed the reported results of the first vote.

Art Museum Signs Pact With SCME

New York — The Metropolitan Museum of Art has signed a collective bargaining agreement with Local 1503, State, County & Municipal Employes, benefiting about 250 workers in technical, operating, security and maintenance departments.

It was the first formal agreement with any New York museum or zoological society by AFSCME, whose Local 1501 has been trying for more than two years to win recognition from the New York Zoological Society. More than 300 workers at the Bronx Zoo and Coney Island Aquarium have been on strike against the society since Apr. 2.

The new contract at the Metropolitan Museum provides for union recognition, retirement benefits, employer-paid insurance, holiday pay, sick leave, seniority, grievance procedures and paid overtime. A no-strike clause guarantees the safety of museum exhibits.

Executive Dir. Jerry Wurf of the union's District Council 37 praised the museum's officers, trustees and negotiators for helping make "free and open" bargaining possible and said he hoped responsible Zoo and Aquarium officials would agree to negotiate a settlement also.

Wire Strike Won after Six Months

Toronto, Ont. — It took six months—all of them cold—to do it, but employes of the Industrial Wire & Cable, Ltd., in suburban Etobicoke, came out ahead in a strike.

Members of Local 24825, directly chartered by the Canadian Labour Congress, won a 5-cents-an-hour wage increase retroactive to Aug. 17, 1960, against the company's original attempt to impose a 5 percent pay cut.

They also retained the compulsory dues checkoff for members of the local and obtained the right to a plantwide vote conducted by the Labor Dept. to determine if it should be extended to all employes. They preserved the job rights of all members except for eight whose future will be determined by the Ontario Labour Relations Board.

Eighty of the original 84 strikers stayed on the picket line throughout the walkout. The CLC and affiliated locals gave strong support, with an estimated $60,000 paid in strike benefits.

Record Pay Hike Ends Canadian Rail Crisis

ployes would not fall further behind workers in the durable goods industries. The increase did not enable the railway workers to narrow the 15-cents-an-hour gap between their pay and that in durable goods.

The size of the settlement, which came after government pressure for an agreement to end the 18-month-old dispute, also meant that workers would no longer be expected to subsidize the railways through substandard wage rates.

The wage freeze was imposed last December so that the government could await the report of a Royal Commission on Transportation that was studying the financial condition of the two railways.

The commission's first report called for massive public subsidies, starting at $97 million a year, to compensate the railways for uneconomic operations carried on in the national interest.

The government is expected to announce the size of the subsidies this month. They would compensate the railways for government-imposed cheap grain rates, unprofitable branch line operations and other services that drain railway revenues.

The non-operating employes' Joint Negotiating Committee headed by Frank H. Hall, Canadian vice-president of the Railway Clerks, argued that railway workers should not have to subsidize these operations through their pay checks.

The conciliation board last November recommended pay boosts of 2 cents an hour back to Jan. 1, 1960; 5 cents from Sept. 1, 1960 and 4 percent (7 cents) from May 1, 1961.

The unions accepted the 14 cents award in November though they had asked for 25 cents. The railways rejected it, pleading that they could not afford any wage increases.

The government sided with the railways, banning a scheduled strike and freezing wages until May 15.

The non-operating unions rescheduled their strike for May 16, arguing they had taken their case before a public tribunal and had won it.

The labor negotiators are already preparing for the next round of bargaining. Talks will begin in November, since this contract expires Dec. 31, 1961.

USWA Maintains Scholarship Plan

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Members of the Steelworkers have maintained a $150,000 scholarship program this year despite widespread unemployment in the industry, according to an article in Steel Labor, the union's official monthly publication.

Eleven of the union's 29 districts in the U.S. and Canada support 24 scholarship programs, while local unions grant an additional 110 awards each year. Awards run from $75 to $4,000.

The fact that the programs were continued despite reductions in dues and personal income was described by USWA Pres. David J. McDonald as "truly sacrificial giving."

Rail Merger Rush Hit By Harrison

Cincinnati — Pres. George M. Harrison of the Railway Clerks has warned that the nation's railroads will all be government-owned "within 10 years" unless the present wave of proposed mergers is halted.

Addressing the union's annual organizational meeting here, Harrison told the 200 delegates that the prosperous railroads are merging and leaving the poor roads stranded.

"If the well-to-do roads get the green light for their mergers," he said, "the poor roads will be in bankruptcy and the government will have to step in and help them."

Declaring it "unthinkable" that the areas served by "problem" railroads will give up rail transportation, Harrison said these roads "will have to be taken over by the government."

By that time, he said, "the fat will have been picked off the carcasses of the well-to-do roads and they will be . . . ready for government ownership."

Declaring "we must fight the merger situation with all the might and resources we have," Harrison urged the delegates not to be "taken in" by management and go along with mergers simply because their own road would be the surviving one.

"You have a responsibility to every worker on every railroad in the country," he emphasized.

Declaring that mergers now contemplated would eliminate 200,000 jobs, Harrison warned that the railroads are visiting business and civic groups "trying to sell them the idea that mergers are good."

He urged railroad employes to "tell the other story. Tell it to their druggist, their doctor, their filling station operator, their grocer and all the other people who depend on their paychecks."

Community Affairs Seen Industrial Peace Base

Atlantic City, N. J.—Labor-management cooperation in community affairs might well become a base for cooperative solution of industrial problems, Machinists Pres. Al J. Hayes told the sixth annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services here.

Hayes, in a speech titled "The Union Leader as a Community Leader," said: "Patterns of cooperation and habits of trust built up in solving community problems might well carry over into the solving of industrial problems." Such cooperation could become, he asserted, "the foundation from which settlements would grow without the need for strikes, litigation and community friction."

He said "honest economic differences" must not be permitted "to obscure the fundamental belief of both [management and labor] in our economic and political system."

In his speech read by Charles West, Hayes' assistant, the IAM president cited some of the reasons why union officers do not take part in community affairs and "some reasons why they should."

- Because they are "extremely busy men," union officers "duck the opportunity and the obligation to serve community needs." However, it is one of the "normal obligations" of union leadership, he pointed out.
- Many union leaders believe they are "not wanted" because of "newspaper reports about racketeers, corruption, and strikes." But the labor movement "reflects and typifies all the qualities, good and bad, of the American people," Hayes asserted, adding that closer cooperation with other groups in seeking solutions to community problems would be "mutually beneficial."
- Union leaders themselves "have some prejudices" and tend to look upon business and professional people as "stuffed shirts," he said, and this is "just as erroneous as the belief that all labor officials are crooks or racketeers.

"Union participation in community affairs is important for its own sake," not just for "good public relations," Hayes declared, since there are times when "organized labor will have to take an unpopular position, regardless of what it will do to our public relations."

Doctors Warned on Health Plan Tactics

Omaha, Neb.—Organized medicine, through its support of the Kerr-Mills law passed by Congress last year, has opened the way to greater government involvement in the "operation, organization and control of medicine," Auto Workers Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock has warned.

Addressing a meeting of the Nebraska State Medical Association here, Woodcock told the doctors that in their "virulent opposition" to placing health care for the aged under social security, they have "accepted an extension of nagging local regulation" of the medical profession.

The Kerr-Mills law provides for federal grants to finance some health care for senior citizens in those states where legislatures appropriate added funds. Aid would be made available through public welfare departments which submit applicants for assistance to what Woodcock called "degrading and humiliating" means tests.

The UAW official said that organized medicine endorsed the Kerr-Mills approach "reluctantly and only as what medicine conceived to be the lesser of two evils." He characterized it as "charity medicine, unworthy of America and degrading to those it purports to assist."

He said the Kerr-Mills program is "bound up in red tape . . . which regulates the agencies and institutions that can be used; . . . restricts the choice of physician; . . . (and) pays doctors on a cut-rate basis."

He urged the doctors to abandon their opposition to financing health care through social security, and declared that "virtually the only time doctors are heard to speak up on broad social or economic problems is when they stand in opposition to a remedial program."

Woodcock added:

"Too often, the image is transmitted of a profession interested more in income than healing, one that not only fights proposed solutions to real problems but officially denies the existence of the problems themselves."

In Senate Testimony:

Labor Backs Program for Hospital, Medical School Aid

The nation's "urgent problems" in the health care field call for prompt congressional action on grants for expansion and improvement of hospital and nursing home facilities, medical school construction and medical and dental scholarships, the AFL-CIO has declared.

At the same time, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared in testimony before the House Commerce Committee and a Senate Public Welfare subcommittee, Congress must strike down the "economic barrier that stands between many persons and the care they need" by approving Administration proposals to finance health care for the aged through social security.

Testifying on Administration proposals for nursing-home construction grants, contained in a bill sponsored by Rep. Oren Harris (D-Ark.), the federation spokesman cited a current deficit of 261,054 nursing home beds. This figure, he said, includes 134,000 classified as "nonacceptable," on the basis of fire and health hazards.

Biemiller described as "woefully inadequate" the Administration request that the present authorization of $10 million in matching federal grants for nursing home construction be doubled. The full $20 million thus provided, he told the House committee, would make possible an annual construction of facilities to provide only 5,840 new beds—2.2 percent of the number needed.

He cited earlier testimony by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to the effect that the states have indicated they could use $61 million in federal funds for nursing home facilities.

The AFL-CIO spokesman endorsed Kennedy's proposal for a $10 million initial annual appropriation for grants to states and communities to help develop programs of medical research and programs for greater utilization of health facilities.

He also asked for a program of long-term federal loans to nonprofit, prepaid group practice plans, as proposed by Rep. George M. Rhodes (D-Pa.).

Appearing before the Senate subcommittee headed by Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.), Biemiller voiced the federation's support of the Administration-backed Hill bill calling for a 10-year program of matching grants for construction of medical and dental schools. The bill would provide $25 million in federal funds the first year and $75 million each year for the next nine years.

The bill also calls for federal scholarship funds, on the basis of $1,500 per scholarship annually, for a total equal to 25 percent of the new medical and dental school enrollment each year, plus an additional grant of $1,000 per scholarship to help schools meet necessary expenses.

The program of scholarships and construction, Biemiller said, is "the keystone of a sound health structure for America," because "the soundest reorganization of health care, and the most liberal provisions for financing it, will have little meaning unless we have the personnel to carry it out."

In his attack on the "economic barrier" which separates people from needed health care, the federation spokesman said labor, through collective bargaining, will continue to improve existing health plans and create new ones for its members.

"But such arrangements can't do the whole job," he declared. "They must be supplemented by legislation."

The AFL-CIO, he said, actively supports the Anderson-King bill which would use the social security financing method to provide hospital, nursing home, outpatient and home health services for 13.5 million persons over 65.

Maine to Probe 'Work' Lobbyists

Augusta, Me.—State Atty. Gen. Frank E. Hancock has told newsmen here that he will investigate the alleged lobbying activities of two officials of the National Right-to-Work Committee.

The investigation had been requested by two members of the Maine legislature—Rep. Cleveland Curtis (R) and Rep. Leonce Jobin (D). They cited newspaper accounts of activities within the state of Reed Larson, director, and Glen Green, education director, of the national "right-to-work" group.

Neither official, they asserted, has registered under the state's lobbying act.

Kennedy designed to halt labor-management disputes that could slow the space program.

At a May 10 press conference, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg described any missile program delays as presenting a problem "of the utmost urgency," and said he was "deeply concerned" about the need for finding a solution.

Goldberg said he had begun a round of conferences on the problem, including meetings with Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara, Air Force officials, McClellan and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. These will be followed by meetings with public experts, a BCTD committee to be headed by Haggerty, representatives of industrial unions, and industry officials.

From these meetings, the Secretary indicated, would come recommendations to the President that could form the basis for executive action designed to remove obstacles to an accelerated program.

Haggerty declared at a press conference that the department and its constitutent unions are anxious to see the missile base situation eased, and expressed the hope that any program formulated by the Administration would take into account "all of the problems" involved.

He explained that much of the "discontent on the job" arose from the government's "concurrency" program—a plan under which development of missiles and the construction of launching sites went forward simultaneously. As modifications became necessary in missiles, he said, building tradesmen were forced repeatedly to rip out concrete emplacements, miles of tubing and wiring and rebuild the launching sites to new specifications.

Haggerty spoke critically at the press conference of workmen who participate in wildcat strikes at missile projects, and emphasized that workers at these sites should be men "who can be expected to remain on the job."

In two weeks of hearings, the McClellan subcommittee heard testimony from government contractors and military personnel connected with the missile program, centering on strikes, slowdowns, jurisdictional disputes and overtime payments to workers.

Haggerty included in his testimony an article in the April 1961 issue of the "Constructor," official magazine of the Associated General Contractors, showing that prior to Aug. 1, 1960, "time lost due to strikes amounted to 1.5 percent of the total labor," and that this figure had since been reduced to "no more than one-half of 1 percent."

He emphasized that there can be "no complacency" about the missile program, and that work stoppages —"whether the fault of the union, the contractor or the contracting agency—delay the program."

It was for this reason, the BCTD president said, that the department unanimously approved its policy statement earlier this year. It called for exhausting all available procedures and methods for peaceful settlement of disputes before a walkout, and prohibited state or local building trades councils from giving "aid, assistance or support to any local union which violates this policy."

Haggerty recalled that during the fall of 1960, in the wake of public controversy over whether the missile program had fallen behind schedule, then Defense Sec. Thomas S. Gates met with labor leaders at the Pentagon concerning the program's status.

Among those present, he disclosed, were Meany; Gordon M. Freeman, president of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Peter T. Schoemann, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; Al J. Hayes, president of the Machinists; Haggerty; Nicholas Zonarich, representing Walter P. Reuther, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; and Frank Hoffman, representing Steelworkers Pres. David J. McDonald.

At that meeting, he said, Gates "explained the urgency of the program [and] conceded that the lack of preliminary organization was responsible for many of its difficulties."

To back up his contention that non-labor factors were "primarily" responsible for any slowdowns, Haggerty noted that at his Apr. 12 press conference, Kennedy called for "re-establishing efficient, technically competent management" for the program.

He also quoted Lieut.-Gen. Emerson C. Itschner, former chief of Army Engineers, who said in a speech Nov. 29, 1960, that "jurisdictional strikes by building trades unions played only a relatively minor part" in delays.

Answering charges that overtime at missile bases produced weekly paychecks for workers ranging from $287 to $520 a week, Haggerty said "the decision to work a job overtime is the decision of management or the contracting agency."

The labor movement, he said, fought for a 40-hour week "to protect the health and welfare of the membership." Overtime provisions in labor agreements "are intended to deter the actual working of overtime hours." The BCTD, he said, does not "condone or approve the pyramiding of overtime at missile sites."

How the Other Half Lives May Change

Dillon Assails Lush Expense Accounts

"Business expenses," totaling more than $1.1 million over a four-year period, for a fleet of corporation-owned yachts used "for entertaining customers and prospective customers."

Frequent trips to Las Vegas, Nev., and Havana, plus trips timed to coincide with "some New Year's Day bowl game," all charged as deductible expenses because the trips were "to see some concern about selling."

An annual hunting trip, including the use of a company-owned plane and the cost of a Wyoming hunting lodge, for the president of a corporation and four business acquaintances.

A corporation where "officers' salaries are held to a minimum," and where a wide variety of entertainment, vacation, travel and food and beverage expenses are paid by the firm and deducted as business expenses.

Country club and supper club membership fees, plus lavish "entertainment expenses," racked up by a father and son who were president and vice president of their own corporation.

These are fragments from an elaborate picture of America's growing "expense account society" painted for Congress by the Kennedy Administration.

The details were contained in a carefully documented 78-page report presented by Treasury Sec. Douglas Dillon to the House Ways & Means Committee to back up Pres. Kennedy's requests for action to close gaping loopholes in the income tax structure. Through the loophole of "excessive business expenditures," the Administration said, some $250 million a year is siphoned away from the treasury.

In his tax message to Congress, Kennedy hit out at what he called "widespread abuses" of expense accounts, to the extent that "expense account living has become a by-word in the American scene." The President declared forcefully: "The slogan — 'it's deductible' — should pass from our scene."

The Administration called for the complete disallowance of all business entertainment—not only the use of yachts and hunting trips but also nightclubs, theaters, prizefights, club dues and most food and beverage costs. It also urged strict ceilings be imposed on business gifts, expenses of business trips and excessive personal living expenses.

"These measures," Kennedy declared, "will strengthen both our tax structure and the moral fiber of our society."

In his testimony, Dillon declared that "the feature common to all of these expenses is that they confer substantial tax-free personal benefits which are in large measure a substitute for personal living expenses."

To tighten up on expenses, the Administration urged that a limit be placed on daily deductions. The maximum per diem rate authorized for government employes for travel in the U. S. is $12—a figure which the Budget Bureau has recommended be hiked to $15.

On this basis, Dillon told Congress, the limit for business deductions for food and hotel charges should be set at $30 a day.

The Treasury Secretary told the committee that Internal Revenue Service audits of 38,000 business returns resulted in the disallowing of $28.3 million worth of deductions for travel and entertainment, resulting in additional tax revenue of $11.1 million—but that millions of dollars more of such expenditures were allowed because of liberal court interpretations of what constituted "legitimate" business expenses.

The courts, he said, have permitted such lavish living—at the taxpayers' expense—in such instances as these:

- A $16,000 African hunting safari for the president of a dairy firm and his wife, including stays in London, Paris and Rome.
- More than $10,000 worth of expenses for maintaining a cabin cruiser for the president of a brewing company "because the company's plant was located in a slum area where it was not feasible to . . . meet with customers."
- A charge of $10,000 for redecorating the first floor of the home of the president of a manufacturing firm "for entertaining customers," and $6,600 "depreciation" on a swimming pool adjacent to the president's home because it was "purchased for business use and in anticipation of benefits to the business."
- Claims of $187,000 over a three-year period for a "luxurious hunting lodge" for a manufacturing firm's principal officer and used for entertaining customers and key personnel of the firm.
- A deduction of $353,000 for maintaining "luxurious facilities on a subtropical island" for entertaining executives and key personnel of the firm, accompanied by their families, plus $90,000 for the expenses of an airplane used to ferry visitors to the resort.
- Expenses by a supplier, over a six-year period, which included $111,000 for operating a yacht; $116,000 for a ranch and hunting lodges; $126,000 for night-club expenses; and $119,000 for "other entertainment."
- Total deductions of $666,000 by three taxpayers over a six-year period for leasing a hunting lodge and duck hunting preserve at which customers of each firm are entertained by company executives.

CLOSER COOPERATION between unions and universities in planning university labor education programs was urged by delegates to the Eastern Labor Education Conference in Washington. Addressing the session above is Chancellor George D. Stoddard of New York University.

World's Fair Unions Pledge 'No Stoppage'

New York—Labor and management have given "no-strike, no-lockout" pledges on construction involved in building the 1964 New York World's Fair, and have joined in a move to establish a joint advisory committee and arbitration machinery to forestall work stoppages.

Robert Moses, president of the fair corporation, said the pledge came from the New York Building Congress, the Building Trades Employers' Association, the General Contractors Employers Association, Inc., and the New York City AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Council.

Moses said a 14-member committee would endeavor to work out any labor-management problems that may arise during construction. Twelve members of the group—six each from labor and industry—will be voting members, while the remaining two will be non-voting members.

Chairman of the committee will be Peter W. Eller, former board chairman of the Building Trade Employers Association, while the secretary will be Walter M. Colleran, counsel to the BCT council.

Dividend Tax Bonanza Repeal Asked by Labor

cent of American families owned any stock whatsoever in publicly held corporations." He estimated that "less than 6 percent of all families own 64 percent of the value of all stock."

Only 5.8 percent of families with incomes under $5,000 own stock, Ruttenberg said, with the percentage increasing sharply to the point where 55.4 percent of those with incomes of $15,000 or more own stock.

Concentrated at Top

"It is clear," he said, "that not only the dividends themselves but the tax benefits in the form of the exclusions and credits are all highly concentrated in the upper-income brackets."

He described as "without merit" the claim that special treatment of dividend income is needed to avoid having this income taxed twice—once via the corporation tax and again as income tax when dividends are distributed to the stockholders.

Ruttenberg said there are "many kinds of double taxation," pointing out that "a person who pays income tax on his earnings and then uses what is left to buy a car, on which he pays a federal excise tax, is paying a double tax but gets no special treatment."

In addition, he said, "double taxation" of dividend income would exist "only if the corporation bore the entire weight of the corporation tax," whereas most economists agree that "some, if not all, of the corporation tax is borne by the consumer in the form of higher prices or by the employes . . . in the form of lower wages."

The AFL-CIO spokesman said there is "no justification whatsoever for retaining the present system" of special dividend provisions.

Small Firms Told to Seek Export Trade

The Intl. Cooperation Administration has launched a new campaign to induce American small businessmen to enter the export market and spur foreign trade.

The specific objective is to get thousands of small business firms bidding on goods sought by foreign nations with funds made available through the U. S. foreign aid program.

The U. S. Dept. of Commerce estimates that out of 300,000 manufacturers in America, not more than 12,000 are engaged in export trade. The ICA Office of Small Business believes that many more small firms could compete in the export market if they had all the avaiable information.

The office, headed by Charles A. Richards, is issuing a series of circulars and mailings to small firms encouraging them to enter the export market and offering advice on markets, credit and other details of the export business.

It is estimated that ICA financing of procurement by foreign nations runs about $1 billion annually.

IAM, Airline To Arbitrate Strike Issues

More than 1,000 members of the Machinists have ended a six-day strike against National Airlines and agreed to return to work under settlement terms proposed by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg and Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., of the National Mediation Board.

Under the agreement, accepted in a referendum vote by National Airlines mechanics, inspectors and ground crews, unresolved issues will be settled in final and binding arbitration by Nathan P. Feinsinger, University of Wisconsin law professor.

Unsettled Issues

The unresolved issues involve vacations; automatic progression to senior stock clerk and new classification of lead stock clerk; passes; seniority; and rates of pay for non-mechanical employes.

All other issues were settled by agreements reached in negotiations before the strike started May 2. Among them was agreement on a 15-cent wage increase retroactive to Oct. 1, 1960, for mechanics and inspectors, and 8 cents next Oct. 1.

The memorandum on arbitration provides that the arbitrator shall consult with accountants appointed by the union and the company and that the company shall return employes to work within a week.

Goldberg commended the disputants and the National Mediation Board for their efforts to reach a settlement. It was the third time since Pres. John F. Kennedy's inauguration Jan. 20 that Goldberg had helped mediate a major dispute.

Letters Held Key to Shift In House Vote

Letters from "folks back home" played a major part in passage of the minimum wage bill, an AFL-CIO spokesman told reporters on Labor News Conference, the federation's new radio public affairs report.

Andrew J. Biemiller, director of the federation's Dept. of Legislation, said the letters and the development of a new "working coalition" in the House were the two important factors that produced House passage of the bill.

The new grouping included about 30 liberal Republicans, practically all of the northern and western Democrats, and a "good slice of the southern Democrats," Biemiller declared.

Stating that the public had effectively conveyed to Congress that it was backing up the Kennedy program, Biemiller said the development of the new group "bodes well" for other legislative proposals from the President.

Interviewed by John Herling, Washington correspondent for the National Newspaper Syndicate, and Editor Harry Conn of Press Associates Inc., Biemiller was a guest on the new program carried Sundays at 4:35 p. m. EST by Mutual Broadcasting System. He made these additional points:

- Chances of passing the Anderson-King health bill this session are "excellent." The bill, supported by Pres. John F. Kennedy and the AFL-CIO, would provide a health care program for the elderly through the social security method.
- Public opinion is swinging behind the Kennedy program, and Kennedy supporters in Congress are working more effectively.
- The economy still needs programs to generate more purchasing power, like the public works program endorsed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and the AFL-CIO suggestion of a temporary tax cut in the form of a $10-a-week forgiveness on withholding taxes for a maximum of 10 weeks.
- Labor hopes Kennedy will send a message to Congress asking federal minimum standards for unemployment compensation, plus a program to meet long-term joblessness. Such a program might provide for retraining of workers.

Biemiller expressed support of Kennedy proposals for passage of the Trade Adjustment Act, to assist industries hard hit by foreign competition; for an international conference of textile-producing nations, and possibly for a system of international quotas set by agreement of the nations involved.

In the Vanguard

NEARLY A QUARTER-CENTURY AGO Congress passed the first minimum wage bill providing a wage floor of 25 cents an hour. Passage of what proved to be the last major New Deal reform measure came after a bitter congressional fight highlighted by hysterical charges that a 25-cents-an-hour minimum wage would bankrupt the economy.

The nation "survived" the wage floor legislation and the minimum wage moved gradually to 40 cents an hour. In 1949, a second battle was waged to increase minimum gross pay for a 40-hour week above the $16-a-week level. This struggle was not so bitter, but the price of hiking the wage floor to 75 cents an hour was the elimination of some workers previously covered by the federal legislation.

In 1955, the third minimum wage battle produced a floor of $1 an hour, but all attempts to extend coverage to the millions who were totally unprotected were defeated.

The fourth phase of the struggle, with the emphasis on expanding coverage and bringing the wage floor to $1.25, found the coalition still strong enough to prevent meaningful action in 1960. Eight months later, with the Kennedy Administration taking a major role, the conservative coalition was cracked on the coverage issue and the minimum increased in steps until all protected workers eventually will be at the $1.25 level.

The 1961 amendments to the wage-hour law are giant strides toward the elimination of poverty-pegged wages and unconscionable hours. But there is much yet to be done. There are great gaps in the present coverage provisions which leave unprotected workers in the lowest paid industries and services—laundry workers, hotel workers, and others.

There are also the millions who work in offices or plants or stores who are not covered under the interstate commerce definition and who must rely on state legislatures for wage-hour legislation.

The struggle for a decent standard of living for all workers will never end as long as there is one worker victimized by an avaricious employer seeking a competitive advantage on the basis of sweatshop wages and hours.

The labor movement has been in the vanguard of this struggle to increase living standards for millions who hold no union card, pay no union dues. It will remain in the vanguard until the battle is finally won.

Premature Death Reports

THE ENTHUSIASTS who are heralding the demise of the Dixiecrat-GOP coalition on the basis of the votes on depressed areas aid, minimum wage extension and other measures enacted in the past week have not done their political arithmetic homework.

The Administration has chipped away enough votes from the coalition to secure passage of its carefully shaped program—a program geared to the bedrock realities of what can be done as opposed to the non-vote-counting approach of what needs to be done.

Votes have been picked up from southern Democrats on individual bills and the group of liberal Republicans in the House is growing despite the keep-'em-in-line efforts of Minority Leader Halleck.

The technique of picking up a few badly-needed votes on a particular bill has involved putting on the line the full powers of the White House.

The conservative coalition is still very much in business and will be very much in evidence if the President unveils a long-range growth program of a wider scope than the approach to date.

Cruikshank Tells:

How to Get or How Not to Get An Effective Medical Care Plan

THERE ARE SEVERAL WAYS of how not to get what we want in medical care. The first is that we cannot make available the kind of medical care that we wish for our members simply by providing money to pay for doctors' services and hospital care. The mistakes that we have made in this direction are understandable, because as plans for health care developed, beginning in the days of the Great Depression, it seemed to many of us that the main obstacle to getting medical care was the lack of money to pay for it.

We saw people deprived of medical care because they didn't have money, and we concluded that if they could pay for the care it would be possible to make it available to everybody. This accounts, I think, for our overconfidence in approaching the problem as one of simply providing cash to pay for medical services. We have now learned that having available funds does not necessarily insure medical care and certainly does not insure high-quality medical care.

We cannot get what we want by relying on a campaign of damning the doctors in our community. This is not a contest in condemning or exposing the shortcomings of the medical profession, although we know there are many. But we can't provide what our members need simply by screaming about the failures and the shortcomings of the present methods of distributing medical care and services.

We have learned also that we cannot really provide the kind of care that our members need by making arrangements with any individual or any fractional group of professional men that happen to come along and offer their medical wares. There are some individuals, and sometimes they are organized into groups, who, seeing the difficulties that the labor organizations are facing in this field, approach them with a view not so much to meeting the needs of the group as to making a fast buck for themselves.

If you are going to provide medical care, provide complete comprehensive care for all of the people in the group and for every individual in the group. Don't just start with a specialty or an emphasis on one particular medical need.

Another way not to get what you want is by just building a building. Of course, any medical group will have to be housed in a structure of some kind. Often an existing facility can be used. But whether you use an existing structure or have to build one, the obvious point has to be constantly borne in mind that the building does not make the program. It is purely incidental to it.

When you are developing a program, you can't do it by starting out to build a monument to some honored brother. The objectives of a health program are such that they cannot be achieved by simply setting up a fund or building an edifice to the memory of a deserving brother.

NOW HOW DO WE INSURE or make people certain of health? That is really the crux of our problem.

Here are some of the ways that we go about doing this. First, a program must be soundly financed. This is not a contradiction of my warning that you could not provide good health programs simply by providing money. I am now pointing out that you can't have a good health program without money, and both are true. It is just that we must not look on the supply of ready cash as a completed program. We look at it only as the beginning.

The second thing we must do is to develop or use existing arrangements to make available the best complete medical care for the most practical size group in the community. In some cases this will be a single large union. In others it will be a group of unions. In some it will provide care for both union and non-union people in the community. It is important, however, to think of the optimum size group for the efficient organization of a medical care plan. The need must determine the pattern. There is nothing wrong with starting small and growing with the years. It is much more important to have a good medical program than a big medical program.

And then for whatever membership group you have in the community, it is most important of all to arrange for the best medical personnel available.

If the leadership of the medical profession in your community is willing to work with you or can be persuaded to, this is most desirable. If it is not possible to get help from top medical personnel from within the community, it will be necessary to go outside the community. In any case it is highly important to have members of the profession advise you on the medical aspects of the program and help you find the other members of the profession who are to provide the care for your membership.

Morgan Says:

Major Reorganization of CIA Seen in Wake of Cuban Fiasco

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

KNOWLEDGEABLE HEADS believe that a major reorganization of the Central Intelligence Agency will be one of the principal results of a vigorous reexamination and reorientation of "our forces, our tactics and our institutions" which Pres. Kennedy promised in the wake of the Cuban fiasco.

Morgan

It is responsibly presumed that the CIA, which master-minded—if that is the term—the recent paramilitary operation against Castro, will be shorn of that kind of activity and left in future to concentrate on the gathering and evaluation of intelligence. Probably the black art department, so-called, will become the Pentagon's baby with tighter liaison with the Secretary of State.

In face of that prospect there is a mixture of relief and sadness here. Relief because of the stolid but reluctant belief on the part of many in both the executive and legislative branches of government that the CIA, largely unaccountable in the past to higher authority, has vastly overextended its hand into the actual shaping of U.S. policy, not only in the Cuban affair but in many other foreign fields. "It had become," says one high State Dept. figure, "an empire to itself." "A sort of second State Dept.," echoes a senator, "with a secret budget that is probably many times more what State has to spend" and with influence that has sometimes vetoed or changed policy in the field sometimes against the protest or even without the knowledge of the ambassador involved.

And yet there is genuine sorrow for the anguish inside CIA over both past and impending events. From Dir. Allen Dulles down the unnumbered minions of the agency are dedicated men and women who have largely had to celebrate their successes in private while suffering reputed failures or faux pas in public. This may be due in part to the fact that we Americans are somewhat new to this spy business and while we may be titillated by some of the mysterious aspects of it we are inclined to resent it and be uncomfortable with it.

In one of his more memorable columns, the New York Herald Tribune's Art Buchwald wrote from Hong Kong after the U-2 affair, chiding the then GOP Administration a little for making a clean breast of it in what he called the Eisenhower "open spies policy." But while sophisticated foreigners are bemused and startled, we seem to think nothing at all of the fact that for years the CIA director, deputy directors and other officials have made speeches about the country, have written articles and had articles written about them and are soon to move into a mammoth, multi-million-dollar new headquarters on the right Virginia bank of the Potomac.

WHETHER THE CIA comes under a congressional "watchdog" committee—and there will be resistance to this in Congress itself—whether under a version of the military inspector-general system or what, the chances are that it will be less in the public eye.

The fact that the CIA has blundered in the past would not appear to be the most disturbing aspect of its activities—anybody can make mistakes and sooner or later does. But there is a possibility that the CIA, in its splendid and independent isolation, did not fully realize what a frustration and grief its plans and actions were causing other government planners.

Behind the ill-starred Cuban story, there is substantial reason to believe that the CIA intervened in favor of rightist elements in Laos last December, dumping neutralist Premier Souvanna Phouma from power. Now British, French, Indian and some of our own officials argue that was a tragic mistake which intensified Communist opposition; that if we had supported a neutral Laos then as we are supposedly supporting one now, the situation might have been far less critical. Now it develops there was CIA involvement with Nationalist Chinese soldiers in northern Burma which highly embarrassed the Kennedy Administration some weeks ago.

The common threat seeming to run through all these operations, in Laos, Burma, Cuba and elsewhere, is one tying the CIA to right-wing elements. The forces of the right, the segments of the status quo or the status quo ante have not been spectacularly successful in adjusting to the forces of change of the 20th Century, let alone leading them. Instead they have been stumbling blocks over which it has been easy for the Communists to push us. How much more has to happen before we realize that? A shakeup of CIA will have been to no purpose if the government and the country don't grasp the fact that to compete with the Communist revolution we are going to have to display some American revolutionary tendencies ourselves.

Washington Reports:

Reuss Sees His Aid Bill a Spur To Needed Local Improvements

REP. HENRY REUSS (D-Wis.) has claimed that his local public works bill "will get into motion quickly, in localities large and small, the kind of improvements the people want and which are very much needed, but which localities have not been able to undertake because of lack of funds."

Reuss made the statement as he was interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 460 radio stations.

Rep. Thor Tollefson (R-Wash.), also backing the bill on the same program, pointed out that many projects are held up because localities have constitutional limitations on the amount they can borrow.

The Reuss bill would provide localities with grants in total not to exceed $1 billion, to take care of one-third of the cost of projects such as parking lots, airports, fire stations, police stations, sidewalks, water facilities and similiar projects.

Both Reuss and Tollefson argued that such a measure is necessary to reduce unemployment, which persists despite upturns in production.

"The grants would act as a stimulant in the same manner as was the case with the water pollution control act," Tollefson observed. "In the few years that this program has been in effect, federal grants stimulated the expenditure of more than $600 million compared with $200 million in an equivalent period prior to passage of the act."

REUSS EXPLAINED that his bill would give priority to projects "which are ready to be started, on which ground can be broken within 90 days and which can be completed within 12 months."

"This is an emergency program," he said, "to put men back to work particularly in the construction industry, where more than 20 percent of the work force has been jobless and, at the same time, to provide things that the communities need."

Tollefson said something like $20 or $22 billion in projects have already been approved by Congress, and "have run the gambit of every test, the Army Engineers, the Rivers and Harbors Committee, the Public Works Committees, and Congress itself."

The Reuss bill would prohibit states and localities from using new federal funds to pay the cost of projects already under way. It provides that funds should go only for projects "that aren't already planned and which are over and above the normal level of projects for the last several years." Further, he said, the grants would cease "as soon as our unemployment goes down to 4 percent."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE NOTION THAT a government regulatory agency is supposed to be controlled by the industry it was created to regulate got a rough going over when the new chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, Newton N. Minow, told the National Association of Broadcasters some of his plans.

Minow bluntly reminded the people who run the networks and hold the licenses for operation of television stations that "the people own the airwaves" and that he himself "did not come to Washingon to idly observe" the "squandering" of the people's "precious natural resource."

"I understand that many people feel," he remarked, "that in the past licenses were often renewed pro forma. I say to you now: Renewal will not be pro forma in the future. There is nothing permanent or sacred about a broadcast license."

He promised that when a three-year license expires, the FCC will hold "a well-advertised public hearing, right in the community you have promised to serve," so that people in the homes that television enters can tell both the license holders and the FCC "what's been going on"—how much educational TV there has been, how many public service programs, whether the commercials are in grossly bad taste.

He is "deeply concerned" at the concentration of power in the hands of the television networks, Minow went on, so that "many local stations have foregone any efforts at local programming, with little use of live talent and local service."

Former Gov. LeRoy Collins of Florida, who recently became president of the broadcasters' trade association, indicated that Minow's comment seemed somewhat stringent—although Collins himself had warned the broadcasters they must improve the quality of their programming.

A prediction may safely be made: To carry out his ideas to break through the barriers that now check development of education TV, to lay the ground work for greater competition so that "we may have twice as many channels operating, we may have a half-dozen networks instead of three," Minow will need the full support of his chief in the White House and of the general public.

Years ago the broadcasting industry proved it could be untiring in seeking to force out FCC members who talked and acted decisively about the responsibility of radio for public service. James L. Fly, a former chairman, learned how assaults could be launched in Congress, how his every action was studied by enemies. Minow is not going to have an easy trip.

THEY ARE SHOOTING AT Stewart Udall, who was appointed to be a toughminded Secretary of the Interior who would protect the public domain from the self-proclaimed free enterprisers.

First they complained that Udall thought it was just as proper for him to try to get progressive bills passed as it was for Mr. Eisenhower's Cabinet members to try to block progressive bills. Now they have him confessing "embarrassment" over disclosure that J. K. Evans, a "friend" representing a foreign-controlled oil company, wrote letters to oil-and-gas industry figures mentioning Udall's name and asking for Democratic campaign contributions in the guise of ticket purchases for the President's birthday dinner.

It's all right for Udall to be "embarrassed" by the Evans letter, one supposes, but he shouldn't misunderstand the reason for the conservative potshots at him.

His opponents aren't afraid he will do improper favors for the oil-and-gas industry in return for political contributions helping pay off the Democratic debt. They are pretty sure he won't—and that's what the shooting is about.

The industry would very much prefer a Secretary it could think was more pliable. So would the private electric utilities, which fared well under Mr. Eisenhower's Sec. Douglas McKay in the Hells Canyon case and had White House aid in fighting to restrict the territory served by the Tennessee Valley Authority.

UNEMPLOYMENT would be reduced by a public works bill he is sponsoring, Rep. Henry Reuss (D-Wis.), left, declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Ruess and Rep. Thor Tollefson (R-Wash.) are interviewed by Harry W. Flannery, AFL-CIO radio coordinator.

How to Buy:

Neuberger Bill Would Handcuff Real Experts at Fooling Public

By Sidney Margolius

WOULD YOU LIKE A COP with muscles to help make sure you aren't deceived, by real experts at deceiving, when you go out to buy?

You'd have a powerful policeman on your beat if the U.S. Senate would approve Sen. Maurine Neuberger's (D-Ore.) proposal to establish a Committee on Consumer Interests. The committee would investigate, inform and figure out legislation to halt the many gay deceivers who sharpshoot the public today.

The proposal is backed by 15 other senators. But ironically, there has been no public support. The proposal is idling away. It will die for lack of gas unless people start telling their senators they want this committee.

Of all the proposals now being advanced in Washington for protecting consumers, this watchdog committee is potentially the most quickly useful, as shown by the success of the Kefauver subcommittee's investigation of drug prices. The drug hearings not only spurred efforts by unions and other groups to find ways of buying medicines at reduced prices, but actually have helped deflate drug prices. Ever since June, the Labor Dept.'s Consumer Price Index has shown a gradual decline in prices of prescriptions and other medicines.

Three leading deceivers currently begging for congressional investigation, and for your own awareness to avoid being fooled, are:

● The increasing trend to what we can only call imitation foods—watered meats, ready-prepared foods with various cheap fillers, etc.

For example, the Kansas State Food & Drug Division is carrying on a running battle against products sold under such names as "Chef's Delight," "Dairy Spread," "Protein Loaf," etc. Evan Wright, division director, says these products are in fact, imitation processed cheese spreads. Such "cheese" products are sold all over these days.

Wright told this reporter that some of these products contain as little as 10 percent cheese and as much as 65 percent water.

Wright reported that state food and drug officials throughout the U.S. are opposed to the addition of excess water to smoked pork products. The U.S. Agriculture Dept. is holding public hearings in May in various cities to review the permission to add water to smoked ham granted by the previous administration.

● The great amount of buyer-fooling packaging, making it difficult for you to know what you get for your money.

In June, a Senate Anti-Trust subcommittee headed by Sen. Philip Hart (D-Mich.) is going to hold hearings on this trend to fool-the-eye packages. There's plenty to investigate, and you could waste a lot of money between now and June if you don't look for the tiny print stating the number of ounces.

Recently the Grand Street Consumers Co-Op in New York showed a display of fool-the-eye packages which startled co-op store customers.

The co-op reported that "All" had dropped from 23 pounds, 10 ounces, to just 20 pounds, while the price remained the same. Similarly, Kraft caramels changed from a 16-ounce bag to 14-ounce, with the price still 39 cents. And, the co-op suggested, try to find the tiny "14 ounces" on the cellophane caramel bag while you're being pushed by a crowd of other shoppers.

Are you also aware of the candy-mint boxes? The Food & Drug Administration recently won an important court decision in a case against Delson Thin Mints. The evidence showed that less than half of the total volume of the container and only 75 percent of its practical volume was filled with mints. The remainder of the usable space was taken up with hollow cardboard dividers and end pieces. The court held that you have a right to expect that a non-transparent container of food is reasonably full.

● Deceptive interest rates—the most dangerous fooler of them all. Senator Paul Douglas' (D-Ill.) "truth-in-lending" bill has been reintroduced with the co-sponsorship of 20 other senators. The bill would require that you be told the true annual interest rate when you buy on time or borrow money.

As this department has warned many times, rates quoted by banks and finance companies, such as $6 or $7 per $100, are actually true annual interest rates of approximately 12 or 14 percent. Rates quoted by small-loan companies, such as 2 percent a month, are actually 24 percent a year.

Vance Austin, managing director of the Credit Union National Association, warns consumers that passage of this bill is vital. "It's necessary to know the annual rate you pay for credit so you can compare different deals," he advises. "If the price tag clearly shows the simple annual interest rate, you'll be able to make an intelligent comparison of fees charged by different lenders and installment sellers."

'Land of Promise':

Eighth Graders Like AFL-CIO's Movie

Louisville, Ky.—Eighth grade pupils of St. Raphael's School have their own ideas about what makes a good movie—and they definitely liked "Land of Promise," an AFL-CIO film.

The movie was produced for network presentation for Labor Day 1960 and now is available for wider showings. A half-hour documentary, it traces the progress of labor from the days of the sweatshop and the blacklist, through the depression to the present. It tells how unions won for many workers a chance to enjoy leisure and better living standards.

St. Raphael's School showed the film on loan from the Louisville Free Public Library, and asked pupils for written comments. Executive Sec. Sam Ezelle of the Kentucky State AFL-CIO sent the letters to the parent federation, along with letters from Dorothy L. Day of the library's audio-visual department, and from Sister M. Amelia, the eighth-grade teacher.

"Thank you for suggesting that we show 'Land of Promise,'" Sr. Amelia wrote. "The students of this generation have a difficult time even to imagine the terrible working conditions of yesteryear."

Student John Keyes said he thought "Land of Promise" was a "very good movie" because it brought out "many good points about the advantages of America, the functions of labor and the organization of labor unions."

Because the movie was "entertaining as well as educational," young Keyes said it "made me realize how important labor is and how difficult it would be to survive" without unions.

Mary Jo Ashcraft said the film "brought out the good and bad points" of unions and showed that Americans "still are fighting for the rights of people." She liked some of the songs but disliked the "music they had when it showed the ships and planes" during war.

Bill Yates liked the picture but decided that "some important things were left out." For instance, he said, no reference was made to the papal encyclicals on labor and their effect in improving working conditions.

Most pointed of the criticisms came from Forrest Schoenbachler, who thought the film was "very good except for a few things." Saying that there should be "more arbitrating before a strike," the young critic also objected to sitdown strikes, people who "operate the unions illegally," and those who "threaten" others to "join or not join" a union.

"There are disadvantages as well as advantages," he concluded his report.

Ricky Beyer enjoyed the historical content because it "blended in well" with other studies in history and civics. "However," he said, "I didn't think much of the singing."

The music "did not fit with the background" in the opinion of John Ising, who found the picture "very good because it told us how our unions were started" and how they developed.

"I liked the picture," wrote Bobby James, "because it brought out how the union workers help the nation. When the union worker is prosperous the country is prosperous. The money he earns goes to the community" in which he lives. Bobby, however, did not like the "drawings" in the movie and felt sitdown strikes should have been mentioned because they are "illegal possession of property."

Susan Maraman found the picture "gives you a wonderful feeling" to know that some Americans gave their lives to make the nation a better place to live in and concluded: "Like Mr. Meany said, we must go on, for as we overcome problems, still others block our way."

From Soup to Nonsense:

Whimsy Runs Rampant Among People Who Answer Questions

By Jane Goodsell

IT ALL DEPENDS on who you ask:

What color is it?

Her: "It's a subtle, delicate shade, sort of in between olive and artichoke with undertones of aqua and just a faint tinge of yellow."

Him: "It's green."

What does she look like?

Him: "A gorgeous redhead in a tight black dress with a neckline down to here."

Her: "Hair out of a bottle and a dress two sizes too small."

What did you have to eat?

Her: "The daintiest little canapes made of cream cheese and chutney on toast rounds. A marvelous casserole of crab and lobster in cream sauce flavored with a touch of curry. Salad with croutons and dressing made with wine vinegar and basil. And dessert was an almond torte with caramel frosting."

Him: "Dinky little sandwiches and some kind of fish."

Have you seen the new baby yet?

Her: "Oh, he's adorable! He has enormous blue eyes and round rosy cheeks and a little turned-up nose. His name is John Matthew, but they call him 'Jocko'."

Him: "I think it's a girl."

What kind of car is it?

Him: "It's an MG XVIII with fast-cornering springs and four-wheel drive and four-barrel carburetor. Gets 40 miles to the gallon, and you ought to see the way that baby takes hills!"

Her: "It's black with white leather upholstery."

How are the kids?

Her: "Well, the baby's been fussy the last few days, and I think maybe he's cutting a tooth. Susie's started piano-lessons, and we're very pleased with her progress. And Johnny is getting so tall he's outgrowing all his clothes. Why, would you believe it, he wears a size 10 and he's only. . . ."

Him: "They're fine."

Disparity in Value:

What's Arm Worth If Lost on the Job?

What is an arm worth—to a worker who loses it as the result of an on-the-job accident?

If he happens to work in Wisconsin, he will receive a cash indemnity of $20,000 under the state's workmen's compensation law. But if Arkansas is his home, the loss of an arm at the shoulder will bring him only $7,000.

The most he could receive in Maryland is $6,300, unless he happened to be a federal employe. In that case, his compensation under the federal government's program for its own employes would be $37,799.

The maximum compensation for loss of a foot is only $3,800 in New Mexico but it is $22,000 in neighboring Arizona. Loss of an eye brings $3,000 in Alabama and $18,000 in Hawaii.

These and other examples of disparity in workmen's compensation benefits are cited in the current issue of Labor's Economic Review, published by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. The issue, devoted entirely to workmen's compensation problems, was prepared by Clinton Fair, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

The U.S. Dept. of Labor has recommended minimum standards for all state workmen's compensation laws and as far back as 1909 Pres. Theodore Roosevelt endorsed federal action in this area, the publication notes.

"The AFL-CIO seeks workmen's compensation coverage of all occupationally injured," the article declares.

'Assured, Prompt, Adequate'

"It seeks assured, prompt and adequate indemnity benefits. It seeks an effective administration with a minimum of litigation. It seeks the best our society can provide in medical care, including rehabilitation and vocational retraining when necessary. It seeks these goals at a minimum cost to society."

Citing Labor Dept. recommendations including increased and compulsory coverage, compensation for all occupational diseases including radiation effects, rehabilitation services, lifting of all restrictions on length or cost of medical care, benefits for the full period of disability and maximum benefits equal to at least two-thirds of the state's average weekly wage, the article declares:

"The AFL-CIO supports federal standards, because, after years of prodding, no state meets the standards recommended by the U.S. Dept. of Labor."

Oregon's state insurance fund, which has paid out approximately 93 cents of every dollar paid by employers in premiums as benefits to injured workers, is favorably compared with the more common private insurance programs which have paid an average of 60 cents of each premium dollar in benefits.

'Too Little Business'

Pointing out that the private insurance business is divided among 150 separate companies, the article notes: "Too many private carriers in too many states are doing too little business to assure prompt payment of benefits, to supervise adequately their medical care programs or to provide safety counseling to employers."

The AFL-CIO publication criticizes court administration of the workmen's compensation system—in effect in five states—declaring:

"The court inherently does not administer. It is without authority to supervise medical care, to guide rehabilitation, to assure prompt payment of benefits or to promote safety activities."

Unfortunately, the publication points out, some state commissions haven't met their responsibilities, either. Appointments of commissioners on a patronage basis, low salaries and insecurity of tenure are cited as having "caused many qualified persons to refuse appointment as administrators."

USWA Staffer Gets FEP Advisory Post

Philadelphia—The Pennsylvania Fair Employment Practice Commission at a meeting here named Joseph Odorcich chairman of its McKeesport Advisory Council. Odorcich, a Steelworkers' staff member since 1948, is a staff representative in the union's District 15 office in McKeesport.

Illinois Agreement Set On Job Injury Benefits

Springfield, Ill.—An agreement between labor and industry spokesmen on legislation to increase benefits under the Illinois workmen's compensation and occupational disease laws has been announced by Gov. Otto Kerner.

Changes agreed upon will raise weekly benefits by about 15 percent. They will mean payment of about $9 million additional to injured workers in the next two years, according to the governor's figures.

Agreement followed two months of deliberations by members of the Illinois Industrial Commission, officers of the state AFL-CIO federation, representatives of industry, an advisory committee of lawyers and a joint legislative committee.

Quick approval is expected in both houses of the Illinois General Assembly. An earlier bill, providing the largest single benefit increase in the history of Illinois unemployment compensation legislation, was moved through the legislature in record time after it had been agreed to previously by labor, management and public representatives.

Under the proposed new schedule of occupational accident or illness benefits, a single worker would draw $51 a week instead of the present $45. A married worker with four children under 18 would draw $61 instead of $51.

Death benefits would be increased $1,250 to $2,500, depending on family status. A widow with four children under 18 would receive $17,500 maximum, an increase of $2,500 above the present top. Other provisions call for liberalized burial allowances, higher payments for loss of sight and a five-year, instead of a three-year period, in which to file a claim resulting from radiation exposure.

Pres. Reuben G. Soderstrom of the Illinois AFL-CIO was chairman of the labor group which helped prepare the agreement. It also included Stanley L. Johnson, executive vice president, and Maurice McElligott, secretary-treasurer, of the state federation. Labor was represented also in the advisory committee of attorneys.

A WARNING against overt military action in Cuba was given on "Briefing Session" by guest panelist Alberto Cellario, right, assistant editor of Life Magazine's Spanish language edition, and John C. Campbell of the Council on Foreign Relations.

Panelists Warn on U.S. Troops in Cuba

Should America send Marines to Cuba and overthrow Fidel Castro once and for all?

"No. Definitely not."

This was the answer given by Alberto Cellario, assistant editor of Life magazine's Spanish language edition, on "Briefing Session," the television series produced by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

Appearing with Cellario was John C. Campbell of the Council on Foreign Relations, who shared Cellario's view that "hasty military action" would endanger good will developed in Latin America since the beginning of the Good Neighbor policy in 1933. Warned Campbell:

"We would be jeopardizing what is a very important asset for ourselves and for all the countries of the hemisphere. We could smash the inter-American system with this kind of hasty military action, which of course would dispose of Castro but might leave us problems going on for generations which we would not be able to cope with."

A point stressed by Cellario was the impact of Castro on the poor of Latin American countries.

Represents Hope

"He represents the hopes of a vast number of people toward a better life," Cellario said.

Both panelists see the basic problem of Castro one of interpretation. Many view his revolution in Cuba as a great social advance for the people rather than as a dangerous Communist takeover.

What is wrong with America's Latin American policy as a whole? To this question from moderator Edward P. Morgan, Cellario replied:

"The lack of a coherent and logical and continuous foreign policy during the history of the United States as a nation."

Latins Feel 'Neglected'

In the briefing session that preceded this interview, newscaster John MacVane observed that Latins believe we have neglected them because their Communist menace did not loom as large as that in Europe . . . that aid to their countries is a drop in the bucket compared with that given Europe and Asia . . . that the money we have given them went into the hands of dictators who used it to perpetuate themselves in power.

Most of the democratic governments of Latin America are sorely pressed from both right and left, according to Campbell. Using Venezuela as an example, he said it exists in a kind of delicate balance between the dispossessed military people of the right and Communists, Castroites and other non-democratic groups on the left.

What is the solution to the failure in American policy that both men see as manifest?

Cellario liked Pres. Kennedy's idea of establishing various commissions to study the needs of each country.

"The United States has to keep in mind that Latin America is not one unity," he said and added, "we do not have time to lose."

Both Cellario and Campbell had reservations on the value of the Peace Corps in Latin America.

Campbell feared it would be only another target for anti-American propaganda.

Cellario thought it might be useful in some of the argicultural countries in the north but that the more highly industrialized nations needed technicians.

Henderson 'Conspirator' Given Parole

Henderson, N. C.—The North Carolina Parole Board has released from prison the first of eight members of the Textile Workers Union of America jailed last fall on charges of conspiracy to dynamite the struck Harriet-Henderson Cotton Mills here.

The first paroled was Malcolm Jarrell, who had served six months of a two-to-four-year prison term. His parole was granted at the earliest date on which he could have been released. The seven other union members and officials are serving terms ranging from four to 10 years.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock, in a statement issued in New York, said the union was "gratified" at Jarrell's release. He added: "It is our earnest hope that this development will be followed in the very near future by the release of the seven remaining Henderson prisoners."

Jarrell's parole came shortly after Harold E. Aaron, the state's star witness and a secret agent for the State Bureau of Investigation, was arrested for shooting a man in a Martinsville, Va., motel. Aaron's arrest has touched off a round of editorial demand that Gov. Terry Sanford (D) reopen the Henderson case.

Plea From Virginia

The Virginia State AFL-CIO has written Sanford asking that he use his authority on behalf of the TWUA members "to such extent as you consider would best serve the interests of justice and Christian concepts."

Meanwhile, in town elections here, Mayor Carroll V. Singleton, whose plea to state authorities brought in the National Guard at the height of the strike, was beaten for re-election by Cylde Finch, a labor-backed candidate.

Firemen & Oilers Vote Increase in Per Capita

Philadelphia—Delegates to the 26th convention of the Firemen & Oilers voted unanimously to raise the international per capita tax by 50 cents a month and to boost minimum dues to $4 to help finance an organizing drive aimed at offsetting membership losses.

The increase puts the new per capita levy at $1.50 a month.

The convention re-established the post of full-time secretary-treasurer and picked Vice Pres. William E. Fredenberger to fill it. It also established the office of president emeritus in a resolution praising the "long and valuable leadership" of Pres. Anthony J. Matz, who was re-elected, and making the title available to him when he chooses to retire.

The international union constitution was revised to bring it into conformity with the Landrum-Griffin Act and Edward J. Weber, business agent of St. Louis Local 6, was elected to the vice presidency vacated by Fredenberger. Other vice presidents were re-elected.

Pres. George E. Leighty of the Railroad Telegraphers told the convention that the Railway Labor Executives' Association, of which he is chairman, has developed a program aimed at stopping "the railroads' rush toward extinction."

"We have become greatly disturbed by the shortsighted policies of managements which seek to maintain profits at their postwar levels by the curtailment of services rather than by the improvement of service," he said.

Railroad management is angering and alienating the public, he said, by such actions as closing stations, "dangerous" cutbacks in maintenance and equipment, eliminating passenger trains, "deliberate discouragement" of less-than-carload freight, and mergers between "rich" roads.

He emphasized that railroad labor is not opposed to mergers, but stressed that none of those pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission is the kind which would be "beneficial to the industry."

Pres. Michael J. Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept. warned that the industry's job opportunities and service to the public have been cut by technological changes, by efforts of the carriers to get out of the passenger business and by mergers.

He recalled that Congress by legislation in 1940 encouraged mergers among "weak" railroads, but said the present trend is toward mergers among the strong. This will mean, he said, "big corporations getting bigger, the public interest sacrificed, many communities left as ghost towns, our people left with fewer and fewer jobs, and the security of this nation impaired."

Important Step Forward:

Minimum Wage Bill Signed by Kennedy

Pres. John F. Kennedy has signed into law the 1961 minimum wage amendments marking the first expansion of basic wage-hour protection since passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1938.

Flanked by congressional leaders and a large group of AFL-CIO officials headed by Pres. George Meany, Kennedy affixed his signature to the bill raising the minimum, in steps, to $1.25 and bringing 3.6 million new workers under wage-hour protection.

At the historic White House ceremonies, Kennedy called the improvements "a most important step forward," but declared that the bill "doesn't finish the job." He forecast "greater gains in the months and years ahead."

Meany earlier had pledged that labor would continue its efforts "in behalf of the 'working poor'" in order to achieve "final elimination of starvation wages and sweatshop hours from all phases of American life."

Kennedy had special praise for Meany and the other leaders of organized labor for their "long interest" in minimum wage improvements. Virtually every member of their unions, the President said, is paid more than $1.25 an hour, "but they have been concerned about unorganized workers who have been at the bottom of the economic ladder, who have not benefited from the growing prosperity in this country . . . and who need our help."

Meanwhile, Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.), chairman of the House Labor Committee, acting almost before the ink was dry on the new wage-hour law, introduced a bill calling for extension of benefits to an additional 545,000 workers. His measure would bring protection to 140,000 laundry workers, 165,000 hotel and motel employes and 240,000 restaurant workers eliminated, at various stages, from coverage of this year's measure.

The minimum wage bill constituted a major plank in Kennedy's legislative program. On the heels of its enactment, the President signed into law another bill to channel funds to 500,000 needy children and 200,000 jobless parents.

The temporary $200 million extension of the federal-state program of aid to dependent children permits financial assistance to children whose parents are unemployed. Previously this type of aid was available only to children left destitute because of desertion, illegitimacy or the death of a parent.

Signing of the bill by Kennedy put into operation a second part of the Administration's program for easing distress caused by the recession. The other half of the program—temporary extension of unemployment compensation for workers who exhaust regular jobless benefits without finding work—was the first major measure cleared by the 87th Congress.

The signing of the two bills came against this backdrop of Capitol Hill action on other phases of Kennedy's legislative program:

- The House, by an overwhelming vote of 308 to 110, approved a 10-year extension of the program of federal grants to states to combat water pollution, and raised the annual grants from $3 million to $5 million. The bill also doubles the previous level of $50 million a year in grants for construction of waste treatment plants.
- The House, by voice vote, passed and sent to the Senate a modified version of Kennedy's program of higher annual authorizations for the interstate highway program. The bill is designed to bring in $900 million annually in added revenues for the program.

Kennedy had urged raising the entire amount through increased highway-user taxes, while the House-passed bill provides $750 million via this method and diversion of the remaining $150 million annual from general revenues.

The measure would continue gasoline and diesel fuel taxes at the present 4-cent-per-gallon level through Oct. 1, 1972—target date for completion of the vast new network of interstate highways. It also calls for increases in truck, tire and tube taxes during the same period.

- Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and Rep. Emmanuel Celler (D-N. Y.) introduced six bills in the Senate and House aimed at implementing the civil rights plank of the 1960 Democratic platform. They included constitutional amendments to eliminate poll taxes and literacy tests as requirements for voting; a bill requiring racially segregated schools to adopt desegregation plans within six months; a bill authorizing the Attorney General to initiate civil injunction suits in civil rights cases; a fair employment practices bill; and a measure extending the life of the Civil Rights Commission.
- The House voted 231 to 157 to extend, for two years, the Mexican farm labor program after rejecting employer restrictions and safeguards for American workers sought by the Administration and the AFL-CIO. Before the vote, unsuccessful efforts were made to amend the bill to bar employers from importing Mexicans unless they made a "reasonable effort" first to hire Americans, and put a floor under the wages of Mexican laborers.

In another action, Kennedy met at the White House with the governors of the eight states in the Appalachian Mountains area — Kentucky, Alabama, Maryland, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia and West Virginia—to discuss the recently enacted Area Redevelopment Act.

The President pledged that the new program would focus particular attention on the eight-state area, described as one of the most concentrated groupings of distressed areas in the nation.

School Aid Measure Nears Vote in Senate

approach and reported a bill which counts both public and private school children for purposes of determining the amount to be paid to each state. It retained Kennedy's restrictions, however, in granting funds only to public schools for classroom construction or teachers' salaries.

The bill also calls for extension for three years of the program of aid to so-called "impacted" areas—communities in which school population is swollen by the children of employes at such major federal installations as missile sites or military bases. The bill would provide $840 million for continuation of the program. Kennedy had asked that the aid to "impacted" areas be trimmed back and that only $600 million be voted for this purpose.

As the Senate squared away for debate on the bill—similar in general details, but not in finances, to the two-year school-aid bill which is passed by a 54-35 vote in February 1960—the House Education Committee prepared to take up a similar measure.

Earlier, an Education subcommittee had reported a school-aid measure which would include private school pupils in the state-by-state head count, drop the per-pupil minimum to $12 and couple with it a different "equalization formula," and extend for another three years the $840 million "impacted" areas program.

When the aid-to-education bill hits the House floor, it will present a major new challenge to the strength of the Administration forces. In the House debate, the fight may center on the question of providing federal funds for teachers' salaries.

Last year, the House passed a $1 billion school measure authorizing grants only for classroom construction. The bill was later bottled up in the Rules Committee, then under control of the conservative coalition, and was never sent to Senate-House conference committee.

Meanwhile, the House Education Committee continued work on a companion education measure submitted by the Administration to aid the nation's colleges. By a vote of 16-15, it put back into the measure Kennedy's request for $900 million for college scholarships, which the committee tentatively had stripped from the measure in earlier deliberations. The federally financed, state-administered scholarships would go to talented but needy students.

The college-aid bill also carries provisions for a five-year, $1.5 billion program of long-term, low-interest loans for construction of college classrooms, laboratories, libraries and related structures.

Wage-Hour Amendments Make Labor Day 'Special'

Labor Day will have a special meaning this year—and for the next five years—to the millions of Americans protected by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The 1961 wage-hour amendments—providing for a $1.25-an-hour minimum, in steps, and coverage for 3.6 million new workers—were signed into law by Pres. John F. Kennedy on May 5. The effective date of the higher minimums will come 120 days later on Sunday, Sept. 3.

Thus the actual pay increases will come for the first time on the payday following Labor Day. At that time, presently covered workers will go to $1.15 an hour, and the newly covered will start at the $1 level.

There are some 1.9 million presently covered workers below the $1.15 level, and some 660,000 newly covered workers making less than $1. For these more than 2.5 million workers, then, Labor Day 1961 will be the signal for significant wage increases.

The step-ups in the minimums, and the gradual ceiling that will be placed on hours for newly protected workers, will go into effect over the next five years on the same date—making each Labor Day a constant reminder of the major breakthrough scored with the 1961 FLSA amendments.

AFL-CIO Asks Enactment of Pollution Bill

The AFL-CIO has urged quick Senate concurrence in a House-passed bill to help states and communities protect the nation's water supply against pollution.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a Senate Public Works subcommittee that existing anti-pollution programs are inadequate for the nation's present needs and he warned that future population and industrial growth will require a stepped-up program.

The House-passed Blatnik bill, by doubling the present authorization for federal grants-in-aid for sewage disposal to $100 million a year for 10 years, is "indispensable," Biemiller declared.

Labor is "gratified" that the Kennedy Administration "has given proper importance to the problem of water pollution," he said.

"No longer does the shadow of an executive veto hang over the legislation," he noted, referring to former Pres. Eisenhower's veto of an earlier Blatnik bill last year.

While the nation only used 8 percent of the total water supply in 1900, it used 60 percent in 1960 and will need to use an estimated 88 percent by 1975, Biemiller pointed out.

The AFL-CIO spokesman strongly endorsed the provision of the bill extending jurisdiction of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act to all navigable waters in the United States and declared the Eisenhower Administration "wore its budgetary goggles" in describing water pollution as a "uniquely local blight."

Lockheed Negro IAM Unit Merged

Marietta, Ga.—The merger of a 400-member Negro Machinists local into three other IAM lodges at Lockheed Aircraft Corp. here has been voted by IAM District 33, which represents all of the 10,000 unionists at the plant.

The action — under which the Negro local was absorbed into the locals representing, respectively, day-shift, night-shift and clerical and technical employes—came after the Negro local voted to rescind an earlier request that it be allowed to continue its segregated status.

The lodge was established, at the request of the Negroes, in 1951 and was one of the last segregated units chartered by the IAM. In 1957, IAM Vice Pres. Jesse C. McGlon said, the international directed the merger of the four Lockheed lodges. The order was rescinded after the Negroes voted unanimously to request permission to retain their separate charter.

Suffridge Goes with Johnson to Asia

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, president of the Retail Clerks, is accompanying the party of Vice Pres. Lyndon Johnson on its Asian tour as a representative of U.S. organized labor.

Suffridge, a member of the AFL-CIO Inter-American Affairs Committee and an executive board member of the Intl. Confederation of Commercial, Clerical & Technical Employes, was chosen for the Johnson trip because of his long interest in foreign affairs.

The Vice President's party is visiting the Philippines, South Viet Nam, Formosa and other points in the Far and Middle East.

David E. Feller, general counsel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., charged that the NLRB has "multiplied its own difficulties and thrown monkey wrenches into its own machinery" by assuming functions not given to it by law.

'Dreamed Up' by Board

Describing the Boston Gas Co. Case, in which the NLRB first ruled that a contract containing a standard check-off of dues provision was invalid and then reversed itself, Feller said the issue of the check-off provision had not been raised by any party to the representation case and "had apparently been dreamed up, out of the air, by the board itself."

By the time the board's first decision in the case had been handed down, the whole question of whether the existing contract was a bar to a representation election was meaningless since the contract expired three days after the date of the decision, Feller noted.

He said the case revealed "an agency apparently possessed by a driving desire to insert itself into situations on its own motion, and with an apparent determination to go to the very limit of the law, if not beyond, to enforce restrictions on union activity, whether contained in the statute which the board is supposed to administer or not."

Fields, who has been NLRB executive secretary since March 1960 and an employe of the board since 1941, pictured the agency as heavily overburdened by a case load which has soared from 13,000 in 1955 to an estimated 23,000 in the current fiscal year. He said a "serious backlog" developed early in 1960 "and has increased steadily."

Advocating transformation of the NLRB into an appellate body which would decide for itself whether to consider appeals from trial examiner decisions, Fields said:

"In that capacity the board can and will concern itself with major policy questions arising from this difficult and complex law.

"It can and will survey and evaluate the impact and ramifications of its decisions upon day to day labor relations and the development of this law.

"It may use its wide discretionary powers to evolve the rules of that part of the labor relations game that is within its orbit so that labor and management . . . will know what is fair and what is foul."

Injustices Cited

Pollock, accompanied by seven rank-and-file TWUA members from the South, told the Pucinski subcommittee of the "injustice . . . inflicted under the cover of the Taft-Hartley Act and the NLRB's interpretation of that law."

The TWUA presented case histories of organizing attempts in recent years and charged that:

"Pro-union workers find themselves denied such basic rights as freedom of speech and assembly.

"They are browbeaten, brainwashed and terrorized by their employers. . . .

"Racial and religious hatred is exploited, and espionage, violence and brutality are also used to kill off union sentiment."

These things happen, Pollock and TWUA Counsel Benjamin Wyle charged, because neither the NLRB nor the Taft-Hartley Act makes "a fair attempt to stop them."

Representatives of the Maritime Union and Technical Engineers also presented testimony critical of NLRB decisions and procedures.

Labor board spokesmen said no timetable has been set for submission of a reorganization plan. However, NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch is scheduled to testify before the Pucinski subcommittee and may spell out the agency's plans at that time.

FOLLOWING TRADITION, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany breaks a plate against the new headquarters of the Potters in East Liverpool, O., to dedicate the structure. Looking on is Pres. E. L. Wheatley of the union.

New Headquarters Dedicated by Potters

East Liverpool, O.—The American labor movement must take the lead in arousing the American people to a new "sense of urgency" about chronic unemployment and other problems—but first it must arouse union members themselves, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told labor and industry leaders here at the dedication of a new headquarters building of the Potters.

"Take pride in this fine new building, as a symbol of your long, hard-fought efforts," Meany told the audience after dedicating the building by breaking a piece of pottery against it.

'Pressing Dangers' Seen

"Take pride in your organization and its record of steady growth. But do not lose sight of the real and pressing dangers ahead.

"Do not be lulled—as so many of our fellow Americans have been lulled—into complacency, because it seems to be only the other fellow who's in trouble."

Pres. E. L. Wheatley of the Potters, who presided, said the building, erected on a hill seven miles north of this national pottery center, "represents the union's faith in the future of an industry" that has faced major problems successfully, and now faces strong foreign competition and severe unemployment.

A color guard of Marines, Air Force, Army and Navy representatives raised the national colors over the single-story modernistic hall and office building. Among those who spoke were Rep. Cleveland Bailey (D-W. Va.) and Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Wealth 'Not Enough'

Meany said labor has come a long way since the days when the typical union headquarters was a "shabby office in a shabby building." Workers ought not to live in slums and there is no reason why their unions should operate in slum surroundings, he said, adding:

"Having said this, let me sound a note of warning. In our movement, the mere possession of property, of material wealth, is not enough to assure happiness or security."

Down the years, labor has made great strides by organizing new unions, expanding older ones, raising wages and improving social benefits, he said. It has become a "truly powerful force for good" in our national life. It has used its strength to help bring about sweeping improvements for all Americans.

These achievements, the AFL-CIO president said, are a living monument, "far more significant than anything we can build out of brick or steel." Yet it is in the economic area, Meany asserted, that we face our greatest danger.

When the nation has "recovered" from the latest recession—its fourth in the last eight or nine years—65 out of every 1,000 U.S. workers will still be looking for jobs, he said.

Members' Help Asked

In the 10 years ahead, the work force will grow by 1.3 million persons, not counting those who retire or die. But last year alone, almost 1 million industrial jobs disappeared—wiped out by job changes, by automation.

To help find answers to such problems, labor needs the assistance of all its members, Meany said. Pointing to the AFL-CIO program for recovery, he said "to get that program moving the way it should, we need the help of union members everywhere."

Sea Unions Hit Appointees to Study Group

The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. has protested appointments made by Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges to a seven-member committee to study problems in the maritime industry.

Six of the members of the committee, the union spokesmen declared in a letter to Hodges, have had no experience or background in the maritime field.

Their participation in the study, Maritime Trades Dept. Pres. Paul Hall and Legislative Dir. E. N. Altman wrote, "would of necessity be perfunctory and uniformed."

The seventh appointee, Eugene Holman, former chairman of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, was described as the former head "of what is probably the largest 'runway-flag' fleet."

U. S. maritime unions have waged a continuing battle against "runaway" ships, which are registered by their American owners under the flags of foreign countries to escape U. S. safety laws, wage scales and working conditions. Panama, Liberia and Honduras are among the leading non-maritime nations which have provided "flags of convenience" for American-owned "runaway" shipping.

Members Listed

In addition to Holman, the committee members are: Donald K. David, head of the Ford Foundation, as chairman; T. V. Hauser, former chairman of Sears Roebuck & Co.; William P. Foster, head of Olin-Mathieson; Herbert Hoover, Jr.; Carter Burgess, of the American Machine & Foundry Co., and American Red Cross Pres. Alfred P. Gruenther.

Church Leaders Deny Pope Favors 'Work'

Prominent Catholic clergymen and editors have sharply challenged an Indiana priest's claim that a letter from the Vatican to a Catholic group in France represented an endorsement of so-called "right-to-work" laws in the United States.

This claim, made by the Rev. John E. Coogan of West Baden Springs, Ind., has been widely circulated by the National Right-to-Work Committee in an effort to counteract statements by leading Catholic bishops and theologians denouncing the union-shop ban.

The Catholic commentators said Fr. Coogan misinterpreted a letter sent by the Vatican Secretary of State, Cardinal Tardini, on behalf of Pope John XXIII, to a Social Week gathering in France. The letter, they noted, dealt with special problems of Communist domination of some European labor groups and did not apply to conditions in the United States.

Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Social Action Dept. of the National Catholic Welfare Conference—which serves as the secretariat for the Administrative Board of American Bishops — pointed out that the Vatican warning "was not directed against the union shop as we know it in the United States. It was directed against 'all forms of usurped collective domination,' " Msgr. Higgins declared, quoting from the letter.

He added: "The union shop in the United States is not a form of 'usurped collective domination.' "

Another member of the National Catholic Welfare Conference staff, the Rev. John F. Cronin, and the Rev. William J. Lee, dean of St. Mary's Seminary at Baltimore, scoffed at the implication that the Pope was using a letter to a Catholic conference in France to rebuke the many American bishops who have condemned so-called "right-to-work" laws.

Joseph A. Breig, associate editor of the official Catholic newspaper in the Cleveland, O., diocese, declared:

"Fr. Coogan seems to have allowed his well-known total attachment to 'right-to-work' laws to lead him into the unpalatable error of trying to make Pope John say something that Pope John has not said and is extremely unlikely ever to say."

Rev. Raymond T. Bosler, editor of the newspaper of the Archdiocese of Indianapolis, said the Vatican letter "simply restates" the Catholic Church's opposition to undemocratic operations of totalitarian unions and emphasized:

"Anyone who says that this description fits unions in this country acknowledges that he knows nothing about American unions."

The comments by leading Catholics were released by the National Council for Industrial Peace.

Boiler Makers' Parley Hears Dual Morals Hit

Long Beach—Undersec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz has denounced here the "double standards of morality" of those who quickly criticize any abuse of ethics by labor, but are more tolerant of abuses by management.

Speaking to the nearly 750 delegates at the 21st quadrennial convention of the Boiler Makers, Wirtz said the recent convictions of some 30 leaders of the electrical industry was a prime example of the double standard of morality.

"If the industry leaders had been labor leaders instead, we would not hear the end of it for many years to come. When there are abuses by some labor leaders, those leaders are identified with the whole labor movement. This did not happen with the management abuses," he said.

As the convention neared its close, the delegates re-elected Pres. William Calvin for a four-year term. Also re-elected was Sec.-Treas. Homer Patton.

Per capita dues were boosted by $1 a month, bringing the total to $3.75 including $1.25 marked for insurance. The last per capita hike was 50 cents, adopted in 1953.

Rep. James Roosevelt outlined the battle in Congress over the minimum wage and said that the best answer this nation can give to communism is to make our own system work so well communism will have no appeal.

The minimum wage victory, he said, marked "the first time in 24 years that we were successfully able to battle the commercial interests that are always trying to keep the right to exploit and to work those people they can get to work at less than a living wage."

"The battle will have to continue," he said, "for we didn't do all the job."

On racial discrimination, Wirtz told the convention, the best summary of the Administration's position is that "we mean business about what has for too long been a matter of fine words; no one is going to be denied equal opportunity to work for the government or on its contracts."

He praised the national disputes adjustment plan adopted by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. last February, and said the arbitration board it established "holds great promise for the resolution, without the waste and loss of work stoppages, of disputes which a democracy fighting for its life could ill afford."

Local Public Works Aid Urged to Ease Joblessness

Race Issue Threatens School Bill

The Kennedy Administration's $2.5 billion federal aid-to-public-education bill began its tortuous way through Congress with its future clouded by the sudden eruption of the school desegregation issue.

The way had been cleared for Senate action on the bill—which would provide grants over a three-year period for public school construction or teachers' salaries, or both—after agreement was reached not to tack on to the measure the controversial question of limited aid to private schools.

As debate opened on the Administration measure, sponsored by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), Southern Democrats launched a determined fight to write in language which would prohibit the withholding of federal grants from school districts continuing to practice racial segregation.

The maneuver brought a warning from Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.), chairman of the House Education Committee, that he would retaliate by introducing his so-called "Powell amendment" which would specifically bar federal funds from schools not in compliance with the Supreme Court's desegregation ruling.

A similar amendment was successfully added to the school aid measure passed by the House in 1960. The issue was never resolved because the House Rules Committee, at that time dominated by the conservative Republican-Southern Democratic coalition, refused to send the measure to a joint House-Senate conference to iron out differences between that bill and a more extensive one passed by the Senate.

The Administration's position on the racial issue was spelled out in February by Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff after the aid-to-education proposal was sent to Congress.

Side Issues 'Deplored'

Ribicoff declared it would be "a tragedy to put on the back of education the problems of everything, including the problem of civil rights," and added: "We should not block education with side issues."

In the first round of in-fighting on the desegregation issue, the Senate rejected, by a vote of 70 to 25, an amendment by Sen. Strom Thurmond (D-S. C.) which would specificially have barred the government from withholding aid from segregated schools.

Right behind it loomed a more generally worded amendment submitted by Sen. Herman E. Talmadge (D-Ga.) which would pro-

Meany Asks $1 Billion in U.S. Grants

By Gene Zack

Federal grants to stimulate a "vigorous" program of short-term, local public works projects are essential if unemployment is to be effectively reduced in 1961, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has told Congress.

Appearing as the leadoff witness before a Senate Labor subcommittee, Meany said a proposed $1 billion program to accelerate construction of a wide range of state and municipal projects is a "necessary supplement" to Pres. John F. Kennedy's proposals for revitalizing the economy.

The bill, introduced by Sen. Joseph S. Clark, Jr. (D-Pa.), the subcommittee chairman, would provide $500 million in federal grants —plus standby authorization for an additional $500 million—for short-range projects which states and municipalities could launch within 90 days and which would be completed in a year.

The program would be limited to projects that have already been planned but which would not be undertaken without federal aid. Authorizations for all such projects would halt when unemployment—now at 6.8 percent of the work force—fell to 4 percent, and could be reinstituted by presidential action if joblessness again exceeded that figure.

A similar measure has been introduced in the House by Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.).

The Kennedy Administration has not yet indicated its stand on the proposals. As soon as it adopts a position, Clark said, its spokesmen will be scheduled to appear before the subcommittee.

In addition to urging prompt action on the Clark bill, Meany called

'Handout to Business':

AFL-CIO Opposes Tax Credit Proposal

Pres. Kennedy's investment tax credit proposal "would harm the economy more than it would help it" and constitutes "an unwarranted handout of billions of dollars to business," the AFL-CIO has declared.

In testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee on the Administration plan to allow business to subtract 15 percent of extra investment expenditures from its tax bill, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Stanley H. Ruttenberg said America needs "the durable stimulus of rising family spendable income" which can best be accomplished by a reduction in "the individual income tax burden."

It is the "considered judgment" of the federation, Ruttenberg said, that neither a corporate tax rate cut, a further liberalization of depreciation allowances nor the proposed tax credit "can achieve the results that are now being promised."

He characterized the $1.7 billion tax credit plan as a "business tax subsidy crash program" and added, "we fear it would be an abortive experiment" that would not provide for the essential economic growth the nation so badly needs.

Ruttenberg warned that adoption of the tax credit proposal "would more likely distort the recovery process and hasten the next recession just as the over-generous business tax benefits of 1954 overstimulated investment while consumption lagged." This led, he said, to the recession of 1957-58.

Rising Demand Needed

"Even the most generous federal subsidies cannot long stimulate private investment in the absence of adequately rising demand," he added.

The Administration's tax credit proposal is part of its program to close various tax loopholes on expense accounts, dividends and interest income and other areas

Latin Labor Training Plan Is Approved

By Gervase N. Love

A $1-million-a-year education program for Latin American union leaders, initiated by the AFL-CIO and developed by the University of Chicago, has been approved by a policy and design committee of prominent citizens and may be operating by the end of the year.

"The main purpose," said AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, "is to strengthen free unions in the Western Hemisphere by providing training opportunities for their leaders. It is an effort by American unions and other private organizations to supplement Pres. Kennedy's 'Alliance for Progress' program by Latin America."

The policy and design committee, which endorsed the program at a meeting in Washington, is composed of labor and industry leaders and educators. The program itself will be financed by soliciting funds from unions, foundations and the federal government, but will be controlled by a private agency to be established by the policy and design committee.

Plans are to bring about 300 Latin American union leaders to this country each year for three months of training. They would return to their home countries for nine additional months of training and specialized educational experience. The conduct of education programs for other union members would be included in their training.

Meany said the program grew out

Plan Sought to Ease Problems on Missiles

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, stressing that delays on construction of the nation's missile bases involve "more than just a labor problem," has begun working on a formula to insure "uninterrupted" operation of the $3 billion U.S. space program.

Following a round of conferences with representatives of craft and industrial unions, missile manufacturers and building contractors —from whom, he said, he received pledges of "complete support"— Goldberg said he would move at once on preparing recommendations for White House action.

The Secretary said he planned to hold "further discussions" with Pentagon, labor and management officials before firming up his proposals for Pres. John F. Kennedy.

Goldberg said that at his meetings with each of the four groups at the Labor Dept., he read a letter from Kennedy stressing the "urgency" of the problem and declaring that "the security of our nation and the lives of each of us are today tied inexorably to our missile program and may well depend tomorrow upon what we do now in space."

The letter expressed confidence that out of the meetings would come "a voluntary and equitable solution to labor-management problems in this vital area, fair to the

Equal Rights Hailed On 7th Anniversary

Hailing the U.S. Supreme Court desegregation decision of May 17, 1954, as a "historic step," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in an anniversary statement that labor calls on "all freedom-loving Americans" to make the Sixties "the years of fulfillment of our nation's promise of equal rights."

"The promise of equal opportunity, of equal justice before the law, of the sanctity of the rights of man, goes back to the very foundations of constitutional government," he declared.

"Let us make these rights inviolate" through legislative and executive action, he added, and through "concerted voluntary action."

Labor Joins In Red Cross Convention

Cincinnati—Labor took a large and active part in the 36th annual convention of the National Red Cross held here.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, who also heads the Clothing Workers, was chairman of an international relations session attended by 400.

In addition, a special session on cooperation between the Red Cross and labor at the local level was held for the first time, and local officials of the Amalgamated gave a dinner honoring their president.

Serving in his role as a member of the Red Cross board of governors, Potofsky set the tone of the meeting on international relations by saying that global differences make no difference to the Red Cross.

"We are dedicated," Potofsky declared, "to serve humanity, each in our own way—through the Red Cross."

Panel on Fund Drives

The special session on cooperation between local chapters and unions in their areas dwelt primarily on fund-raising campaigns. It was a working session in which many ideas were traded between the floor and panelists.

The panelists were: William F. Moser, chairman of the Berks County Red Cross Chapter, Reading, Pa.; Arthur Hellender, secretary, Central Labor Council of Alameda County, Oakland, Calif.; Philip Van Gelder, chairman, Community Services Committee, Baltimore Council of AFL-CIO Unions; and Kenneth L. Kramer, labor liaison, National Red Cross.

Cross Resigns Presidency of Ousted Bakers

James G. Cross resigned as president of the Bakery Workers, which was ousted by the AFL-CIO in 1957 on corruption charges, a day in advance of his scheduled union trial on accusations that he misappropriated $35,000 of union funds.

Cross agreed to turn back to the union his West Palm Beach, Fla., home, allegedly financed and maintained with union funds, in return for $1,000 he claimed as equity.

An undetermined monthly pension, a Bakery Workers' spokesman said, would be paid to Cross. The spokesman said the union could recover from pension payments any sum it might be determined the former president owed the union.

An earlier proposal for the resignation of Cross, agreed to by the Bakery Workers' board mapority that later filed charges against him, was denounced in March by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as "legalized highway robbery." The proposal would have given Cross a quarter of a million dollars in settlement of pension claims, and a local union group's federal court suit accusing Cross of misappropriating union funds would have been dropped.

Sec.-Tres. Peter H. Olson also resigned from office a day in advance of his scheduled union trial.

James Landriscina, acting president after union charges were filed against Cross, was chosen president by the executive board. Four members abstained from supporting him.

The Labor Dept. announced after the earlier quarter-million-dollar pension proposal that it had launched an investigation of Bakery Workers' affairs.

Tax Credit Proposal Opposed by AFL-CIO

where income has been escaping equitable taxation.

The AFL-CIO testified in support of the proposal to apply withholding to dividend and interest income and to end special treatment for a portion of dividend income. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and other business groups have opposed the Administration program, including the tax credit plan. Business groups are seeking a step-up in depreciation allowances, a proposal strongly opposed by labor.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg told the committee earlier that the tax credit program is "an essential part of the President's economic program for recovery and growth, without which any efforts of mine to help remedy the unemployment problem will prove disappointing."

Ruttenberg testified that the tax credit plan was based on four assumptions each of which he challenged:

Assumptions Challenged

The crisis of obsolescence: "In our view the claim is vastly overstated." Citing the McGraw-Hill survey that said it would take $95 billion to replace obsolete facilities, he questioned the basis of the survey and added that even using this yardstick only 14 percent of the nation's capital stock was obsolete, since in the year of the survey the plant and equipment was estimated at $683 billion.

The experience in the postwar years with a total plant and equipment investment of $400 billion does not indicate that "technological rigor mortis has overtaken the nation. Too many American workers either fear being automated out of their jobs, or have been displaced recently by new processes and machines, for us to have any illusion that our productive system is standing still."

The doctrine that businessmen need a new incentive to underwrite the cost of investment: Ruttenberg pointed out that from 1946 through 1959 corporations invested $313 billion in new plant and equipment but only $34 billion of this was raised by selling stock issues, showing the internal resources available from profits and depreciation allowances. In 1960 American corporations were permitted to set aside a "staggering $23 billion" for depreciation, a sum equal to 74 percent of the entire new plant and equipment outlay for the year. In 1953 the depreciation total was only 49 percent.

The theory that the plan is needed to meet essential national growth: The greatest part of the more than $1 billion to be paid out annually, Ruttenberg declared, "will be enjoyed by our largest corporations . . . the enterprises that need the tax credit least." About 14 percent would go to agriculture, 22 percent to commercial and "other" enterprises and 42 percent to manufacturing. The plan would not guarantee a substantial net addition to private investment, or selectively stimulate plant and equipment spending. But it would "impose a burden of billions of dollars on all of us, for a pay-off to investors totally unrelated to financial need."

The theory that the plan is needed to assure sustainable economic growth: With much of existing productive capacity still idle for lack of orders, Ruttenberg said, further tax benefits for business should be given the lowest priority. The major incentive for rising business investment is high-level operations, he said.

When demand and sales are high, American businessmen "generally need little prodding to expand their productive facilities. And even when demand is sluggish, they seem ready enough to improve the efficiency of their capital stock in order to reduce unit production costs," he said.

Letter to Kennedy:

Long-Term Interest Cut Asked by Meany

The AFL-CIO has called on Pres. Kennedy to "persuade" the Federal Reserve Board "to carry out" Administration policy to lower long-term interest rates.

Lower long-term rates and stable short-term rates, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wrote Kennedy, are needed to boost the nation's lagging economy.

Meany hailed Kennedy's monetary policy statements as clearly prescribing "what America needs." The AFL-CIO, the federation president added, "agrees wholeheartedly that economic recovery calls for greater availability of credit at interest rates low enough to attract borrowers."

But, said Meany, "the Federal Reserve Board has not acted vigorously to implement that policy." He proposed a four-point program including:

- Use of the open-market powers to buy and sell long-term government securities to make more credit available at lower interest rates.
- Reduction of the discount rate —the interest rate member banks pay the FRB for their borrowings— from the current 3 per cent to 2.5 per cent.
- Maintainance of reserve requirements of FRB member banks at the current level. The lowering of reserve requirements to increase the amount of funds available for lending is not needed at this time and its effect on interest rates is too remote, the letter said.
- Use of its powers by the Treasury as trustee of social security and other trust accounts to affect long-term rates.

Meany wrote Kennedy:

"High unemployment plagues the economy and prevents the rapid recovery that all of us deem necessary and essential. As you know, we have supported your domestic recovery program but have asked for additional measures. A few weeks ago, we requested the consideration of more public works spending to inject additional activity into the lagging economy.

"America's national economic machine will never function smoothly, however, until monetary and credit policies are made to work as effective lubricants. Your monetary policy statements this year have clearly prescribed what America needs— lower long-term and stable short-term interest rates.

"The AFL-CIO agrees wholeheartedly that economic recovery calls for greater availability of credit at interest rates low enough to attract borrowers. We regret, however, that the Federal Reserve Board has not acted vigorously to implement that policy."

New Election Agreed To in Challenged Vote

Newark, N. J.—An unaffiliated union of petroleum workers, dropping its court battle against a Labor Dept. suit challenging its election procedures, has accepted a consent decree ordering a new election of officers under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor.

The Labor Dept. had filed its suit last July—the government's first use of the Landrum-Griffin Act to set aside a union election.

The Labor Dept. alleged that the voting which resulted in re-election of officers of the so-called Independent Petroleum Workers Union of Bayway (N. J.) was marked by irregularities including the printing of substantially excessive number of ballots and removal of the ballots "by representatives of the winning candidates before the arrival of the observers for the losing candidates and prior to the agreed time for collection of the ballots."

The union holds bargaining rights for workers at the Esso Standard Oil Co. refinery at Linden, N. J. Shortly after the February 1960 election, the unaffiliated union narrowly beat back the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers in an NLRB representation vote. The OCAW charged at the time that Esso management openly supported the unaffiliated union through letters to workers and through "buttonholing" by supervisors.

The Bayway union originally denied the charges of election irregularities brought by the Labor Dept. and trial had been scheduled in U.S. District Court at Newark.

Two days before the trial date, the union filed a stipulation that it would not contest the government's demand that the election of officers be set aside.

Labor Urges Full U. S. Pensions After 30 Years

The AFL-CIO has urged a Senate Post Office & Civil Service subcommittee to approve legislation permitting government employes to retire on full annuity after 30 years of service.

At present, federal workers with 30 years of service can retire at age 60 with full annuity or at 55 with a reduced pension.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. George D. Riley said the federation strongly backs the position of affiliated unions of federal and postal workers in support of legislation sponsored by Committee Chairman Olin D. Johnston (D-S.C.).

He told the subcommittee, headed by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), that Administration opposition to the proposal is based "on the assumption that every person would take advantage of the legislation."

Riley said previous liberalization of the civil service retirement system has shown that only "a small fraction of the potential number" have taken advantage of permissive earlier retirement.

Earlier, Deputy Budget Dir. Elmer Staats had told the subcommittee that the Administration opposes the bill because "we cannot afford to lose the services of these valuable workers."

Riley said claims that earlier retirement might run the civil service retirement fund in the red cannot be justified. He pointed out that "for many years the government simply skipped its contributions" to the fund and he noted that Pres. Eisenhower on one occasion vetoed a $600 million appropriation to it.

The Johnston bill would make no change in the present mandatory retirement age of 70 in the government service or in the present provision that workers with less than 30 years of service may retire at age 62 with prorated pensions.

Meany Endorses Highway Week

The nation must keep building good highways to keep America strong, safe and prosperous, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in urging recognition of National Highway Week, May 21-27.

Recalling that the AFL-CIO was a strong supporter of the federal highway program because its leaders fully recognize the value of good roads, Meany said American labor believes that an effective national road system is essential to economic well-being for all.

"National Highway Week helps remind us," he said, "that one out of seven jobs in America are dependent on our highways. As we improve our highway system, we stimulate jobs and cut the cost of transportation movement."

12,260 Workers Benefit:

CWA Wins Raise In Two Bell Pacts

Wage rates which the Communications Workers hoped would set a pattern for its 1961 negotiations have been agreed to by the CWA and two Bell System companies with 12,260 covered workers.

Increases averaging 8 cents an hour, or approximately 2.8 percent above present wages, will go into effect for 6,131 employes of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. in Washington, D. C., and northern Virginia, and for 6,129 downstate Illinois traffic employes of the Illinois Bell Telephone Co.

Negotiations with the two companies were conducted in Washington and Chicago, with national CWA officers coordinating the negotiations to meet the national goals set by the union's collective bargaining policy committee in March.

Under a wage reopening clause in existing three-year contracts, the wage increases ranged from $1.50 a week to $3.50.

For the first time, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said, the union was able to move toward major goals of upgrading pay rates for telephone operators and reducing geographic wage differentials.

The agreement provides that operators, the largest single group of workers in the industry, will receive $3 a week, equal to the increases for the highest categories of plant workers. That is a company recognition, Beirne said, that higher pay is required for the new skills resulting from advancing automation.

It was agreed also that wage progression schedules should be reduced by six months to shorten the time required to reach higher pay levels.

A significant achievement, Beirne pointed out, was the provision that the lowest wage schedule in Illinois Bell is eliminated and workers in various towns are upgraded to the next highest schedule.

CWA goals for 1961 include a general wage increase, shortening of the time required to reach higher wage rates, job and title reclassification, and town or wage zone upgrading in a move to eliminate all area differentials.

The two agreements were the first of an expected series. Bargaining is continuing in Bell System units in Wisconsin, Nebraska, Iowa, North and South Dakota, Minnesota, Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia.

Negotiations covering 24,000 employes of the New York Telephone Co., another Bell unit, are in a separate CWA category because the workers only recently joined CWA.

Beirne expressed satisfaction that in the first two agreements, management and labor were able to reach agreement without a work stoppage on a "constructive new contract" benefiting the parties and the general public.

IBEW Signs 'Pattern Pact' In Omaha

Omaha, Neb.—A new Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers contract worked out here with the Western Electric Co. has been hailed by IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman as a "job well done" and as likely to set a wage pattern for IBEW members in other Bell System installations.

Under the new contract—negotiated on May 13, ratified on May 14 and finally approved May 17—Local 1974 members here will receive pay increases of from 5 to 10 cents an hour, or $2 to $4 per week.

Western Electric is the manufacturing arm of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. The Omaha agreement is expected to set the pattern for wage increases involving a total of about 70,000 IBEW members who are Western Electric employes and workers in other Bell Systems installations where the IBEW has contracts.

The IBEW Western Electric Council is expected to assist in spreading to other locals, as contracts come up for renewal, the gains made in the local agreement here.

Freeman praised the negotiating team for Local 1974, which with Intl. Rep. Robert Garrity worked out the agreement in behalf of the local's 3,500 members.

'Featherbedding' False Issue, MEBA Charges

Los Angeles—The 84th convention of the Marine Engineers denounced the maritime industry for raising the "false issue of featherbedding for the purpose of destroying the jobs of maritime workers."

Delegates said management is using the issue to "cover its own deficiencies," noting that despite the steady increase in ship sizes in recent years, manning has not risen appreciably.

MEBA "intends to take all necessary steps to protect existing manning scales and to play a role in determining appropriate manning scales for newer ship types," the delegates said.

The Maritime Administration has started a study of the possibilities of partial or full automation of ship navigation and internal ship operation, and the first commercial atom-powered ship is scheduled to enter service soon. Operation costs of such ships are expected to decline radically in the near future.

American firms flying flags of foreign countries to avoid U.S. taxes and to pay low wage scales "cannot continue unchallenged," MEBA Pres. E. N. Altman said.

If the trend to "runaway" ships is not halted, he declared, "it will not be long before the American merchant marine will exist only in the pages of history."

Peter de Vries, head of the Intl. Transportworkers Federation, was scheduled to fly here to meet with MEBA officers and leaders of other maritime industry unions also attending the convention.

MEBA and three other unions—Longshoremen, Seafarers and Masters, Mates & Pilots—withdrew from the ITF recently because of what MEBA called the ITF's "high-handed suspension of the SIU in a dispute between the SIU and the British Seamen's Union."

MEBA said it is "prepared to return to the ITF if that body adopts a more urgent and effective program on runaway flags and demonstrates it will be of value to us."

URW Gains Wage Raises In Canada

Toronto, Ont.—Wage increases ranging from 4.75 cents to 16 cents an hour have been negotiated by the Rubber Workers for 1,200 employes of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., New Toronto, and almost 1,000 workers at the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. plant in Hamilton, Ont.

Under a one-year contract with URW Local 232, Goodyear will give day workers a 6-cent wage boost, while piecework rates will have 5 cents added to the hourly base. Also provided are more layoff protection, seniority improvements, and a common vacation period — the first two weeks in August. Inequity adjustments will provide an additional 6 to 11 cents an hour for some workers..

In Hamilton, Local 113's agreement with Firestone adds 4.75 cents an hour to piecework rates. Day workers and time-cycle workers will get 6-cent raises, boring mill operators 7 cents, and others up to 16 cents. The basic hourly rate formerly was $1.92.

The one-year agreement also provides a ninth holiday and vacation improvements for senior employes.

Goodyear and Firestone reached agreement recently on new contracts for URW members in U.S. plants. The two companies agreed to increase wages 7.5 cents an hour in non-tire plants over a two-year period and 14.5 cents in tire plants, and to give an eighth paid holiday and improvements in working conditions.

Haggerty Elected By Fire Fighters

Edward B. Haggerty of Cincinnati, president of the Ohio State Fire Fighters Association, has been elected an international vice president of the union, succeeding George T. Slocum of Grand Rapids, Mich., who retired because of ill health.

A veteran of 26 years in the professional fire fighting service, Haggerty took an early part in organizing Cincinnati Local 476 and subsequently was elected to responsible offices in the organization.

In his new post, Haggerty will represent the union in Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Ohio and Kentucky. He holds the rank of captain in the Cincinnati Fire Dept.

Fire Fighters Assail Merger with City Police

A strong attack on the growing effort of cities to merge their police and fire departments into one safety force has been voiced by Sec.-Treas. John C. Kabachus of the Fire Fighters. Such mergers have been proved impractical, Kabachus said.

From towns as widely separated as San Diego, Calif., and St. John's, N.B., officials have talked about consolidation—usually to help cut rising municipal costs or to counter requests of Fire Fighters' locals for negotiations on wage increases, Kabachus said.

The proposals to combine police and fire forces take several forms, but the one usually suggested is for the two departments to be amalgamated into one public safety department, with the men performing police and fire duties interchangeably.

Only one United States city—Oak Park, Mich.—has tried a merger and continued it, according to the union secretary-treasurer. Even there, complaints have been voiced with the results, he said.

The National Board of Fire Underwriters, top authority on fire departments, surveyed the Detroit suburb and reported that the number of "men available for fire duty was seriously inadequate, fire training programs were inadequate, and the force on duty might well experience difficulty in controlling a serious fire."

The Fire Fighters have found, Kabachus pointed out, that consolidation in any city is impractical because:

- The task of either the policeman or the fireman is in itself a full-time job, and the two skills are not interchangeable. Each job is for a specialist, trained over many years in the skills of his craft.
- When the departments are combined, residents no longer get the same protection against both crime and fire that they formerly had.
- In an emergency, all available members of the combined department may be summoned to one task, such as a major fire. That would leave other duties unperformed or other parts of town unprotected during the emergency.

No community has developed a practical foolproof plan of combining police and fire services, Kabachus said. He cited experience of these towns:

Hawthorne, Calif., tested the program for eight years and then found it necessary to strengthen the fire department.

In Michigan's Upper Peninsula, Escanaba, Ironwood and Ishpeming tried consolidation but all have returned to separate police and fire departments.

West Miami, Fla., and Monterey Park, Calif., talked about a merger of the two departments but dropped the idea.

Kabachus reported that robbers set fires recently in two different sections of Ste. Hyacinthe, Que., and held up a credit union for $50,000 while police were answering the two fire calls.

Lincoln, Neb., experimented with a plan for combining the two departments but dropped it after the Lincoln AFL-CIO advised the city council of experience elsewhere.

Chapman of AFSCME Goes To State Dept.

Gordon W. Chapman, secretary-treasurer of the State, County & Municipal Employes, resigned May 15 to become special assistant to the Secretary of State. He will serve in a newly-created post as coordinator of international labor affairs.

Chapman had been AFSCME secretary-treasurer since 1937, and served on several overseas assignments for the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

In 1950, he spent several months in Asia as part of a delegation which formulated plans for expanded ICFTU activity in that area.

On another ICFTU assignment, in 1956, he took part in a study of working conditions and union organization of Okinawa.

Chapman, who left his job as an official of the Wisconsin Public Welfare Dept., to become national accountant of the AFSCME shortly after it was chartered in 1936, is a member of Local 1 of the union. He is a graduate of the University of Wisconsin and has served on a number of civic and labor committees.

EXTENSION OF 1958 Defense Education Act, providing loans for needy college students and federal grants for specific educational programs, has been urged by the AFL-CIO. Shown testifying before Senate Education subcommittee is Vice Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, right, chairman of federation's Committee on Education. With him is AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, left.

Schoemann Testifies:

Extension and Strengthening Of Defense Education Urged

"Extension and strengthening" of the National Defense Education Act of 1958—enacted in the post-sputnik era when Soviet space achievements pointed up weaknesses in the U.S. School system—is needed to insure "high quality in education," the AFL-CIO has declared.

Testifying before a Senate Education subcommittee, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, chairman of the federation's Committee on Education, said continuation of the program of loans for needy college students and federal grants for specific educational programs would insure "strengthening the quality of our elementary and secondary education in the shortest possible time."

The proposed extension, contained in a bill introduced by Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.), is an important adjunct to Administration bills calling for federal grants for classroom construction and teachers' salaries, federally-financed scholarships and loans for college construction programs, Schoemann declared.

The federation spokesman had a "strong exception" to register on one phase of the Administration proposal—its provision for simple extension for three years of the area vocational training program. Continuance of aid only for the training of "highly skilled technicians" and failure to include skilled workers, Schoemann said, would be "seriously objectionable."

The "statement of findings and purpose" of the act, he pointed out, set a goal of "improved training opportunity . . . for defense-related occupations of technicians and skilled workers." Before the bill's passage, however, an amendment offered by Sen. Prescott Bush (R-Conn.) was adopted restricting the program to "highly skilled technicians."

The federation urged that skilled workers be included in these programs, that their scope be broadened to include technical as well as scientific knowledge, and that the fields in which training is given go beyond national defense to include the "economic well-being" of the nation.

Schoemann told the subcommittee headed by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) that the AFL-CIO endorsed the key provisions in the Hill measure which would:

- Make permanent the student loan program and eliminate the present annual ceiling of $90 million placed on such loans.
- Extend the provision of forgiveness of up to 50 per cent of the loan—now granted borrowers who become public elementary and secondary schools teachers—so that it would include those who become college and university teachers.
- Continue for three additional years the programs of financial assistance for strengthening science, mathematics and modern language instruction in elementary and secondary schools.
- Adjust the amounts reserved for private school loans to reallot funds not needed in a particular state, and to reduce somewhat the interest rate on loans to non-profit private schools.
- Increase from 1,500 to 5,000 the number of fellowships awarded annually for graduate study in education and to allow flexibility in the stipends so they may be adjusted to reflect changes in the cost of living.

On the subject of student loans, Schoemann urged elimination of provisions calling on "special consideration" for students showing a special aptitude in exact sciences or modern foreign languages.

He pointed out that the Administration's proposals on federal scholarships "takes the better view and allows each to study what he will without discrimination," and asked that this principle be extended to the National Defense Education Act.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce assailed the proposed expansion and extension of the program and urged that the act, which it called a "hasty compromise," be allowed to expire in 1962.

In a statement filed with the subcommittee, the chamber said the program "would lead to a federal power structure designed to direct the course of American education" and would "augment the tremendous power of the Commissioner of Education."

Shift in Civil Defense Opposed by AFL-CIO

Organized labor is "gravely concerned" by Administration task force recommendations which reportedly would place the nation's civil defense program under the National Guard in the Defense Dept., the AFL-CIO has told Congress.

"Once civil defense and its function is placed in the Dept. of Defense, it ceases to be a civil function by and for civilians and becomes a military function based on military practices and concepts, including conscription and martial law," a federation spokesman told a House Appropriations subcommittee.

Testifying in support of budget requests totaling $110 million for civil defense for fiscal 1962, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. George D. Riley called the sum "'a modest one considering the job to be done." He urged that the full proposed amount of the appropriation be granted so that civil defense "'may function to its fullest potential."

The AFL-CIO's interest in a strong civil defense, Riley said, is based on a desire for "survival" of the nation in the event of an enemy attack, and maintenance of the Office of Civil & Defense Mobilization as it is presently constituted "is the only sound and sensible approach."

"As the largest segment of the American population," he continued, "labor has a tremendous stake in the success of civil defense, not only as citizens prepared to bear their responsibilities but numbering those who are charged with . . . repairing man-created damage . . . in order that we continue to maintain our national fabric and entity."

The AFL-CIO, he said, is "concerned" with the failure of the Administration to name any civil defense leaders except the director and the deputy director. Regardless of future determination of the final role of civil defense—either as a separate agency or a part of another department—its function is "too vital to neglect appointment" of its full leadership, Riley declared.

As long as the Communist countries continue their "constant probing and flexing of their muscles," the federation spokesman said, the nation must strengthen its home front defenses.

School Bill Threatened By Segregation Issue

hibit the government from denying to grants to school districts which were in compliance with the provisions of the school-aid bill but, by inference, without relation to the Supreme Court's historic desegregation decision.

The private school issue was sidestepped for the present when efforts were abandoned to tie in limited assistance to private and church-affiliated schools.

The effort to aid private schools may come instead when Congress considers extension of the National Defense Education Act, which already allows for small federal grants for these schools to equip science laboratories and to provide specific non-religious programs.

Another Hurdle Ahead

Ahead of the aid-to-education bill lay another major hurdle: a battle over the complex formula, based on per capita income in each state, under which federal grants will be distributed. As it went to the Senate floor, the Morse bill called for grants ranging from a low of $9.26 per pupil in Connecticut to a high of $27.77 in Mississippi, South Carolina and Arkansas.

A House Education subcommittee has reported a bill, now being considered in full committee, which would set a per-pupil minimum of $12 and use a different per-capita-income formula for grants above that level. The Administration originally had asked for a $15 base.

Both the House and Senate bills would count public and private school enrollment in figuring the amount due each state, but would limit aid to public schools.

In his education message, Kennedy had said that since aid would not be made available to private schools, the head count for the purpose of grants should be limited to pupils in public schools.

Both House and Senate versions of the school bill go beyond Administration proposals on aid to so-called "impacted" areas—communities in which school population is swollen by the children of employes of major federal installations.

Kennedy had asked that this aid be trimmed back, and requested only $600 million to continue it. Both measures, however, call for $840 million to extend the program unchanged for an additional three years.

L-G Boycott Rulings Called Attack on Right of Free Speech

San Francisco—Two broadcast unions, on strike against a Sacramento television station, have renewed charges that a National Labor Relations Board interpretation of Landrum-Griffin boycott provisions is a direct violation of their right of free speech.

Their statement followed a trial examiner's ruling that the unions committed an unfair labor practice by conducting a "do not patronize" campaign among advertisers of Station KXTV.

NLRB Examiner Howard Myers held that the unions—locals of the Broadcast Employes & Technicians and the Television & Radio Artists—violated the L-G amendments of the Taft-Hartley Act by "threatening, restraining or coercing" Sacramento business firms to stop advertising on KXTV.

Finding that several companies did stop advertising as a result of the informational campaign, Myers held that the union activities were not protected by the specific L-G section authorizing "publicity" actions.

The examiner's finding was the second seeking to prohibit union "unfair" campaigns. Last month a federal district court judge issued an order forbidding labor organizations from putting the station or its advertisers on an "unfair" list.

NABET and AFTRA representatives have said they will fight both the injunction and the trial examiner's ruling if the latter is supported by the NLRB.

The unions argue that their leaflet and handbill campaign was not designed to cause anyone to stop working for secondary employers, and did not result in any such stoppage. Therefore it should not be held in violation of the law, which contains the following specific language:

"Nothing . . . shall be construed to prohibit publicity, other than picketing, for the purpose of truthfully advising the public . . . that the products are produced by an employer with whom the labor organization has a primary dispute . . . as long as such publicity does not have the effect" of inducing anyone to refuse to transport goods or perform services for the secondary employer.

The examiner held that the 1959 L-G amendments, regardless of the "publicity" clause, changed the former law by "forbidding threats or coercion against any person engaged in commerce" or an industry affecting commerce.

The dispute between the broadcast unions and the station started after several years of peaceful relations. KXTV was sold in 1959 to John Hay "Jock" Whitney, former U.S. ambassador to Great Britain, and other owners. The new management repudiated an oral agreement and demanded several backward steps, the unions said. They struck last Sept. 26 and posted pickets. The station retaliated by hiring strikebreakers.

Shortly afterward, the strikers set up committees to call on advertisers and labor bodies. When some advertisers canceled contracts, the station complained to the NLRB, and Gen. Counsel Stuart Rothman issued a charge of unfair labor practices and backed it with his injunction procedure in U.S. district court.

Since the court order was issued, management has filed a $105,000 damage suit against the two unions.

Soviet, Guatemala Ratify ILO Pacts

Geneva—The Intl. Labor Organization has announced ratifications of four ILO conventions by Russia and one by Guatemala.

The Soviet Union accepted the conventions on underground employment of women in mines; the protection of wages; job discrimination, and establishment of a minimum age for admission to employment as fishermen. Guatemala ratified the convention providing for the creation of minimum wages.

Unions Plan Hemispheric Anti-Red Bloc

San Juan, Costa Rica—A Western Hemisphere anti-Communist alliance of free trade unions in the entertainment industry was the goal in a week-long conference opening here May 19.

Delegates from 17 nations, including South and Central America, the Caribbean and North America, were scheduled to attend. They were expected to include Argentina, Bahama Islands, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Honduras, Jamaica, Mexico, Panama, Peru, Trinidad, United States, Uruguay and Venezuela.

Listed as delegates were Pres. Richard F. Walsh of the Theatrical Stage Employes, Pres. Herman Kenin and Sec. Stanley Ballard of the Musicians, Pres. George W. Smith of the Broadcast Employes, Pres. George Chandler and Pat Somerset of the Screen Actors.

Also, Executive Sec. Donald F. Conaway of the Television & Radio Artists, Sec. Jackie Bright of the Variety Artists, Executive Sec. H. O'Neil Shanks and Counsel Robert W. Gilbert of the Screen Extras, Frederick O'Neal of Actors Equity, Albert Hardy of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

How Taft-Hartley Delays Break Unions

Gastonia Workers Tell of Discharges

By David L. Perlman

Three southern textile workers have told a congressional subcommittee how a hostile employer broke their union organizing drive and so intimidated the workers that employes who once enthusiastically signed union cards are now afraid even to accept a leaflet "because they know the company is watching out of the window."

The three—Glenn Underwood, Leonard Fields and Allen Blake—were outspoken supporters of the Textile Workers Union of America at the Threads, Inc., plant at Gastonia, N. C., during a 1958 organizing campaign.

They told the Pucinski House Labor subcommittee investigating the National Labor Relations Board that the union had lost the 1958 representation election, 262-to-228, after a management campaign of threats and harassment.

The three workers were among those who testified against the company at NLRB hearings—testimony which was a factor in a labor board decision to set aside the election results. All three were subsequently fired by the company.

TWUA Gen. Counsel Benjamin Wyle told the subcommittee that if the discharged union supporters could have been immediately reinstated, workers at the plant would have known that the government's guarantee of their right to organize "meant what it said." The union could have gone ahead with a new election with a good chance of winning.

But he noted, it was more than a year-and-a-half before Underwood and Fields were reinstated through the NLRB. Blake's discharge, described by the company as a layoff, could not be proved to be linked to his union activities, the labor board held.

The real crusher came when Fields, three weeks after reinstatement, was fired a second time, Wyle said.

Foreman Observed

Here's how Fields described the events leading up to his second dismissal in May 1960:

After he was put back to work, "my foreman would come around and sit at the end of my machine and watch me for 15 or 30 minutes at a time." They finally "got me," he said, "for taking too long a break."

"I stepped outside to smoke a cigarette," he went on. "I was out there about four minutes . . . I had been working for the company seven years and I was never warned or reprimanded about break time during any of those years."

While Field's second dismissal was being processed by the NLRB—the case is still pending one year later—he tried to find work elsewhere in the Gastonia area.

"When you go in and ask for a job, they will ask you where you worked last . . . they say they don't have anything open," he told Subcommittee Counsel James Harkless.

'Afraid To Take Leaflets'

Sometimes, after his dismissal, Fields passed out TWUA leaflets at the plant gate.

"It is very upsetting to see how my old friends are afraid to take leaflets from me," he said.

If anyone did take a leaflet, he added, when they got inside the gate the watchman "had a box and he would tell all of them to drop the leaflet in the box."

Underwood testified that he has been threatened with discharge on several occasions since his reinstatement because he has refused to give up his practice of making detailed records in his free moments on the work he has done.

Displaying to the subcommittee 300 pages of handwritten notes, Underwood said they represented a daily record "of work I had been assigned to during the day, what had happened on my job, any imperfection in the machine I was assigned to and anything which indicated that supervisors were trying to find some excuse to fire me."

"There are hundreds of little details and it is just impossible for me to protect myself from some sort of story the company can cook up unless I am able to remember exactly what happened, when and how it happened," he added. "It is a terrific strain."

Underwood told the subcommittee: "I am not sure exactly what changes should be made in the law or the way the labor board works but I am sure that the way things are today it is just not safe to be pro-union in an anti-union company."

Blake told the subcommittee that when he was laid off about two months after the NLRB election, "I was pretty sure that the reason was that I was the only man who checked the payroll with eight union badges on."

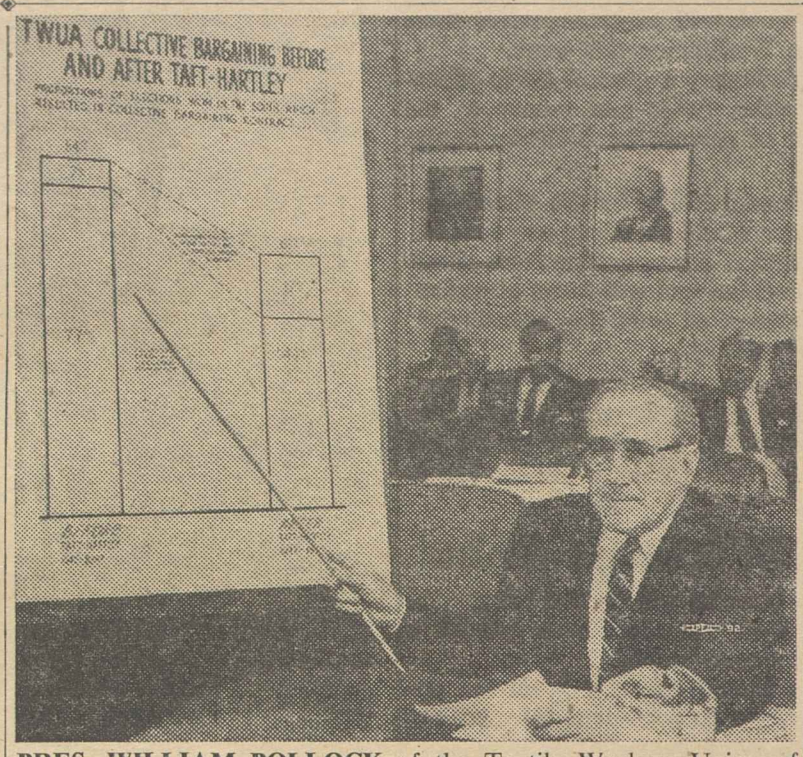
Job With Milk Company

He said his first job after being laid off at Threads, Inc., was with a local milk company "which had been delivering milk to the snack bar at Threads for about five or six years."

"I did not last long as a milkman," Blake said. After he had made two or three deliveries at his former company, Blake told the subcommittee, "Threads cancelled the milk company contract."

His next job, with a wholesale meat company, he said, also involved deliveries to Threads. The first time he made a delivery, the plant watchman "chased me out."

Later, Blake said, "I heard that a supervisor from the plant came down to the meat company and tried to get me fired." He added: "The company did not fire me, I suppose . . . because my uncle is part owner of the company."



PRES. WILLIAM POLLOCK of the Textile Workers Union of America demonstrates to a House Labor subcommittee one impact of the Taft-Hartley Act on collective bargaining in the South. Before T-H, Pollock said, 84 percent of the NLRB representation elections won by his union resulted in signed contracts and 77 percent in an extended collective bargaining relationship. Since 1947, he said, only 61 percent of election victories have brought a first contract and only 44 percent a second agreement.

Appeals to Race Bias Laid to Firms in South

A congressional investigating committee has heard testimony that southern employers have "deliberately injected" racial prejudice to break up union organizing campaigns.

Union witnesses told the Pucinski House Labor subcommittee that anti-union employers also have:

- Taken advantage of the so-called "free speech" clause of the Taft-Hartley Act and alleged "pro-employer bias" of some National Labor Relations Board members appointed by former Pres. Eisenhower.
- Fired key union supporters, with assurance that even if the workers are eventually reinstated by NLRB order the intimidating purpose will have been accomplished.
- Deliberately used delaying tactics to prolong procedures to the point where "justice delayed . . . makes a mockery" of the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively.

Representatives of the Steelworkers, Clothing Workers, Retail Clerks, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and Hosiery Workers documented the charges with case histories.

Sec.-Treas. Al Hartnett of the IUE charged that the labor board, under the former Eisenhower Administration, "sought to avoid" ruling on the deliberate use of race prejudice by employers.

Hartnett cited two examples of employer appeals to bigotry in which in 1957 the labor board turned down union protests.

A Westinghouse plant manager at Raleigh, N. C., was reported to have told "captive audience" meetings of employes before a union representation election that "if the union won, colored people would get promotions instead of white people," Hartnett said.

At Bay Springs, Miss., a plant of the Chicago-headquartered Northern Electric Products Corp. posted pictures of IUE Pres. James B. Carey with a Negro, and Hartnett said the company president followed up with a speech "focused on the racial issue."

Hartnett said that in both cases an NLRB regional director held that the use of the race issue was "protected free speech." In one case the NLRB upheld him; in the other, then Gen. Counsel Jerome D. Fenton declined to issue a complaint on the union charge of incitement of racial prejudice as an unfair practice.

USWA Pres. David J. McDonald said the Taft-Hartley Act gives employers "an arsenal of weapons with which to hamper unions." McDonald's statement was presented by Elliot Bredhoff, whose law firm serves as USWA general counsel.

McDonald said the USWA, as well as smaller and weaker unions, have found "the anti-union weapons vested in employers by the Taft-Hartley Act and the board's administrative excesses" to be "insuperable obstacles in organizing campaigns."

Speaking for the Retail Clerks, Gen. Counsel S. G. Lippman charged that "unrealistic" NLRB decisions in the retail industry "have simply repealed the National Labor Relations Act for untold thousands of workers."

He said the board has ordered single elections covering workers in stores hundreds of miles apart and in different states and has disqualified as "supervisors" $50-a-week employes with no real authority.

Jacob Sheinkman, ACWA general counsel, called for repeal of the so-called "free speech" provision of Taft-Hartley. He said genuine freedom of speech is guaranteed in the Constitution and the provision in the labor-management law "has become another weapon in an anti-union employer's arsenal."

The Hosiery Workers general counsel, Julian E. Goldberg, called for major changes in the law, including making the discharge of an employe for union activity a criminal offense. He also said that when an employer refuses to enter into a contract within 60 days after his workers have voted for union representation, a "basic contract" should automatically go into effect providing union recognition, check-off of dues, grievance and arbitration provisions and protection of existing pay and working conditions pending further negotiation, with arbitration of differences if negotiations fail.

Labor Board Acts to Expand Jurisdiction

The National Labor Relations Board, in a significant expansion of its jurisdiction, has ordered a union representation election at a big Florida amusement enterprise.

NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and his predecessor, Boyd Leedom, took opposite positions on the three-member NLRB panel which decided the case.

McCulloch, a Kennedy appointee, and NLRB Member John H. Fanning found that "the amusement or entertainment industry, although once regarded as being out of the main stream of commerce, is no longer a negligible factor in our national life."

They granted the petition of the Operating Engineers for a representation election among employes of Ray, Davidson & Ray, which operates sight-seeing tours and gift shops at Silver Springs, Fla.

Leedom, dissenting sharply, protested the decision "to depart from precedent and expend time and funds on cases affecting local enterprises in the amusement industry."

The former NLRB chairman said the board should restrict itself to "industries having a substantial impact on interstate commerce."

In the majority decision, the NLRB noted that more than 1.5 million tourists visit the firm's grounds each year. The company does a gross business of more than $2 million annually and spends some $40,000 on out-of-state-advertising. Furthermore, the labor board pointed out, the tours include rides in glass-bottom boats over a navigable river which is under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Coast Guard.

McCulloch and Fanning, rejecting the argument that the NLRB should not assert jurisdiction because it has declined to do so "in certain cases" involving the amusement industry, pointed out that the Silver Springs enterprises "are permanent year-round operations with comparatively stable and regular employment."

They noted that the company's operations are "primarily retail in character" and more than meet the NLRB's retail jurisdictional standard of at least $500,000 a year in gross business.

Editors Told Papers Upset NLRB Votes

New Orleans—A member of the National Labor Relations Board has appealed to publishers and editors of southern newspapers to cover union organizing campaigns through "informed reporting and responsible editorial statements."

John H. Fanning, addressing the annual Southern Newspaper Executives' Clinic here, said NLRB representation elections have been set aside because newspaper editorials and advertisements "created a general atmosphere of fear and confusion, precluding the holding of a free election."

He cited cases in which advertisements and editorials had warned workers that they would lose their jobs or the plant would move out of town if a union won bargaining rights.

Declaring that "a free press is . . . the backbone of a free society," Fanning added:

"So too is a free economy, and in the past several decades collective bargaining has contributed heavily to the preservation of such an economy in the United States."

Bull Scholarship Deadline July 15

Chicago — Applications for the new Russell Bull scholarship award of the Packinghouse Workers will be received by Prof. Nathan P. Feinsinger, University of Wisconsin Law School, until July 15.

UPWA Pres. Ralph Helstein has announced that Feinsinger heads a commission of five persons who will select a winner of the $1,000 annual scholarship, named for a UPWA co-founder who was a union district director when he died in 1958.

The scholarship will go to a college-age person who has been outstanding in the field of civil rights and liberties. Applicants must submit detailed information about their activity in these fields, together with two letters of recommendation from persons in such fields, to Prof. Feinsinger at the law school, Madison 6, Wis.

Year for School Aid

FOR THE MILLIONS of children jammed into large classes and operating on split sessions in inadequate schools, for the thousands of underpaid and overworked teachers and for American parents deeply concerned by the quality of education under these circumstances, the big story is in Washington this week.

For the first time in the nation's history a general aid-to-education bill covering school construction funds and money to aid teachers' salaries stands a chance of passage by both the Senate and the House.

The measure approved for Senate debate by the chamber's Labor & Public Welfare Committee would go a long way toward meeting the current crisis in education. Its separation from other education measures is a sound decision and will focus attention on the single, uncomplicated problem of providing meaningful aid for elementary and secondary schools.

Now is the time for the parents, the teachers, all citizens concerned with our educational deficit to write, wire or telephone their congressmen and senators asking for an aye vote on the bill before the Senate and on similar legislation when it hits the House floor.

No 'Recovery' Without Jobs

THE SEASONAL UPTURN in business activity and the general recovery trend from the 1960-61 recession have created a deceptive image of the nation's economic health.

Despite the welcome signs of returning vigor, it is all too apparent that the conditions that brought on our economic woes are still with us. While they may be masked somewhat by a seasonal or short-term improvement, there is a critical immediate need for long-range programs and policies to prevent a return to the same ailments in a more severe form in the next year or two.

This is the reason the AFL-CIO has in the past week called on Pres. Kennedy to spur the Federal Reserve Board to implement policies to lower long-term interest rates. This is the reason the federation is supporting a major local public works program. It is the reason also why the trade union movement is asking top priority for tax reforms to spur consumer demand rather than policies to subsidize business investment.

Chronic high-level unemployment is preventing rapid recovery from the recession. It is not yielding and probably will not yield to the short-term improvements currently capturing news headlines. The cure must stem from programs designed to bring about sustained economic growth over the complex decade of the Sixties.

114 Million Automobiles

IN 1975, according to Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges, there will be 114 million automobiles on American highways, compared to the 74 million currently on the road, posing a major problem for our road-building program.

The trade union movement has supported from the start the federal highway-building program because it plays a major role in the country's economic growth. Construction of highways to handle the ever-increasing number of vehicles is tied directly to safety, recreation, national security and employment.

As more and more Americans move behind the wheel of automobiles it becomes increasingly important that a continuing highway construction program geared to the needs of an expanding economy be maintained as an essential program on the national, state and local level.

Let's Get On With the Job

At All Levels . . . :

Greater Effort Called Essential To Raise Quality of Education

Herewith are excerpts from remarks by U.S. Commissioner of Education Sterling M. McMurrin when he assumed his office:

WE FACE EDUCATIONAL problems of great magnitude. There is a serious shortage of highly qualified teachers and adequate facilities; a neglect of the social sciences, the humanities, and the fine arts; a need for upgrading the quality and rigor of education at all levels; a necessity for a more intensive pursuit of basic research in education and the behavorial sciences and the employment of its results in the solution of current problems.

Above all, there is the problem posed by the almost tragic role of the teacher in our society.

These problems, and many others, are of grave national—even international—concern. As in the past, we may expect that the federal government will assist in the solution of these problems. And, as in the past, we must be sure that federal support does not discourage the traditional responsibility that state and local governments and private agencies have for education. Rather, federal support should encourage them to increased creative initiative and give them a greater incentive to commit their human and economic resources to education.

It would be disastrous for us to adopt any system of education that is inconsistent with the American democratic ideal. However, we should take note of the dedication to educational quality that is not uncommon in Europe, and the large commitment of economic wealth to education that is being made in the Soviet Union.

Our present waste of human resources must give way to an educational program that will fulfill the potentialities of every individual and achieve the maximum well-being of the nation. This must be done without regimenting the individual and in a manner entirely consistent with the tradition of American freedom.

I believe that desegregation must move forward in accordance with the law of the land.

I recognize the difficulties inherent in changing a system that has been rooted in our culture and economy for so many years. However, I am optimistic about the eventual outcome because of many notable instances of integration which indicate the capacity of the American people to observe both the spirit and the letter the law.

I DO NOT BELIEVE that the problems of financing education should be encumbered by social and legal issues that do not bear directly on education itself.

Although the quality of our education has improved considerably over the past few years—from elementary school through college—it is not as good as it should be.

Too often we fail to elicit from both our students and teachers their best effort. We must have greater rigor at all levels in order to achieve the proper ends of education and guarantee excellence in our society.

We pay our teachers far less than we should for the fulfillment of their proper role in society. I believe that the compensation of our teachers should be raised to a just and adequate level. A general high quality of teaching in our schools will be achieved only when our society is willing to pay for it.

I believe that increased emphasis on vocational education is an urgent national need. More attention must be given to the education of those high school graduates who can best fulfill their own and the national interest through vocational and technological pursuits.

It is in the national interest to guarantee the finest education possible for every person, regardless of his handicaps or disabilities.

We need more counseling and we need better counselors. But we must guard against destroying the initiative and independent judgment of the students who are counseled. We need better testing facilities for the identification of individual ability and creativity, but we must not let testing devices obscure the unique and precious elements in human personality.

I regard education as a continuing process that extends beyond the schools. It should engage the active interest of every citizen and the resources of our libraries and television channels, as well as other means of imparting knowledge and stimulating thought.

Morgan Says:

Birmingham Needs Psychiatry To Uproot Its Hates and Fears

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

A NUMBER OF SENSITIVE but uninformed people may think that some citizens of Birmingham, Ala., chose a strange way to celebrate Mother's Day. They went down to the bus station and brutally beat up a small group of fellow Americans, Negro and white, who had been riding through the South as representatives of CORE, the Congress of Racial Equality, to test whether equal facilities were being accorded interstate passengers, as required. Even as victims, the CORE group failed to get equal treatment; the Negroes were more savagely beaten than their white companions.

Morgan

Ghastly as this incident was, it was not surprising because this is the way things are in Birmingham. Even Berlin is not so beleaguered in this way. Birmingham's reign of terror draws on an explosive fund of ignorance and hate. There is something pathetic as well as terrifying about the plight of Birmingham and its way of life. It is trying to cut itself away from reality and there it lies already an evil urban island, dark and brooding. The hoodlums were unhampered by police whose wiry little boss, Eugene "Bull" Connor, a celebrated segregationist, had thoughtfully given part of the force extra liberty for Mother's Day, but exactly 10 minutes after the maurauders had done their violence with fists and clubs and faded from sight, the police showed up at the bus station.

One has to fight back the hot gorge of righteous anger that rises in the throat over this spectacle and realize that what these unhappy people need is not the punishment of vengeance but help. If we were a truly civilized society we would be dispatching to Birmingham platoons of psychiatrists and other therapists trained to deal with the deep corrosive wounds of hatred and fear.

The wounds of the bus assault victims are already bound up and the only help they need is public recognition of their courage. It is not they but the white supremacists suffering so desperately from feelings of inferiority who are the real victims in need of assistance.

BUT THIS ASSISTANCE of understanding cannot be given in a state of lawlessness. It is now up to the Dept. of Justice to act. Constitutional rights of free citizens have been violated.

Yet effective action here will be difficult. In the case of the other bus, which was burned before it got to Birmingham, there is a little-known law which Congress passed in 1956, presumably aimed particularly at airliner bombings, making it a felony to destroy a vehicle in interstate commerce; the penalties could include a $10,000 fine and 20 years in prison. It is also a crime to conspire to deprive a citizen of his rights. The Birmingham incident clearly smacks of the bitter juices of conspiracy which under the circumstances might be impossible to prove.

Atty. Gen. Kennedy is already squarely on record however with a pledge to enforce the law in civil rights and every other field, and presumably the FBI and other agents of his office are in full pursuit.

They have an important force to help them: the outrage of decent Southerners. The dominance of the lawful over the lawless largely explains why Georgia so far has escaped the most hideous contortions of racial violence. The CORE buses rolled through Atlanta without incident.

An Alabama newspaperman has privately confided his revulsion over the Birmingham affair, which he thought proved a complete abdication of law enforcement. After the beatings, he said the hoodlums fled in the direction of police headquarters nearby, evidently knowing in which direction protection lay. He said one Birmingham reporter was beaten up in his car and another reported on television in both Birmingham and Montgomery that what outside newspapers including the New York Times had written months ago about a reign of terror in Birmingham had been vindicated.

Our particular source said he was put out at CORE's so-called "freedom riders" for their alleged attempt to provoke an incident but he thought people were more incensed over the violence. "The prevailing view," he said, "seems to be that the freedom riders asked for it but they shouldn't have been allowed to get it."

The freedom riders of CORE ended their 11-day test of the speed of southern desegregation in New Orleans after flying from Alabama without further incident. Their brave but bloody trip should remind us that our costly defense of freedom abroad is pretentious waste if we cannot move faster than this toward the realization of genuine constitutional freedoms for all our citizens at home.

Washington Reports:

Goad to Economy Seen Needed To Get Jobs for 'Hard Core' Idle

MAJOR STEPS to stimulate the economy and thorough survey of the composition of the jobless are necessary to get the American "hard core" of unemployed back to work, declared Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.), vice chairman of the Joint Congressional Economic Committee, and Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.), member of the Senate Labor Committee, as they were interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 460 radio stations.

Douglas said the "hard core" of unemployed consists of those jobless for more than half a year, some for more than a year, who number at least a half-million. Many, he said, are in coal mining towns, textile centers and other areas that have exhausted their natural resources such as copper mines and timber.

He called for a reduction in interest rates, retraining of workers thrown out of jobs by automation and other economic measures.

Prouty said that present statistics on joblessness are not adequate and that a detailed study is required to determine the actual number of hard core jobless, including claimants who have exhausted their benefits and are no longer on the lists.

He said that it would be helpful to know how many jobless are high school and college graduates, how many are over 40, what job experience and training each has, whether he or she is a member of a minority group, and anything else pertinant to understanding the scope of the problem.

THE DEPRESSED AREAS law, now passed and signed, should aid materially in reducing the number of jobless and bringing about more helpful economic conditions, Douglas asserted.

"There is one feature of this legislation that has been little noticed but which I think is very important," he said. "That's a provision for retraining the currently unemployed. In this connection, I'd like to say there should be considerable training for service occupations. Girls are needed as nurses, for instance."

Prouty observed that the depressed areas bill should provide information to aid in other jobless areas and added he was "glad" the problem "is not being treated in a partisan sense."

To stimulate industrial competition, Douglas urged "a vigorous anti-trust policy." He said he thought the price-fixing situation revealed in the electrical industry was widespread, and added: "Immediately after the jail sentences, the price of electrical equipment, I am told, fell 20 to 30 percent."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE REPUBLICAN OLD GUARD and private business interests—joined in the kind of alliance they understand best—are preparing an all-out war on Pres. Kennedy's plans to reorganize the administrative and regulatory agencies. It is in a fight of this nature that the naked power struggle in the capital is most clearly revealed.

The President wants, generally, to increase the authority of the chairmen of the agencies—the National Labor Relations Board, the Federal Power Commission, the Communications Commission and others—to assign cases to fellow commissioners and to direct the staff work.

He wants, generally, to give the commissions authority to farm out routine cases to regional and other relatively low-level hearing officers. This would leave the commission free to act in something of an appellate capacity in major cases.

As the trade associations, the lawyers for business groups and the GOP Old Guard marshal their arguments against Kennedy's reorganization plans, there will be much talk of White House "encroachment" on the domain of Congress.

There will be attacks on the role of James M. Landis, Kennedy's adviser on the agencies, as a purported "czar." There will be citations of the role played by Sherman Adams, long Mr. Eisenhower's top aide, in embroiling himself with the work of the agencies.

MOST OF THIS can be taken for what it is—window-dressing paraded for the purpose of masking the real objection to the agency reorganization.

The purpose is to accomplish the maintenance of the agencies as they now operate—with overcrowded dockets, inefficient methods that invite prolonged delays, confusion of administrative authority.

It is also designed to serve as a subtle warning to Kennedy's new agency chairmen—Newton Minow of the FCC, Frank W. McCulloch of the NLRB and others—that the GOP and business community are prepared to resist serious moves toward strengthened regulation of industry.

Landis, Minow and others have made it clear that their objective is precisely the strengthened regulation that industry fears; that they wish to raise the standards so that the agencies will function as genuinely quasijudicial bodies free of pressure, fixing and interference from any source, either the White House or members of Congress who have grossly intruded in the past.

When Sherman Adams interfered to get a Securities & Exchange Commission hearing postponed until after a House vote involving the abortive Dixon-Yates deal, it was a prime example of the subservience of an agency to outside purpose, and such things can never be eliminated or reduced unless the standards of the agencies are raised.

Good men can operate, of course, under weak laws, while ineffective commissioners may not do good work even with the best system. But this is a different kind of issue, involving the political tone of the Administration and Congress, the kind of nominees appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE professed serious alarm before a House subcommittee about the tremendous backlog of undecided NLRB cases. But a reading of the fine print made it clear that the chamber, in making the argument, was seeking to remove as many business firms as possible from NLRB jurisdiction.

It blandly suggested that the labor board abandon most of its authority to the separate states, most of which have no labor laws that effectively guarantee collective bargaining and self-organization rights.

In the absence of this change, the chamber said, the NLRB should be abolished and a system of "labor courts" created.

The board's backlog, of course, is a scandal. But it can handle its case load if it is permitted to delegate smaller cases to regional offices and function itself in an appellate capacity. It does not need to disembowel itself.

JOBS FOR THE JOBLESS, especially the "hard core who have been unemployed for six months or more," is an urgent subject for action by government, business and labor, Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) of the Joint Congressional Economic Committee, left, and Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.), of the Senate Labor Committee, declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

How to Buy:

Houses, Mortgages, Appliances Offer Price Cuts During June

By Sidney Margolius

THIS IS A BETTER YEAR than last for shopping for houses, mortgages to finance them and the appliances to equip them.

There are sharp reductions this spring on refrigerators and washing machines, and the first signs of price cuts on furniture.

You also now can find excellent values in vacuum cleaners and TV sets, which are unloaded in June at sharpest reductions to make way for next year's models.

Other June buying opportunities include sales of women's dresses; clearances of summer fabrics; seasonal price reductions on lumber, paints, plumbing and heating equipment, and rug-cleaning specials.

You also get a small break on your food bill this month. Wholesale food prices recently dropped to the lowest levels since last September.

Here are tips on these and other June buying opportunities:

TV SETS, APPLIANCES: The bargains in TV sets this month are 19-inch table models which manufacturers are using as price leaders. These are available for as little as $125-$135.

In vacuum cleaners, most all-around useful type is the new high-power canister cleaner with rotating, power-driven brush in the nozzle. The brush beats out more dirt than a cleaner without one. These cleaners have 1.25 or 1 1/3 horsepower motors. With the power-driven brushes they clean rugs almost—not quite—as effectively as upright cleaners, and are more convenient for general household cleaning than uprights. Such heavy-duty canister vacuums generally sell for $50-$75.

If you don't have much rug area to clean, economy canister cleaners with 2/3 of 1 horsepower to 1 horsepower motors are available for as little as $35-$40.

Some women worry about the efficiency of their cleaners when all they really require is more frequent emptying of the dust bag. Tests by the Nebraska Experiment Station found that as the bag fills, efficiency declines noticeably, since the air entering the nozzle must be exhausted through the bag. Some makes of cleaners were found to lose as much as 31 percent efficiency as the bag fills.

HOUSES, MORTGAGES: Prices of houses have leveled off, and mortgage interest rates have declined just a little this spring.

If you're looking for a place to rent, the National Association of Real Estate Boards reports that there are more apartments available now. Single-family homes for rent are harder to find. Apartment rentals have stopped going up, and even have decreased slightly in a few cities.

An experiment recently completed by the U. S. Agricultural Research Service provides some useful tips for home-seekers. Not all modern housing ideas turned out to be truly practical. The government specialists report that families found floor-to-ceiling windows left too little wall space in a small house. They also made it hard to protect interiors from sunlight, with resultant fading of furnishings, and heat and glare. Such windows require a sizable roof overhang, shade trees or an awning.

A family living in a house that featured "open planning," with only partial walls or none separating living areas, found that the arrangement did provide spaciousness but not enough privacy. The families in the experiment agreed that separate dining and living areas still are preferable.

Despite the increase in the money supply, and the reduced demand for mortgages, interest rates have been going down only very grudgingly. The Administration itself has reduced FHA mortgage rates only one-fourth of 1 percent. Effective rate is now 6 percent.

However, buyers and sellers currently don't have to pay as much extra discount to get a mortgage, except for VA mortgages. Vets still have to pay discounts of 5 or 6 points for a GI loan. A five-point discount means that on a $10,000 mortgage, you really get only $9,500 but still have to repay $10,000 plus the interest.

Author A. M. Watkins reports that closing costs are being trimmed a little. He advises home buyers to bargain harder over such costs, which often range from about $300 to as much as $750. Closing costs generally include title search and insurance, and extra charges for the mortgage disguised as "commitment" or "service" fees.

Watkins says that if a house is resold within 10 years, the buyer may be eligible for a 40-50 percent discount on his title insurance if he takes over the previous owner's policy rather than buying a new one. He advises asking your attorney or mortgage lender about such a re-issue policy.

When you buy a new house you sometimes can get a break from a builder who has packaged the title insurance for his whole project at one time, thus reducing the cost of each individual policy.

FOOD: Broilers and turkeys especially are in heavy supply and priced low this month. Beef prices are still fairly reasonable but will start climbing as we get into hot weather.

Rooted in Past:

Peace Corps Study Sets Forth Guidelines

If there is to be a historian for the Peace Corps, a likely candidate could be Dr. Samuel P. Hayes, professor of economics at the University of Michigan.

His little book, "An International Peace Corps . . . The Promise and Problems," examines all aspects of the Peace Corps, its origin, its aims and purposes, and suggests ways it should operate.

While there is no question that such leaders as President John F. Kennedy, Sen. Hubert Humphrey, the late Sen. Richard Neuberger, Rep. Henry Reuss and others gave the Peace Corps life and scope, it is important to remember, as Hayes emphasizes, that other imaginative and practical idealists saw a similar vision of the future in the miseries of the past.

The American philosopher, William James, at the turn of the century called for a "moral equivalent of war" in the form of an army which would conscript youth for useful social good and, in the process, send them back to society with "healthier sympathies and soberer ideas."

Hayes has described the sweep of enthusiasm that engulfed the college campus following the introduction in Congress in early 1960 of the Ross-Neuberger bills to provide a study of a Point Four Youth Corps. The public at large was also sympathetic to the idea. Hayes, as a good historian should, also credits some of American labor's early support for the Corps.

Hayes argues that the Peace Corps has a special role to play in providing "middle manpower," such as teachers for the schools and technical institutes, surveyors, blueprint readers, data collectors, aides to foreign technical experts, to USIA, ICA and other government agencies. He is clear to the dangers of possible competition with nationals of the less-developed countries and warns "the Intl. Peace Corps should produce more jobs, not take away jobs. The volunteers should engage in work which nationals of the host country are unable to do. Nothing would give the Peace Corps a black eye faster than for idealistic young volunteers to flood into underdeveloped countries and be seen as taking away jobs which the nationals of those countries think they can and want to do. Quite the contrary, each . . . project should open up some opportunities to nationals right away, as counterparts or co-workers with Peace Corps volunteers."

These and many other facets of the Peace Corps are examined carefully and Hayes does not hesitate to give his own strong views.

He wants it internationalized, he favors a large operation and even calls for Peace Corps projects in the U.S. Some of the points he makes are debatable or have been resolved by the establishment on Mar. 1, 1961, on a temporary basis of the Peace Corps by Executive Order of Pres. Kennedy.

The emphasis on youth, for example, has been tempered by the call for older experienced hands as well. Many of these problems are still being discussed from every angle by a hard-working cadre of administrators and staff who burn night lights at Peace Corps headquarters in Washington.

This book helps to clarify thinking about the Peace Corps' form and substance. Whatever the form, procedure or method finally worked out, Kennedy has set the tone in his belief that the goals of the program will not be reached quickly, that there are great obstacles ahead, but that the Peace Corps offers Americans an opportunity to take an active role in what he calls "a long twilight struggle . . . a struggle against the common enemies of man: tyranny, poverty, disease and war itself."

From Soup to Nonsense:

It's About Like Trying to Tell The Scorecard Without Players

By Jane Goodsell

HERE ARE THE ANSWERS. You should be able to figure out what the questions were:

"Aw, Mom, do I have to? I had one last night."

"I'd sure like to help you out, chum, but I'm kind of strapped myself."

"Oh, is that the one about the psychiatrist who was captured by cannibals? Yep, I've heard it. Funny one, huh?"

"Well — uh— the stork brought —I mean, Daddy and Mommy — uh — how would you like a nice, fresh oatmeal cookie, darling?"

"Well, of course I do. Why do you think I married you?"

"You most certainly do. Every bite. Why, there are thousands of little children in India who'd be glad to. . . .

"What was what? Go back to sleep. You're imagining things."

"No, but I saw the movie."

"Yep, just pulled out. There'll be another one leaving in—let's see, an hour and 40 minutes."

"I suppose so, if you like that type of looks."

"How was I to know you were saving it for dinner?"

"Well for the luvva Pete, you told me to be frank!"

"It's not that I don't like you, Ralph, but this is our first date and I have my reputation to think of."

"No, but I know of him."

"But I do, honey. I'm crazy about her. I just think it would be more fun for you to take the kids and go to visit her instead."

"Well, I was until you woke me up."

"Now? Do you really have to? Can't you wait till we get home like a big boy?"

Labor's Economic Review:

4-Point Growth Plan Offered to Boost Jobs

A significant reduction in joblessness can be achieved by vigorous public and private reaction along four main lines, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research has reported.

In predicting little likelihood otherwise of "any immediate significant improvement" in unemployment, the department urges, in the current issue of Labor's Economic Review, action in these areas:

- An increase to at least 5 per cent a year in the economic growth rate by a temporary tax cut, public works programs, encouragement of private investment, and similar policies.
- Improvement in the federal-state system of unemployment insurance.
- Better use of the collective bargaining process to cushion the impact of unemployment — better scheduling of work and overtime, transfers of workers, automation funds, retraining, reduction in working hours.
- Special programs to melt "pockets" of unemployment caused by long-term joblessness.

The Review made these recommendations for solving the problems of long-term unemployment:

The U.S. Employment Service should become again a place where a worker can find a new job, instead of a place to go for jobless benefits. The entire operation, the Review said, must be revamped to develop a better placement service, give workers more effective counseling, and provide a better system of matching the unemployed worker to a job, even an out-of-town job.

New legislation is needed to meet the special problems of older workers, developing a method whereby they can be retrained for newer skills.

Congress should also consider a system of relocation allowances for unemployed families for whom jobs can be found in other parts of the country. Experience with the new depressed areas law will determine if such aid must be provided.

The federal government could develop a special training and work program, such as the Civilian Conservation Corps of the 1930s, for the younger unemployed. Those still in school should be encouraged to stay, at least until they are graduated from high school.

A special educational program is needed to end the present discrimination by employers against workers 35 to 40 and over, plus a new retraining program for older workers. For those jobless at 55 or 60, special assistance may be needed to tide them over to retirement age.

More effective government programs are needed to assure that qualified Negro workers be given equal hiring opportunities.

Citing an unemployment rate that has been staying close to 7 per cent recently, the Review pointed out that those working as little as one hour a week are counted as employed. It said Labor Dept. figures indicate that "approximately 3 million workers who wanted full-time work had to accept part-time jobs in April."

As serious as present unemployment is, the future gives more cause for worry because an increasing number of young people will be entering the labor force every year. The Review reported that the number of those reaching 18 will jump from 2.6 million in 1960 to 3.8 million in 1965.

"The test of our economy," the publication said, "is not only whether it can generate jobs for this growing number of young people, but also whether it can find work for those who lose their jobs" because of the increasing trend toward automation.

'Briefing' Show Wins Praise From Public

The public affairs television series "Briefing Session," co-produced by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center, is gaining wide public support from national groups.

The National League of Women Voters has sent letters to its local groups over the country suggesting they contact program managers if the series is not running in their city. The American Veterans Committee is doing the same thing and the Anti-Defamation League of the B'nai B'rith has sent program information to its 27 regional offices. State Parent-Teacher association presidents are also bringing it to the attention of local associations.

"Briefing Session" is offered free to stations in areas not serviced by an educational television channel and so far 34 commercial stations are programming it. This makes a total of 80 major cities where the series is being seen. A number of others are in the process of clearing time to schedule the programs.

Airport Aid Bill Endorsed by Pilots

Pres. C. N. Sayen of the Air Line Pilots has urged congressional approval of bills providing $75 million a year in federal aid to airport construction and development.

He told the House Interstate & Foreign Commerce Committee that even more funds could be justified, declaring that improvement of airport facilities "is an investment in the future that will save money as well as improve safety and efficiency."

Migrant Farm Worker Plight To Be Aired

A subject getting more and more attention in Congress, the plight of the migrant farm worker, will be discussed on the next program of "Briefing Session."

According to government figures there are 1 million adult workers and an uncounted number of children who migrate from region to region of the nation as they follow crop harvests.

The impoverished lot of these workers first came forcefully to the attention of many Americans with the broadcast last year of Edward R. Murrow's television program, "Harvest of Shame."

With the regular moderator on "Briefing Session," Edward P. Morgan, will be guest panelists Matt Triggs, assistant legislative director of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and Sen. Harrison Williams (D., N. J.). Triggs opposes many of the bills proposed by Williams to ease the plight of migrant workers.

THE PRACTICE of journalism in America was discussed on "Briefing Session" by panelists Marya Mannes of Reporter magazine and Benjamin Bradlee, chief of the Washington Bureau of Newsweek.

Briefing Panel Sees 'Trivia' in U.S. Press

The American public is beeing deluged by the mass media with a flood of trivia in a fierce competition for the individual's attention. That was the starting point for a discussion of the practice of journalism in the latest edition of "Briefing Session," public affairs television series co-produced by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television and Radio Center.

Guest panelists were Marya Mannes of Reporter magazine and Benjamin Bradlee, chief of the Washington bureau of Newsweek magazine. The program's regular moderator, Edward P. Morgan, pointed up the problem:

"We now have international events virtually a dime a dozen, and distracted Americans are being addressed by our mass media in an increasing flood of words and pictures. The question is, how much attention is being paid, and is the message coming through loud and clear, and truthfully?"

A partial answer came in the briefing by news analyst John MacVane. He said that the Minneapolis Star & Tribune conducted a poll in its circulation area just as the Eichmann trial started. In spite of the black headlines and the many columns of print given to the trial, the poll disclosed that fully half of those questioned had never heard of Adolf Eichmann.

If one of the most widely reported news stories of recent years did not win the attention of half the readers in one large newspaper's area, what happens to less sensational stories? Miss Mannes concluded that, as a people, our minds have been allowed to wander since childhood.

"I just do not think that we are disciplined in concentration," she said. "In order to get the attention, you make the headlines out of these crises, which are indeed crises, but it has just been shown that even that does not get through."

Bradlee gave journalistic media a low score on their handling of the Cuban situation. He said reporters and editors were taken in by both the rebels and the Castroites.

"It happened to be in the interests of both to blow this story up," he said. "For the rebels, to try to create the revolution inside Castro's Cuba that never took place; and Castro, of course, if he was going to beat anything, wanted to beat the biggest thing he could possibly make out of it."

Morgan mentioned the accusation being leveled against the Kennedy Administration that it has been "sitting" on news.

"The fact is in my experience the communication between a journalist and the source in Washington has never been better," Bradlee said. "It is the communication between the journalist and the reader that apparently breaks down."

Miss Mannes agreed and added that editors and publishers are not taking their responsibilities adequately.

"It still leaves a lot of responsibility on the reader and the viewer to concentrate and want to be informed," she said.

Vermont AFL-CIO Sets Labor Institute

Winooski, Vt.—Pres. Bernard L. Sumner of the Vermont AFL-CIO has named a committee of 14 union members to help arrange a Vermont Labor Institute June 16-18 at St. Michael's College here.

Instructors from labor and college ranks will conduct workshops in parliamentary procedure, grievance handling, labor legislation, labor's civil and political rights. The institute is sponsored by the college and the state labor council.

Lead and Zinc Price Support Policy Sought

A price support program for minerals—with particular emphasis on lead and zinc, hard-hit by falling prices and rising imports over the past six years—has been urged by the AFL-CIO.

In a statement filed with a Senate Interior subcommittee, Legislative Rep. John T. Curran said "strong policies" are needed to shore up the lead and zinc industries so that their position will not "deteriorate further."

Mining of these two non-ferrous metals, he said, has undergone a long-term decline, with lead production falling off 124,900 tons over a five-year period, and zinc production declining 210,200 tons in the same time. In the same years, imports of the two products advanced 10 to 15 percent.

Accompanying the decline in production, he said, was an employment drop of 25 percent—from 16,600 to 12,300 workers. He pointed out that when the mines lay off large numbers of workers "the damage does not stop there," but extends to the shops where workers trade and the services sustained by their taxes.

Establishment of a minimum price level for minerals, the federation spokesman said, should be an integral part of a national policy on minerals aimed at maintaining a stable world market for minerals and metals, and to insure an expanding national economy and national security.

Other integral parts of such a program, Curran continued, should be a provision allowing the U.S. to barter excess minerals in the world market, or to trade surplus American foods and fibers in order to obtain necessary mineral supplies.

AFL-CIO Asks End to Child Labor on Farms

The AFL-CIO has urged Congress to consult its conscience and put an end "at long last—to child labor in the fields."

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Walter J. Mason put labor's support behind a series of farm labor bills in testifying before a select labor subcommittee of the House Education & Labor Committee.

The bills, sponsored by Subcommittee Chairman Herbert Zelenko (D-N. Y.), are designed to end child labor, root out corrupt labor contractors, stabilize migratory work and create a presidential advisory body with migrant representation.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg strongly backed the bills on behalf of the Administration, though he recommended some changes.

The hearings, to be completed in New York City, deal with some 500,000 Americans who follow the harvests. For 1959, latest year for which data are available, those migrants who worked more than 25 days averaged 119 days of farm wage work and earned a total of $710, Goldberg testified.

Mason stressed the need to end child labor in commercial agriculture.

He observed the present law permits children to be worked when school is not in session, thus inviting commercial growers to pressure local school boards into declaring "crop holidays."

In addition, Mason said, the law sanctions the practice of children following parents into the fields and almost guaranteeing that children of migrants become migrants themselves.

"There is no place for this residue of feudalism in a free society," Mason declared.

The Zelenko bill, he noted, allows farm work by children under 15 if performed for their parents or proper guardian.

Goldberg said he sympathizes with the 15-year age limit the bill would impose on non-school-hour employment but asserted "national organizations and citizens groups have long recommended a 14-year minimum as a realistic and practical one."

A special census survey in 1957, he said, estimated there were 457,000 paid workers in agriculture aged 10 to 15 years. Over half—236,000—he said, were under 14 years. He favored the 14-year cutoff since it is the minimum in other non-manufacturing and non-mining occupations.

On the same point, Goldberg had noted agriculture was the third most dangerous industry, with an accident rate in 1959 ranking just behind mining and construction. He also noted a special California report which showed serious injuries in 1959 to 550 paid farm workers under the age of 18, one-fifth of them under 16.

MORE THAN 300 New York City union members received certificates at this meeting on their completion of an institute giving class work and panels in union counseling services.

350 Union Members Qualify as Counselors

New York—More than 350 union members received certificates at luncheon ceremonies here marking their completion of union counseling classes.

The classes, covering problems of youth, health, unemployment, public welfare, consumers and retirement, were conducted by the Community Services Committee of the New York City Central Labor Council.

The graduation was part of an all-day institute which also featured panel discussions on problems and facilities in health, hospital and other fields. Resource consultants on the panels were Dr. Ray Trussell, commissioner of the Dept. of Hospitals; George H. Fowler, commissioner of the State Dept. of Labor, and other state, city and community officials.

The luncheon, chaired by Michael Sampson, business manager of Utility Workers Local 1-2 and chairman of the Community Services Committee, had as guest speakers Dr. Howard A. Rusk, director of the Institute of Physical Medicine & Rehabilitation, New York University Medical Center; Dr. S. Charles Franco, medical director of Consolidated Edison, and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the Central Labor Council.

Van Arsdale explained New York labor's position on an independent political party which a committee of the council is exploring. He said that the committee was considering political ways of continuing labor's efforts to organize the unorganized.

The labor movement has a responsibility to promote higher living standards and to build a better community, he declared, and if the present political alignments cannot bring about these goals, then labor and like-minded people must make their voices heard.

The political parties never consult labor on candidates and they rarely consult labor after the campaign, but the trade unions are expected to carry the ball on getting out the vote, he said.

Rusk spoke of the great need for better medical care for all.

"What we have now is a vicious circle," he said. "Sickness makes people poor and poverty makes people sick. It's about time we broke out of this circle."

Other speakers were John Burnell and Peter Crescenti, associate chairman and secretary, respectively, of the Community Services Committee; Michael Mann, AFL-CIO regional director, and Patrick Kelly, Sam Kovenetsky, Charles J. Garrahan, James L. O'Hara, Jack Ossofsky and John J. Flanagan, subcommittee chairmen who headed discussion panels.

Van Arsdale received the committee's first annual award for service to the community and Austin Perlow, business and labor editor of the Long Island Press and a Newspaper Guild member, was cited for his cooperation with the objectives of the committee.

Latin Labor Training Program Is Approved

of an experiment conducted last year at the conference center of the Communications Workers at Front Royal, Va., in which Latin American telephone, telegraph and postal union leaders received training under the auspices of the industry's international trade secretariat, the Postal Telephone & Telegraph Intl.

The need for such a program in terms of the over-all economic welfare of Latin American countries was noted by William Benton, publisher of the Encyclopedia Britannica and a member of the policy and design committee.

"One of the great hopes for the strengthening of the Latin American economies is the development of strong unions free of economic domination," he said. "This hope is linked with the elimination of illiteracy and the improvement of education. Both are necessary to rapid economic growth."

John McCollum, director of the University of Chicago's Union Research & Education Projects, which developed the proposal, emphasized that the purpose of the program is not to propagandize, but to develop knowledge and skill.

With knowledge and skill, he continued, Latin American labor leaders will be able to make decisions on their own and to understand and interpret for their members the complicated social, economic and political events which affect them.

"Latin American societies are undergoing far-reaching economic, political and social changes," said McCollum. "Those associated with this project realize the difficulties involved. But it is hoped that in some small way in consultation with Latin American trade unionists, programs and activities can be developed that will make these changes meaningful and trade unionism strong."

Some Co-Conspirators 'Born Chiselers':

Price Rigger Tells Kefauver He Is 'Not Terribly Sorry'

A company president who freely admitted getting together with competitors to fix prices has told the Kefauver Senate Anti-Trust subcommittee that he is "not terribly sorry" about his participation in the electrical equipment industry's price conspiracy.

Fred F. Loock, $130,000-a-year president of the Allen Bradley Co. of Milwaukee, told the subcommittee that one of the troubles with the conspiracy was that some of the participants were "born chiselers" who didn't live up to price agreements.

"I have personally always been out of sympathy with low prices," Loock declared.

"We gather that," Subcommittee Chairman Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) remarked drily.

Lock's testimony contrasted with a strong disavowal of price-fixing by Westinghouse Pres. Mark W. Cresap, Jr.

Cresap said he believed price-fixing developed within his company because of "inadequate dedication to the principle that vigorous competition is the strongest foundation for the American economy." He pledged to make obedience to the anti-trust laws a "way of life" at Westinghouse and announced appointment of a watchdog committee of prominent outsiders.

The subcommittee also heard:

● Max Scott, president of the I-T-E Circuit Breaker Co. of Philadelphia, testify that he had heard of an agreement between GE and Westinghouse to divide up the market which dated back to 1896.

Scott said his late father had told him that the two big firms had entered into a 15-year agreement that year under which GE would get 60 percent of the business and Westinghouse 40 percent. He said that his personal participation in price-fixing meetings dates back to 1930.

● Nye S. Spencer, an I-T-E sales manager, whose meticulously-kept records helped the government break the case, described a memo he had prepared outlining security precautions to be taken by the conspirators.

Spencer told the subcommittee: "We endeavored not to travel together on the same train or plane, or have breakfast together." Other instructions, he said, were to "minimize telephoning as much as possible" and "not leave waste paper strewn around the room" after a meeting.

Spencer said if I-T-E had tried to pull out of the conspiracy, it might have brought "reprisals" from other companies.

● John K. Hodnette, executive vice president of Westinghouse, who told the subcommittee: "This is the most competitive industry I have ever seen. If there is any more competitive than this, I don't want to get into it."

Loock, a colorful witness, said he had pleaded guilty to a criminal anti-trust charge because otherwise the Justice Dept. would have "thrown the book" at him. He was fined $7,500 and his company, which makes motor controls, was fined $40,000.

Expounding on his business philosophy, the 69-year-old company president said his firm "prefers not to do business with the government."

"Why?" Kefauver wanted to know.

"It is too complicated," Loock replied. "We have got more important things to do."

In fact, Loock added, he seldom goes after any sealed-bid business. He explained: "The sealed bid serves only one purpose and that is to give the chiseler an excellent chance. We just simply cannot compete with the tin-knocker."

"Chiselers" and "tin-knockers," Loock indicated, are firms which undercut prices.

Loock, who complained that the income tax "takes away most" of his salary, said his firm was no longer meeting with competitors and added:

"How we are going to live, I don't know."

Court Impounds Price Fixing Data

Philadelphia—U.S. District Judge J. Cullen Ganey has turned down a request for disclosure of a list of witnesses and documents subpoenaed during last year's grand jury investigations of price-fixing in the electrical equipment industry.

The data had been sought to help state and local governments and private utilities prepare claims for overcharges against the manufacturers involved. Under anti-trust laws, victims of price-fixing may sue for treble damages.

Judge Ganey said the "traditional rule of secrecy surrounding grand jury proceedings" would be breached by disclosure of the information.

Civil damage suits against the conspiring companies have already been filed by the government.

Goldberg Seeks Plan To Avert Missile Delay

workers, the managements and the public alike."

The President made it plain that the nation "cannot afford the luxury of avoidable delays in our missile and space programs," and added that "neither can we tolerate wasteful and expensive habits and practices which add to the great financial burden our defense effort already places on us."

Goldberg said the conferences aired a long list of problems which "transcend the labor problem," including difficulties between missile manufacturers and contractors on the scope of their participation in the program, and involving government scheduling and changes in the complex space vehicles.

He indicated he had received "unanimous" pledges of cooperation from the four groups in order to achieve what Kennedy had asked for—"uninterrupted and economical production in our missile and space programs."

The President had directed Goldberg to step into the picture in the wake of two weeks of public hearings by the Senate Government Operations Permanent Investigations subcommittee, headed by Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.), which has been seeking to pinpoint responsibility for America's space lag.

The hearings concentrated on testimony from government contractors and military personnel centering on strikes, slowdowns, jurisdictional disputes and overtime payments to workers.

When the White House stepped into the picture, McClellan suspended the hearings before Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. was given an opportunity to testify.

In a statement filed with the subcommittee and inserted in the record, Haggerty cited statements by Kennedy, the former chief of Army Engineers and voluminous House subcommittee reports which placed "primary" responsibility for delays in the missile base program on management decisions and an "inordinate number" of changes in construction plans and missile design.

On the Senate floor, McClellan read a "closing statement" on the hearings lashing out at what he termed "wildcat strikes, work stoppages, slowdowns, featherbedding and a deliberate policy of low productivity on the part of some unions and workers," coupled with "millions of dollars in exorbitant, unnecessary overtime pay in a brazen 'gouge' of the U.S. taxpayers."

Testimony, he said, "shows that we would be at least many months ahead of our present man-in-space timetable had it not been for an incredibly low work-production output—only 40 percent of normal—by workers at Cape Canaveral, Fla., and a loss of 87,000 man-days of labor there, through work stoppages."

The Arkansas Democrat said he based this conclusion on the testimony of B. G. MacNabb, base operations manager in charge of Convair-Astronautics at Cape Canaveral.

In his testimony, MacNabb actually said that the U.S. could have been "six months ahead" in its space program with "reasonable production" at Canaveral, but emphasized that "I am not trying to blame the unions."

"There are other problems in this kind of a program," the record shows MacNabb said. "There is the lack of decision on the part of the government, the lack of decision on the part of the Dept. of Defense, the lack of decision on the part of our own management. I am probably as guilty as anybody sometimes."

Meeting with Goldberg at the building trades session were Haggerty; Vice Pres. John H. Lyons, Jr., of the Iron Workers; Pres. Maurice A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters; Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Gen. Counsel Vincent F. Morreale of the Hod Carriers; Pres. Joseph J. Delaney of the Operating Engineers; Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; and Pres. Edward F. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers.

Attending the session of industrial union representatives were Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers; Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Pres. Michael J. Quill of the Transport Workers; Pres. Al J. Hayes of the Machinists; Washington Counsel Joseph Rauh and Administrative Assistant Irving Bluestone, both of the Auto Workers; and Dir. Nicholas Zonarich of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

CORRECTION

A picture on Page 5 of the May 13 issue of the AFL-CIO News was incorrectly identified. The group shown was the AFL-CIO Committee on Education, which discussed improved labor work with the public schools and a report on a national AFL-CIO training school center.

Presiding was Chairman Peter T. Schoemann, an AFL-CIO vice president and president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters.

Rate Still 6.8 Percent:

Unemployed Still At Recession Peak

By Robert B. Cooney

The national economy, jobwise, was breathing a little easier in April but the improvements in the patient's condition were "not something you'd want to write home about," according to a government manpower expert.

The Labor Dept.'s detailed report on the job picture showed a greater-than-seasonal rise of 384,000 in non-farm jobs to a total of 52 million. Barely perceptible gains appeared in the metal working industries after a year-long decline.

The rate of unemployment—as reported in an earlier summary—"remained at its recession peak" of 6.8 percent of the labor force, allowing for seasonal factors, the Labor Dept. said.

The real test, according to Labor Dept. manpower expert Seymour Wolfbein, will be whether "this small turnabout" will produce jobs in coming months for the 1.9 million unemployed married men and the influx of new jobseekers. Overall unemployment totaled 5 million in April.

Some observers believe the employment report and the industrial production index reveal ominous tendencies:

While the Federal Reserve Board reported auto production up by 30 percent, the Labor Dept. reported the transportation equipment sector showed a gain of only 23,000 jobs to a total of 1.5 million in April.

The FRB reported steel production up 15 percent, but the Labor Dept. statistics revealed in the primary metal industries an increase of only 4,000 jobs to a total of 1.1 million. Both the auto and steel job gains, statistically, are considered insignificant.

Compared to April a year ago, the transportation equipment industry has lost 188,000 jobs and the primary metal industries 197,000 jobs.

On the economic front, there were these other developments:

● The FRB reported a strong pick-up in industrial production. Auto output, up 30 percent, and steel, up 15 percent, hiked the FRB index to 105 percent. The FRB uses 1957 for the index base of 100; it was 110 in May 1960, slumped to 102 by February, edged up in March and in April rose 2.5 percent.

● The Commerce Dept.'s Business Advisory Council, made up of top businessmen, noted the FRB report but expressed the view through a spokesman that recovery still would be slow.

F. R. Kappel, president of American Telephone and Telegraph Co. and chairman of the BAC study group on the domestic economy, was asked by reporters whether the Kennedy Administration should act to speed up the recovery.

"I would hope they didn't and that they would turn business loose and let it go to work," Kappel replied.

On the positive side, the Labor Dept. reported a rise of six minutes in the factory workweek to 39.2 hours in April. The workweek has risen by 30 minutes since the beginning of the year. The factory work force totaled 15.5 million, unchanged from March.

The increased workweek and a 1-cent boost in hourly earnings moved up gross earnings of factory workers to $91.34 in April, 63 cents over March and $1 above January.

As the summary report showed earlier, while the jobless ranks were reduced seasonally by 500,000 to 5 million, "the number out of work 15 weeks or longer rose more than seasonally to a postwar high of 2.1 million." This long-term unemployed group totaled only 1 million last December.

"Among the long-term unemployed in April," the report added, "were 900,000 without jobs for more than half a year."

While the total of jobless married men dropped 300,000 from March to 1.9 million in April, this total was 600,000 higher than in April a year ago, the report said.

Goldberg Asks Business For 'Hire Now' Policy

An intensive campaign to find jobs through the U.S. Employment Service and its state and local offices for the country's 5 million unemployed workers has been launched by Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg.

The nationwide "Hire Now" campaign also is concerned with finding job niches for the additional millions of workers who will pour into the labor market during the Sixties, Goldberg said, and is in response to Pres. Kennedy's "urgent directive to the Labor Dept. to provide better service through the public employment service system."

"This job drive is a practical appeal to employers to step up their hiring in keeping with rising levels of economic activity now under way," Goldberg added.

"By hiring promptly as vacancies develop and new workers are needed, employers can help to quicken the pace of economic recovery."

Before launching the campaign, Goldberg said, he had the employment offices take an inventory of services rendered, weaknesses to be overcome and resources necessary to assure improved job market services.

"On the basis of this inventory," he explained, "each state has prepared a specific plan of action for every metropolitan area. Agreements have been made with the states on needed improvement of service and action priorities. Additional staff resources are being made available too."

The aid of governors has been enlisted, Goldberg said, adding that he has urged employers to ask for help through USES offices as soon as jobs open.

"I am convinced," he said, "that the nationwide job drive is only the beginning of a major undertaking for the strengthening and improving of the public employment offices throughout the country.

"Through this improvement the employment offices of each community can truly render urgently needed services to jobseekers and employers and play a vital role in contributing to economic growth and stabilization in the community they serve and in the nation as a whole."

NEED FOR FEDERAL GRANTS to aid states and communities to launch short-range public works projects, as a method for reducing nation's high unemployment levels, is emphasized by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in appearance before Senate Labor subcommittee. With Meany is Research Dir. Stanley Ruttenberg.

U.S. Grants for Local Public Works Urged

for enactment of two other programs:

● Authorization for the President to transfer $2 billion from unobligated funds appropriated for executive departments and agencies to accelerate federal and federally-assisted public works projects already authorized by Congress.

● Increased low-interest federal loans for state and local community facilities so that hard-pressed localities would be able to obtain federal matching grants for public works programming.

'Flexibility' Provided

The addition of these two measures—which Meany first proposed last month in a letter to Kennedy in order to reduce unemployment from the present "intolerable level"—would give the White House "flexibility" to meet the current situation, the AFL-CIO president told the subcommittee.

The Kennedy Administration's basic programs—on housing, school construction, and the like—will be "effective economic stimulants, quite aside from their social value," Meany declared, but will not have a serious impact on the economy until "next year, perhaps, or the year after."

The Clark bill, he declared, "does not conflict with these programs; it is a necessary supplement to them" because it would "produce action, not next year, but right now."

In addition, he said, it would stimulate work on such facilities as sewage, water and drainage projects, street and highway improvements, fire and police station construction, railroad overpasses and other state and local capital improvements "which are not presently aided by federal funds but which, nonetheless, are urgently needed."

Meany, emphasizing the need for supplementary action as proposed in the Clark bill, warned that while the April increase of 2.5 percent in industrial production may be a signal that the "worst" of the business recession is over, the hoped-for upturn will not cancel out high unemployment.

Job Growth Insufficient

Although the labor movement is "optimistic enough to expect a 4 percent increase in the real volume of national production" during 1961, he said, this would produce, at most, 1.5 million more jobs—or barely enough to cover the anticipated growth in the labor movement.

"The best we can expect, then, is that by running very hard, we may be able to stand still," the AFL-CIO president declared. "We may wind up with only a few more unemployed in a 'prosperous' December 1961 than we had in a recession of December 1960."

This situation, he said, stems from a "gradual but fundamental change in the workings of our economy" over the last seven years which has left the nation with more jobless workers, at the height of each post-recession "boom," than there were before.

In 1953, following the Korean War, the nation had 1.9 million unemployed—a jobless rate of 2.9 percent—Meany noted, adding that most experts consider the nation has "effective full employment" when the jobless rate is no higher than 3 percent.

By 1956, when the nation recovered from the first Eisenhower recession, unemployment stood at 2.9 million, a rate of 4.2 percent; and in the 1959 recovery period after the second Eisenhower recession, there were 3.8 million out of work, or 5.5 percent, he declared.

Jobless and Rate Doubled

"From 1953 to 1959, the number of jobless—in time of prosperity—increased 100 percent; and the rate nearly doubled as well," Meany said.

At this rate, he said, the nation soon will be faced with "a chronic unemployment rate of between 6 and 7 percent," which will "creep upward with the passage of the years." Meany called this situation "intolerable in a free society and a permanent barrier to our national security and well-being."

Shoe Union Backs Steps Toward Unity

Boston—Members of the Shoe Workers will vote June 20 in a nationwide referendum on a convention-approved proposal to raise per capita dues from $1.35 to $1.45 per month per member.

The proposal, if approved by a majority of the union's members in 140 U.S. locals, will go into effect July 1.

Also up for membership action are 10 other changes in the union constitution approved by delegates to the 12th biennial convention here. They provide that national officers, directors, and executive board members be elected every three years instead of every two years, and make various changes required by the Landrum-Griffin Act.

Delegates unanimously approved a report of Pres. George Fecteau outlining steps toward a possible merger with the Boot & Shoe Workers and recommending an intensified organizing campaign. They voted unanimous support also of a bill introduced by Sen. Edmund Muskie (D-Me.) to regulate imports.

Convention speakers included Pres. John E. Mara of the Boot & Shoe Workers; Dir. John Livingston, AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization; Co-director Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; and R. J. Thomas, assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. All endorsed the organizing program and merger negotiations. Mara invited Fecteau to address the Boot & Shoe Workers' convention June 20 in Cincinnati, O.

The delegates heard reports that their union has organized workers of 49 new companies in the last two years—but that 47 firms went out of business.

St. Paul Rights Awards Given

St. Paul, Minn.—An AFL-CIO regional director and a local union have been cited by the St. Paul AFL-CIO's human rights committee for outstanding contributions to civil rights causes.

Carl Winn, AFL-CIO regional director for Minnesota, North Dakota and South Dakota, received an award for his work in advancing civil rights in the labor movement.

Packinghouse Workers Local 4, won a certificate of recognition.

The awards were presented at the fourth annual Institute on Human Relations, sponsored by the city central body, the Minnesota Labor Committee for Human Rights, and the Jewish Labor Committee.

Louis E. Lerman, executive director of the labor committee, said the programs that won awards for Winn and Local 4 were based on AFL-CIO civil rights policy.

Strikebreaker Curb Voted By Delaware Legislature

Dover, Del.—A bill barring third parties to a labor dispute from furnishing strikebreakers to an employer has been passed by the Delaware legislature and is awaiting the signature of Gov. Elbert N. Carvel (D).

The bill, enacted in somewhat weaker form than the original labor-backed proposal, exempts agriculture and food-processing industries. It also requires unions to notify employment agencies of the existence of a strike.

After passage by the House, 26-to-5, the Senate unanimously approved the measure.

Delaware became the sixth state to enact curbs on strikebreakers and the fourth to act this year. The others in order of passage are Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Washington and Maryland. Newspaper and printing trade unions have led a nationwide campaign for enactment of "citizen job protection bills."

Nebraska Republican Lauded:

Labor Helps Mark Norris Centennial

Labor spokesmen joined with conservationists and rural electric leaders in a Washington, D. C., conference celebrating the 100th anniversary of the birth of the late Sen. George W. Norris, Nebraska independent Republican famed for his battles in the public interest.

Norris, "father of the Tennessee Valley Authority," co-sponsor of the Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction law, was praised by Administration leaders, by Republican and Democratic Senate liberals and by historians.

Warning from Meany

The celebration was also the occasion for a warning from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany that Norris himself "would be shocked that in 1961 a liberal—or, to use a word more common in his day, a progressive—could be defined as a fellow who was trying to protect the achievements of George Norris."

Observing that the TVA was "under siege" in the Eisenhower Administration and that the anti-injunction principle in labor disputes has been "circumvented [by] the ingenuity of management lawyers," Meany nevertheless said:

"Let us think about our country and our society . . . not as something to be restored but as something to be created."

"The remedies of yesterday have little meaning for tomorrow. They will not enlist the minds and hearts of the new generation," the federation president declared.

"We must do better than that.

"We must look to the nation and the world as they ought to be—peaceful, prosperous and free; with nature's bounty harnessed for the good of all; with an ample living for all men, and with all men able to rise unhindered according to their talents; a world of justice, order and law; a world of charity and human kindness.

"You may say 'Utopia'; but so was TVA to George Norris a scant 40 years ago."

Pres. James B. Carey of the Intl. Union of Electrical Workers told the conference: "All of us, I am afraid, have become a little too complacent, a little too apathetic, a little too comfortable."

In a speech read for him because of his attendance at a Labor Dept. meeting on missile bases, Carey reminded the conference that Norris in the latter part of his career remarked: "I have faith in national progress, but I wish the pace were faster."

Norris was a senator who, during Senate debate on a proposed national sales tax, according to Carey said, "I am for lowering the taxes on small incomes and increasing them on big incomes. That is my position."

The legislative achievements of Norris included, in addition to the TVA and the anti-injunction law, co-sponsorship of the Rural Electrification Act and sponsorship of the 20th amendment to the Constitution, which abolished "lame-duck" sessions of Congress.

Clyde T. Ellis, manager of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, called on the Kennedy Administration to lead development of a massive power network for the entire Western Hemisphere. He warned that the Soviet Union is now world leader in hydroelectric projects although Norris had dreamed of giant power before Russia had a major enterprise.

Partisan 'In Public Interest'

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg termed Norris "a man partisan only for the public interest" and one who "listened more to the inner voice of duty than to the outer voice of popularity." He is "a just model and good example for the trying times through which we must pass."

Interior Sec. Stewart Udall pointed out that Norris, a midwesterner, fought for creation of the TVA to serve a region "1,000 miles away." He was a "national statesman," Udall declared.

Others who paid tribute included Pres. Kennedy's special counsel, Theodore C. Sorensen; Murray D. Lincoln of the Ohio cooperative movement and cooperative insurance operations; White House Special Assistant Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.; Senators George D. Aiken (R-Vt.) and Lister Hill (D-Ala.).

Republicans Retain Two House Seats

The Republicans retained two normally GOP districts in special elections to fill vacancies in the House.

In Pennsylvania's 16th district, former Rep. John C. Kunkel (R) defeated Mrs. Kathryn Vanderslice (D) by a nearly 2-1 margin for the seat left vacant by the death of Rep. Walter M. Mumma (R).

In Tennessee's 1st district, Mrs. Louise Goff Reece (R) easily won election to succeed her late husband, Rep. B. Carroll Reece. She rolled up a 2-1 edge over Democrat W. W. Faw.

The elections bring the House to within one seat of full strength, with the Democrats holding 262 seats and the Republicans 174.

Vacancy in Indiana

The lone vacancy is Indiana's 5th district, where a House investigating subcommittee is still trying to determine if Rep. J. Edward Roush (D) was re-elected last fall, or whether the seat was captured by Republican George O. Chambers. The subcommittee has been counting absentee ballots, but recessed before a decision on the victor.

Bipartisan Maine Vote Kills 'Work' Measure

Augusta, Me.—The Maine House of Representatives has dealt a smashing bipartisan blow to a pair of so-called "right-to-work" bills.

The House voted 98-to-45 to "indefinitely postpone" action on the measures. A later attempt to reconsider the vote was rejected by an almost identical margin.

Both bills, one of which would have submitted the issue to a referendum, reached the floor of the House with a 9-to-1 committee recommendation against approval.

With top GOP leaders, including Gov. John H. Reed, on record opposed to banning the union shop, only 45 Republicans voted to take up the "right-to-work" measures.

Sixty-one Republicans joined a solid bloc of 37 Democrats in burying the bill.

The 9-to-1 vote against "right-to-work" in the Joint House-Senate Labor Committee came after Maine's Commissioner of Labor and Industry, Marion E. Martin, reported on a survey she conducted on the effects of "work" laws on states which have them.

Miss Martin quoted state labor commissioners as reporting that "right-to-work" laws have not brought in desirable new industry and have hurt both workers and fair-minded employers.

The motion to postpone action on the "work" bills was made by House Republican Leader John Baxter. He said the governor, who earlier had stated he "sees no need" for a "work" bill, also opposes "right-to-work" on principle.

Maine had a short-lived modified "right-to-work" law in 1947 which was rejected by the voters in a referendum the following year and was formally repealed by the legislature in 1949.

Since then the "right-to-work" forces have made several unsuccessful efforts to outlaw union security agreements.

Among the Republican legislators who spoke against banning the union shop was Sumner Pike, a former chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission.

The National Right-to-Work Committee had made a major effort to build up support for a "work" law in Maine and the state attorney general recently announced an investigation into alleged lobbying activities of two of its top officials.

Conservatives Flayed in Parliament For Dip in Canada's Jobless Fund

Ottawa, Ont.—The unemployment insurance fund, which totaled $950 million in 1956, has been reduced to $185 million at last report because of government neglect and mismanagement, opposition forces charged in a vigorous two-day attack in Parliament on the Progressive Conservative administration of Prime Minister John Diefenbaker.

The fund is made up of employe-employer contributions and added money from the federal government.

Murdo Martin, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation member from Timmins, Ont., told the House of Commons during the debate that the "stark fact" which the government cannot escape is that unemployment has mounted steadily. He described as a "deliberate propaganda campaign" what he called the government's "very carefully planted" idea that "pilfering" by ineligible Canadians is to blame for the drop in the fund.

CCF Leader Hazen Argue said the fund was created to help workers who were between jobs, but that the government has used it as a major relief measure.

"The state of the fund demonstrates to all the colossal failure of the government to provide anything approaching a full employment policy," he declared.

"The fund is in a bad way largely because the government has failed to provide full employment, not because of any misuses which may exist.

"Surely all the abuses of the fund about which we have heard did not originate during the period of the Conservative government. It is strange that the Canadian people under a previous government did not appear to be abusing the fund. It is strange that under a Conservative government the people of Canada appear to have lost their morality and want to pilfer the fund."

Unless the government changes its policy on unemployment, he warned, it will be only a few months before the fund is completely bankrupt.

Last November the government said it was considering legislation which would revive the fund and provide a new basis for operation. H. J. Robichaud, the Liberal party's main speaker during the two-day debate, recalled that in 25 days before Christmas the government and Commons combined to pass an interim budget and five bills described as job-creating legislation. But after 100 days on which the House has met, he pointed out, there is still no sign of legislation to rectify maladministration and mismanagement of the unemployment insurance fund.

Labor Minister Michael Starr said the legislation is still being worked out, adding that amendments will be necessary to restore the fund's full effectiveness.

Opposition speakers charged that up to $70 million was lost when Finance Minister Peter Fleming "dumped" bonds on the open market to raise funds to meet claims filed by the unemployed. Fleming described the capital loss as "moderate."

'Unfair' Charges Again Hit Sears

Seattle, Wash.—Department Store Local 1207 of the Retail Clerks has again filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board accusing Sears Roebuck & Co. of unfair labor practices.

Local 1207 accused the retail store management here of agreeing to union security verbally but refusing to put it in writing; failure to put agreements on sales commissions in writing; an attempt to bypass normal grievance procedures; and refusal to meet with a union representative.

An RCIA spokesman said the charges reflect Sears' "cold-hearted contempt" for its employes here and elsewhere. He called on consumers to support the union's "Don't Buy Sears" campaign until the company changes its attitude.

Conviction of James Upset By High Court

The Supreme Court has ruled that Eugene C. (Jimmie) James, former secretary-treasurer of the expelled Laundry Workers, must pay federal income taxes on $738,000 embezzled from the union's health and welfare fund.

The court thus struck down a 15-year-old ruling which had cast doubt on the taxability of money obtained unlawfully. In handing down the decision, Chief Justice Earl Warren said that the 1946 ruling had been "thoroughly devitalized" by subsequent rulings.

At the same time, however, the court reversed James' conviction and three-year prison sentence for "willfully" failing to pay taxes on the money. The court held that the former union official may have relied on the 1946 decision as his basis for failing to report the embezzled funds on his income tax return.

James and Louis B. Saperstein, a Newark, N. J., insurance broker, have pleaded guilty in New Jersey courts to charges of conspiracy.

The LWIU was expelled from the AFL-CIO on charges of being under corrupt domination, and the federation subsequently chartered the AFL-CIO Laundry & Dry Cleaning Intl. Union to replace it.

Anti-Recession Mail to Congress Urged

Kennedy's School Measure Assured of Senate Passage

Labor Asks Letters to Congress

A broad-ranging "grass roots" letter-writing campaign to win congressional approval of labor's four-point program to stimulate employment has been called for by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

In letters to the presidents of all affiliated national and international unions, Meany declared it is up to trade union members "to arouse Congress to the necessity for action."

Accompanying the letters was an economic analysis prepared by the AFL-CIO indicating that "even if the Administration's entire program is adopted, the most optimistic view of this year's prospects shows a 'depressed area' jobless-rating for the entire nation."

This would mean that at the end of 1961 the overall national unemployment average would be at, or above, 6 percent of the work force.

To counter this "grim prospect," the AFL-CIO president declared, labor has proposed four additional legislative and administrative steps, including:

- A temporary three-month individual income tax cut which would add $5 billion to family spending power. "This," the federation said, "would be the quickest, most decisive means of spurring sales, production and job opportunities."
- A $1 billion program of fed-

Meany Condemns Attacks in Alabama

The AFL-CIO has commended the Dept. of Justice for moving "vigorously to restore Americanism in Alabama," and urged it to continue its efforts until law and order are "permanently assured."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed the federation's "outrage" at the events in Montgomery, Ala., declaring that "every true American, no matter what his race or where he lives" should be deeply concerned.

"These brutal attacks are illegal and immoral in full and equal measure," he said. "They are a disgrace to the nation and must be stopped."

At Pennsylvania Convention:

'Business as Usual' Assailed by Meany

By Gene Zack

Philadelphia—Both management and labor in America are guilty of pursuing a "business-as-usual" philosophy in the face of Communist efforts to "destroy our way of life," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has declared here.

Warning that the United States is locked in an all-out struggle in which the choice lies "between freedom and slavery," Meany declared that "it's time all Americans woke up" to the dangers this nation faces.

In an address to 1,500 delegates attending the second annual convention of the Pennsylvania State AFL-CIO, Meany leveled this series of charges:

- Management is "still as greedy for profits as ever" and is "trying to deny workers their right to bargain." Although economic collapse in this country would mean a Communist victory, he continued, management has refused to help solve the unemployment problem and has continued to insist on "a free flow of investment capital."
- The National Association of Manufacturers "is determined to keep its record of the past 60 years intact" by continuing to oppose every piece of progressive legislation advanced in Congress. "In time of great stress and danger," Meany said, "the NAM is still doing business at the same old stand."
- In the South, segregationists are practicing "racial and religious

Bill Faces Sharp Challenge in House

The Senate cleared its decks for final passage of Pres. John F. Kennedy's $2.5 billion federal aid-to-public-education bill after turning back major threats to the bill in the form of racial, religious and procedural amendments.

After nearly two weeks of debate, the Senate was ready to approve by a substantial margin the labor-backed school measure—sponsored by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.)—as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The measure would provide grants over a three-year period for public school construction or teachers' salaries, or both. It faces its severest test in the House, where a substantially similar measure sponsored by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N. J.) has been approved by the House Education Committee.

AFL-CIO asks "teeth" in welfare, pension disclosure law; see story, Page 12.

The Morse bill provides $800 million a year in federal grants which states and local school districts may divide, at their discretion, between classroom construction or raising teachers' salaries.

Funds will be allocated to each state on the basis of the total of school-age children—both those in public and in private schools—although the grants are limited to public school assistance. Coupled with the per pupil grant will be a complex equalization formula based on each state's per capita income, so that poorer states will receive relatively more funds.

Thus grants will range from a low of $9.26 per pupil in Connecticut to a high of $27.77 in Mississippi, South Carolina and Arkan-

Tractor Gifts Urged By Meany

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has called on all affiliated unions and members to "contribute generously" for the purchase of tractors "with which to buy the freedom of the more than 1,200 imprisoned Cuban rebels."

The American labor movement, said Meany, "must and will respond" to Pres. Kennedy's appeal for contributions.

"Free men who truly believe in humanitarianism must be ready to prove to these prisoners of war and to the rest of the world the high value we place on human life," he said.

The federation president emphasized, however, his "fundamental distrust of the Cuban dictator," declaring that "I know of nothing in his record that leads me to believe that he will redeem his part of this bargain and liberate those whose only crime was to fight for freedom in their own land . . . I pray that the Cuban dictator will not renege on his promise."

Meany's statement came shortly after Kennedy issued a White House

Lavish Expense Account Living Called 'Open Scandal' by AFL-CIO

Lavish expense-account living has become "an open scandal" in U.S. business circles, the AFL-CIO has declared in supporting Pres. John F. Kennedy's proposals for imposing more rigid control over tax-deductible spending.

Testifying before the House Ways & Means Committee, Research Dir. Stanley H. Ruttenberg lashed out at "expensive gifts, lavish entertainment, elaborate vacations, and hunting and fishing trips and country club dues," all of which, he said, "'have been charged in whole or in part to Uncle Sam."

Expense account spending, he said, has been conservatively estimated at $5 billion a year, "much of it with no legitimate business purpose." To halt this "serious abuse," Ruttenberg told the committee, legislative action is needed to "separate the reasonable and legitimate expenses from the purely personal."

The Administration proposals would disallow all expenses for entertainment, with certain specific exemptions; disallow the cost of yachts, hunting lodges or club dues; set a ceiling of $10 per recipient on the cost of business gifts; and place a limit on meals and lodging when traveling which would be double the per diem rate authorized for federal employes.

Ruttenberg made it plain that organized labor wants the rules to apply to all kinds of businesses and organizations and declared that "specifically we welcome their application" to unions.

"While we believe that there are relatively few instances of abuse in the use of union expense accounts," the AFL-CIO spokesman said, "we firmly support the application of new standards to all unions.

"We seek standards that would apply equally to all organizations and individuals. We do not feel that U.S. taxpayers should pay for personal benefits regardless of the organization through which their benefits are obtained."

Chamber Disagrees

A spokesman for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, taking an opposite view, protested that Administration proposals to halt all entertainment deductions and to limit travel deductions were "unfair."

Wallace M. Jensen, a New York certified public accountant and a member of the CofC's Taxation Committee, told the Ways & Means Committee that travel and entertainment represent "a necessary cost of operating most businesses," and thus should continue to be deductible.

"The great majority of taxpayers who make every effort to control their expenses and to limit their income tax deductions to those which are allowable should not be penalized," the chamber spokesman declared.

The Hotel & Restaurant Employes have urged the committee to reject Administration proposals to place a $25-to-$30-a-day ceiling on expense account travel, declaring it would threaten the jobs and incomes of "hundreds of thousands" of workers in the industry.

The union termed the proposal "totally unrealistic," adding that businessmen "will have no choice but to devise schemes for evasion."

"We cannot believe that the Congress or the Administration wants to invite the corporate taxpayer to become a scofflaw, or anybody else, for that matter," it said.

The union declared it was a "curious irony" for Congress to consider a plan that would affect jobs in the hotel and restaurant industry after it "utterly ignored" the needs of these same workers in passing the recent minimum wage bill, which did not extend coverage to hotel workers.

Ruttenberg conceded that application of the proposed new provisions might have "some slight unfavorable effects on employment" in such areas of the entertainment industry as hotels, theaters and night clubs.

Moral Issue Paramount

Despite this, he said, "we think that employment in the entertainment industry should be based on something far more substantial than questionable expense account allowances." He added:

"The moral and ethical issues involved in this legislation should be paramount. While we believe in a healthy and growing entertainment industry, we do not think that this industry should be allowed to prosper at the expense of U.S. taxpayers."

Ruttenberg said voluminous testimony presented by Treasury Sec. Douglas Dillon listing a long string of cases of deductions claimed for "business expenses" —which were allowed because the tax courts have interpreted present laws "very leniently"— emphasize the need for legislation.

" 'Put it on the expense account' has become the answer to easy living for far too many people," the federation spokesman said.

He added that "whenever one group of businessmen or firms takes advantage" of lenient interpretation of the law, "it becomes easy for others to fall into the same habit with the excuse that 'everyone's doing it.' "

Democrat Winner In Indiana Recount

A House Elections subcommittee has declared Democrat J. Edward Roush winner of the contested race for Indiana's 5th Dist. House seat.

The subcommittee verdict, that the former Democratic congressman won re-election by a 99-vote margin, is subject to approval by the parent House Administration Committee and the full House.

In January the House refused to seat either Roush or Republican George O. Chambers—who originally had been certified winner of the Nov. 8, 1960 election by a 12-vote margin out of more than 214,000 cast—pending an investigation and recount.

If the House sustains the subcommittee's decision, the Democrats will control 263 seats in that chamber to 174 for the Republicans.

Worth Nearly $3 Billion:

Supreme Court Orders du Pont To Sell 63 Million Shares of GM

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that the only way the giant du Pont Co. can comply with a four-year-old ruling that it violated the anti-trust laws by holding 63 million shares of General Motors stock is completely to surrender ownership of the shares.

The court specifically rejected as an ineffective remedy a plan approved by a federal district court to allow the members of the Du Pont family to transfer to non-family company stockholders voting rights in the GM stock while retaining ownership of the shares, valued at nearly $3 billion.

The 4-to-3 ruling stems from the court's 1957 decision holding that du Pont's ownership of the GM shares constituted a violation of the Clayton Act, which prohibits stock acquisition whose effect may be to lessen competition or to "tend to create a monopoly."

The 1957 decision was based on a finding that du Pont had achieved a favored position in the sale of auto finishes and fabrics to GM because of its stock ownership. The du Pont purchase of GM stock started in 1918, about seven years after the company had been found guilty in another anti-trust suit involving a monopoly in the manufacture of explosives.

Tax Relief Asked

The decision was greeted with a statement by du Pont Pres. Crawford H. Greenewalt that tax relief legislation was needed to protect "innocent stockholders from serious and irreparable injury." On the heels of the district court's decision to allow the "pass-through" stock-voting plan—which the government now has successfully appealed—the Internal Revenue Service ruled that GM shares passed out as dividends to du Pont stockholders would be taxed as ordinary income at the fair market value of the shares.

Bills were introduced in Congress to allow recipients of GM shares to have the bulk of the income taxed at capital gains rates at great savings. House Ways & Means and the Senate Finance committees approved such measures but the bills failed on final passage.

The majority decision directing du Pont to divest itself of the GM shares was written by Justice Brennan and supported by Chief Justice Warren and Justices Black and Douglas. Opposed were Justices Frankfurter, Whittaker and Stewart. Justices Clark and Harlan did not participate. The 1957 4-2 decision finding du Pont in violation of the anti-trust laws found the same four justices in the majority.

The job of working out a plan for divesting the GM shares was left to the district court in Chicago that previously had approved the "pass-through" plan. Du Pont must present a divestiture plan in 60 days. The divestiture must be completed within 10 years. The latest Supreme Court ruling came 12 years after the government first brought suit to sever stock ties between the two companies.

Injection of Race Bias Charged to Union Foes

A southern attorney has told the Pucinski House Labor subcommittee that anti-union employers, including "highly-respectable firms," have deliberately provoked race hatred to defeat union organizing campaigns.

James E. Youngdahl, Little Rock, Ark., attorney, cited employers in his state who told workers they would "lose their jobs to Negroes" and would be forced into "social mixing" if a union won bargaining rights.

Testifying on behalf of the Workers Defense League, Youngdahl said the National Labor Relations Board "has the power to outlaw this kind of dirty labor relations weapon and, in the light of the difficulties faced by the South today, it is not a minute too soon."

He warned that the "scars" left on the community through appeals to racial antagonism are not likely to "disappear the day after the union election."

Calling on the board to outlaw "all racist appeals," Youngdahl said this is a step the NLRB can do at once "without using tear gas or calling federal marshals."

The subcommittee, headed by Rep. Roman Pucinski (D-Ill.), heard strong union criticism of the so-called "free speech" provision of Taft-Hartley and its interpretation during the Eisenhower Administration.

Joseph E. Finley, general counsel of the Office Employes, called for amendment of the National Labor Relations Act to provide a "rule of absolute equality" between employers and unions during organizing campaigns.

Under such a rule, Finley said, "an employer would not be forbidden to march his employes to the enlightenment pit of a captive audience meeting, but if he chose to do this, the union would be allowed equal time."

"If the employer chose to mail out literature to all his employes, the union ought to have the same opportunity, provided it pays for the expense of mailing," he added.

Plato E. Papps, general counsel for the Machinists, rapped deliberate delaying tactics by some employers and their attorneys and called for clearer policy guidance by Congress in the area of labor-management relations.

He criticized NLRB interpretations "based on a political philosophy" and asked for "an overall substantive revision of the National Labor Relations Act" and establishment of "ground rules" which would rule out "interpretations contrary to congressional intent and the basic national labor policy."

A former NLRB assistant general counsel, Mozart G. Ratner, said a majority of Eisenhower appointees to the labor board considered their appointments "a license to write personal economic and political predelictions into law".

He added:

"It was the unjudicial approach of the Eisenhower appointees to the nature of their role and function, coupled with their anti-union and pro-employer views, which, I believe, accounts for most of the evils in administration of the National Labor Relations Act which have been recounted by the witnesses who have appeared before this committee."

Kennedy Sends NLRB Revision to Congress

The National Labor Relations Board will get authority to delegate to trial examiners the power of decision in unfair labor practice cases, subject to review by the five-member board, under a proposed reorganization plan sent to Congress by Pres. Kennedy.

The board also would get authority to delegate to member panels or to panels of staff attorneys decisions in cases of jurisdictional disputes involving two or more unions. These decisions also would be subject to appeal.

The effect of the reorganization, if it goes through Congress, would be to speed up NLRB processes, reduce the time that elapses between the filing of a complaint and a final decision, and enable the board to reduce its backlog.

The reorganization will go into effect 60 days after its submission to Congress unless one of the houses of Congress affirmatively disapproves it.

The jurisdiction disputes authority was proposed to enable the board to carry out, through panels, a decision in a Columbia Broadcasting Co. case in which the Supreme Court said the board has a duty to decide which of two disputing unions is entitled to do work that both claim and "then specifically to award such tasks" to one or the other union.

The labor board would be established, under the reorganization order, as an appellate body, with authority to delegate "any of its [statutory] functions" to board panels, employe panels or trial examiners.

The proposal would require review of any decision by the full board if a majority, less one, of the full membership votes in favor of it.

The President's reorganization plan did not include an increase in the chairman's administrative authority, as was previously asked by Kennedy in proposed reorganizations of several other agencies.

'Postgraduate' USWA Class Hears Pollak

Champaign, Ill.—Harry H. Pollak of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs discussed relations between the American and foreign labor movements at a "post graduate" conference at the University of Illinois here for Steelworkers who have completed the fourth year of summer school institutes.

Sponsors of the conference were USWA District 31, in the Chicago-Gary, Ind., area, and District 34, from the St. Louis-East St. Louis, Ill., area. It was devoted to understanding differences in economic, political and labor movement systems and was conducted by the University of Illinois' Institute of Labor & Industrial Relations and Div. of University Extension.

Packing Unions Stress Job Security

'New Solutions' Goal In UPWA Contracts

Chicago—New approaches in contract negotiations with the meat industry were approved by the Packinghouse Workers at a two-day wage and contract conference here.

More than 200 delegates adopted recommendations of the UPWA executive board stressing particularly the need for "new solutions" to problems of plant closings and automation. Major union contracts expire early in September.

UPWA Pres. Ralph Helstein reminded the delegates that all elements of the contract proposals might not be achieved in this summer's negotiations, but declared a start must be made to find jobs for those currently idle, and to preserve jobs for those now working.

The proposals to be made by the union include:

- A guaranteed income for employes during the life of the new contract.
- No plant closings during the same period.
- Company-wide seniority in multi-plant operations to protect the jobs of workers with high seniority.
- A shorter work period, through either a briefer workweek or "industrial sabbaticals" of 13 weeks, with pay, after each five years of employment.
- Substantial wage increases.

Helstein pointed out that tens of thousands of jobs in the industry have vanished during the past four years. There has been a corresponding rise in the amount of meat handled per worker from 63 pounds an hour five years ago to 73.5 pounds today, he said.

Plans for re-training workers, established in 1959 bargaining with Armour & Co., Helstein said, are "useful" but "they offer no solutions in the kind of unemployment we are now faced with."

Reporting on a study made after three meat plants closed, Helstein said that of 2,411 workers who lost their jobs, 44.5 percent found new work paying little more than half their old rates; another 44.7 percent are still jobless, some of them 18 months later; and 7.2 percent have withdrawn from the labor force.

The union's formal statement expressed hope for a "cooperative" relationship between UPWA and the Meat Cutters in forthcoming negotiations, including "close consultation, joint planning and wherever possible, joint negotiations."

The union said its proposal for a guarantee of income for all employes for the life of the contract is not what is generally understood as a "guaranteed annual wage." Rather, the union is ready to recognize "normal" layoffs for seasonal or other limited periods, it said.

Over the longer period, however, the UPWA agreed to urge that if no jobs are available, the employer as part of the cost of doing business would accept the obligation "for a fixed term to make his decisions as to the job elimination in a form, manner and timing which assured that alternative employment is available."

The delegates agreed also to propose expansion of seniority rights to cover all plants owned by the same company instead of the current restrictions on seniority to a plant or department. A displaced worker moving to a new plant would have seniority rights only as against persons hired after a future date to be set in the contract.

The shorter workweek was called "essential . . . at this time." The industrial sabbaticals approved were advanced not as longer vacations but as opportunities for learning new skills or for catching up on schooling.

Six Unionists Named To Automation Unit

Six experts from labor unions are serving by appointment of Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg on a new 24-man advisory committee on automation and manpower, which held its first meeting May 24. The committee works with the Office of Automation and Manpower, headed by Dr. Seymour Wolfbein.

Goldberg named six members each from the fields of management, government, the public and labor.

The labor members are Solomon Barkin, Textile Workers Union of America; Otis Brubaker, Steelworkers; Sylvia Gottlieb, Communications Workers; Stanley Ruttenberg, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research; James Stern, administrative assistant to Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock, Auto Workers; Michael Widman, assistant to Pres. Thomas Kennedy, Mine Workers, unaffiliated.

Fingerprinting Repeal Sought In N. Y. Cafes

New York—David Siegal, president of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes Joint Executive Board here has called on the City Council to eliminate fingerprinting and licensing of cabaret workers.

A bill now before the council proposes to transfer the licensing of all workers in night clubs from the Police Dept. to the License Dept. At a hearing Siegal stated:

"We question whether the licensing of cabaret workers serves any useful purpose except to embarrass and harass workers whose skills and occupations are not related to any possible offense they may or may not have committed."

He said that for whatever reasons cabaret licensing was established many years ago, it did not appear to have any rationale today. To single out the cabaret industry and subject its workers to requirements not related to their capacity to fulfill a job, whether it be a service or an entertainer's job, is discriminatory he charged.

The Joint Executive Board represents 70,000 waiters, waitresses, cooks, kitchen workers, bartenders and captains, many of whom are affected by this law.

Meat Cutters to Seek 'Stable Employment'

Chicago—Job security will be the "priority goal" of the Meat Cutters in forthcoming contract negotiations.

Delegates to the union's national conference here were told that growing unemployment in the meat packing industry threatens to spread into the retail food field through a combination of overexpansion and technological changes which have sharply raised individual productivity.

Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman told the 600 delegates that the union's demands in meat packing negotiations will include "a shorter workweek" and other measures to provide "stable employment," coupled with greater benefits for persons thrown out of work because of automation or plant shutdowns.

Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd praised the Kennedy Administration for its concern about the nation's problems but expressed disappointment at the "caution and hesitation" it has shown in meeting these problems.

Lloyd said the Administration's program to reduce unemployment "goes at bits and pieces, but does not aim at the major steps needed to create more consumer purchasing power which will really solve the unemployment problems."

Lloyd called for a temporary tax cut to "start a new wave of consumer buying," public works projects, retraining programs and improved unemployment compensation benefits.

"Our economy is still very, very sick," he declared.

Gorman warned that the number of jobs in the meat packing industry may drop 7,000 a year in each of the next five years—on top of the decline of tens of thousands during the past five years.

Calling for joint labor-management action to protect jobs and ease the impact of displacement, he warned that "if industry will not demonstrate that it has the heart to help these men and women who have worked for it so long . . . the government will have to step in."

Earlier, delegates to the union's Poultry Conference, one of a series of special meetings held in connection with the general session, approved a major organizing drive in the poultry and seafood industry.

A report of the conference declared the drive was necessary "not only to improve the conditions of unorganized poultry workers, but also to maintain the conditions we have won for poultry and seafood employes already in our union."

The report said "runaway plants" in the South, paying $1-an-hour wages, were a factor in keeping down wage rates throughout the industry.

In addition to direct organizing techniques, the union plans also to use "consumer information campaigns to inform the buying public which plants pay fair wages and which exploit their workers."

appeal to all Americans to contribute toward the purchase of 500 tractors demanded by Cuban Premier Fidel Castro in exchange for prisoners captured in the unsuccessful April landings.

The White House acknowledged that the President had taken the initiative in encouraging the establishment of a citizens' committee to raise funds for the tractors, but stressed that the U.S. "has not been and cannot be a party to these negotiations." The White House has indicated Kennedy will make a personal contribution.

Conducting the fund-raising campaign are Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, honorary chairman; Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, president of Johns Hopkins University and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Walter P. Reuther, co-chairman.

Kennedy replied to congressional protest against the plan by declaring that it violated no federal statutes and that contributions qualify as tax exempt under the application of tax laws to charitable organizations engaged in the rehabilitation and assistance of needy refugees.

The citizens' committee is trying to raise about $15 million to cover the cost of the tractors, with estimates differing because of some confusion as to what type of tractors Castro is demanding.

Contributions should be made payable to Tractors for Freedom, P. O. Box Freedom, Detroit, Mich.

Label Helps Hat Union In Texas Breakthrough

Longview, Tex.—A breakthrough in unionization of a major hat firm deep in the heart of "right-to-work" Texas has been achieved here—with much of the credit for the victory going to the Hatters' union label.

The agreement with Byer-Rolnick Hat Corp., the nation's fourth largest producer of men's felt and straw hats, provides for virtually full unionization of the company's plants here and in Garland—within the terms permitted by the Texas compulsory open-shop law.

Hatters Pres. Alex Rose explained in New York that, as a result of the union's extensive campaign urging the public to buy union-made products, Byer-Rolnick requested the union label for its products.

The agreement provides that the label will become available to the company only when 97 percent of the work force belongs to the union. At present, Rose indicated, about three-quarters of the 650 employes are Hatters' members.

The three-year agreement also calls for across-the-board wage increases totaling 20 cents an hour—7.5 cents immediately, a similar raise next year, and 5 cents in the final year of the contract.

It also provides that the minimum wage for beginners will be 10 cents an hour above the federal legal minimum. This means an immediate starting rate of $1.10; a rise to $1.25 on Labor Day, when the newly enacted Fair Labor Standards Act amendments go into effect; and a further rise to $1.35 in two years.

The contract also calls for establishment of pension and welfare funds, the details of which will be worked out in further negotiations over the next six months.

Housing Project Title Taken by Foundation

Brooklyn — After nearly four years of delay, the United Housing Foundation has taken title for the Amalgamated-Warbasse Homes, a 2,500-unit cooperative housing development to be built on a 30-acre site acquired from the city through condemnation.

Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, of the Clothing Workers, which is the principal sponsor of the project, and a member of the United Housing Foundation, charged the delay was due to opposition from real estate interests. Some 2,500 applicants have been waiting for the development, he added. Equity payments will be about $650 a room and carrying charges about $23 per room per month.

Meany Welcomes Unionists-in-Exile:

AFL-CIO Rededicates Itself To Continuing Fight on Franco

The AFL-CIO has rededicated itself to the continuing struggle against the Franco dictatorship in Spain, warmly welcoming a delegation of Spanish trade unionists in exile and calling for the isolation of Franco in free world councils and international organizations.

A statement by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany assailing the Franco dictatorship climaxed a week-long visit to Washington by Pascual Tomas, representing the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and Ramon Agesta, representing the Intl. Federation of Christian Trade Unions.

Tomas and Agesta said their visit was designed to inform the American public of current conditions in Spain and of the plans of free trade unions to bring about a democratic regime by peaceful means.

They told a press conference in the AFL-CIO building that the withholding of U.S. economic and political aid to Franco Spain will help bring about a peaceful change. They warned that unless U.S. policy is changed, "political gangrene" will infect Spain, and that while communism is not a danger in the Mediterranean country today it can become so if the present situation continues. A growing desperation among the Spanish people, they declared, can aid only the Communists.

Meany said that although freedom has been long absent from Spain, "there are now growing indications of a profound stirring and unrest among the people . . . Unrest intensified by the worsening economic condition has been countered unmercifully by the police, but it continues to grow. An explosion of massive proportions may not be far off."

Noting the joining of forces by the ICFTU and the IFCTU in the fight against the dictatorship, and the AFL-CIO's "long-standing policy of opposition" to Franco, he urged:

- Governments of democratic countries to "disdain association with the Franco government" in the councils of free men in view of the "totalitarian and police character of the regime."
- Continued opposition to the seating of so-called workers' delegates of Spain in international organizations.
- The U.S. government to "obtain assurances that any bilateral assistance programs in existence with Spain should be used to relieve the economic plight of the masses of the Spanish people."

Meany pledged the "continued and unceasing efforts" of the AFL-CIO to restore liberty and freedom to the Spanish people.

Thomas and Agesta expressed hope that the Kennedy Administration would support the anti-Franco forces in exile. They stressed that democratic sentiment inside Spain is on the rise and that if the free world supports the democratic forces, a peaceful transition would be possible.

During their visit they met with AFL-CIO leaders, ranking senators who sit on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Administration leaders. They told their story also to a number of Catholic leaders in the U.S.

Tomas was general secretary of the Metal Workers Union and a minister in the Spanish Republican government. Since 1944 he has been general secretary of the Union General de Trabajadores in exile in Toulouse, France. Agesta was head of the Basque Solidaridad de Trabajadores Vascos and has represented the organization in Paris since 1950.

In December 1960 the two world union federations joined forces in the fight against Franco and pledged to "intensify their efforts in the United Nations and the various international agencies, in particular the ILO, to ensure that the Spanish workers are enabled at the earliest possible moment to give free expression to their wishes and to choose their genuine representatives."

MEBA Parley Votes 'No Contract, No Work'

Los Angeles—Delegates to the 84th convention of the Marine Engineers voted to follow the union's "traditional policy of 'no contract, no work' " unless agreements are reached with the shipping industry by June 15.

MEBA leaders and officials of two other maritime unions said they were confident that peaceful settlements will be reached.

Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers and Capt. Charles M. Crooks, president of the Masters, Mates & Pilots, said both unions will follow the "no contract, no work" policy, but Hall, Crooks and MEBA Pres. E. N. Altman united in expressing confidence that a strike will not be necessary.

Hall said "responsibility" will be the keynote of negotiations, and told the delegates:

"We have the strength to take what we want or shut down the industry. But we are not going to kill the 'golden goose.' The industry is in a dangerously declining position. We don't have to prove we're tough any longer.

They (the employers) know that by now.

"Keep in mind that we estimate for every 1 percent pay raise in the maritime industry, we lose 1 percent of our jobs."

This doesn't mean, he said, that "we can't get wage adjustments and better conditions when they are due, but we must use logic and common sense in our talks with the shipowners."

Hall blamed maritime management for the industry's present poor position, saying "no other group of employers has better demonstrated an inability to properly run an industry."

Altman and Crooks told the delegates progress is being made toward a merger of the MMP and MEBA, with the unions consolidating locals so they will have similar basic structures by next year.

Peter DeVries, head of the Intl. Transportworkers Federation, flew here from his London headquarters to meet with officials of SIU, MEBA, MMP and Longshoremen.

ILA leaders, unable to attend the session, authorized Altman to act in their behalf in the discussions with DeVries on reaffiliating the four U.S. maritime unions with the ITF.

The MEBA, MMP and ILA withdrew from the federation after it suspended the SIU in a dispute with British seafarers' unions.

DeVries said he is "certain the issues in dispute can be solved, and our previous relationships restored."

AFGE Asks U.S. For Floor Wage

In a follow-up to enactment of the new minimium wage law, the Government Employes have urged Pres. Kennedy to require all federal agencies to pay employes at least the statutory minimum, even though the government is exempt from the act's coverage.

AFGE Pres. James A. Campbell pointed out that until recently there were federal agencies which paid groups of blue-collar workers less than $1 an hour. He urged the President to set a government-wide policy establishing a $1.15 minimum wage to match the scheduled increase in the Fair Labor Standards Act in September.

Meany Urges Letters To Spur Job Program

eral grants-in-aid to step up necessary short-range state and local public works, in addition to Pres. John F. Kennedy's current proposals for additional necessary public spending in such areas as education, housing, slum clearance, hospitals and the like.

- Implementation by the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury Dept. of Kennedy's monetary policies to insure that long-term interest rates are lowered to spur necessary borrowing, while maintaining stable short-term interest rates.
- Improvements of the Administration's housing program by "stronger efforts to bring down mortgage rates and additional appropriations and authorizations for the housing America so desperately needs."

Without such action, Meany wrote the union presidents, "not only will high unemployment continue, but the nation will face another recession within the next few years—a recession that will start with high joblessness and idle productive capacity."

In addition to following labor's four-point recovery program, his letter continued, the Administration should "adjust" its federal taxing and spending policies to reasonable full employment requirements to avert a "disastrous, long-run unemployment problem."

Meany told the union leaders:

"It is up to us to arouse Congress to the necessity for action. The best weapon is letters to the senators and congressmen from their constituents.

"Once again, we urge you to push a drive for mail from back home. It is a necessity and it can be effective. We must do it if we are going to get America back to work."

Castro Not Fooling Union Chiefs In Latin America, Beirne Says

Most Latin American labor leaders recognize the Cuban dictatorship of Fidel Castro for what it is, according to Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers.

Castro's claim that he has made Cuba a "socialist" state, the CWA president said, produced a shift in their thinking "you can almost feel."

"That is a recognized term," he added. "That is his public declaration that Cuba is a satellite of Moscow."

Some Latin union officials are hesitant to speak out, he said, and in some countries there is uncertainty, but many "are speaking out on the platform . . . against the regime." The recent inter-American conference of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Intl. in Bogota, Colombia, which he attended, adopted a resolution condemning Castro "for the murders he is commiting," Beirne added.

Beirne, a member of the AFL-CIO Inter-American Affairs Committee, was heard on Labor News Conference, public affairs radio program aired over the Mutual Broadcasting System each Sunday at 4:35 p.m.

He was questioned by two newspaper experts on Latin America—Stanford Bradshaw of the Associated Press and Arnoldo Otero of United Press-International.

Some people not in the top leadership of the labor movement, Beirne declared, have been swayed by Castro's claim that he is fighting for a "labor paradise" in Latin America or that he is going to offer them more in the long run than the present system.

"When you get lower than the top leadership and go down into the provinces and the villages," he said, "there you will find great sympathy for what Castro did in respect to land reform in Cuba.

"It is one of the big things needed throughout all South America. Hence there is that feeling in support of Castro's early revolutionary stand in land reform that still has the sympathetic tug among unionists on the local level.

"Top leadership, however, recognizes the phoniness even of his land reform, for in that reform he gave to small families pieces of land he said were to be their own. The fact is that the papers signed by those illiterate farmers turn the land over to the state and cause the farmer to be working—in effect—for the state. It was a subterfuge of the Communist variety which the farmer of Cuba is not familiar with yet. But I have observed that the top leadership in South America is familiar with this maneuver."

Beirne said that among the things the U.S. labor movement can do for labor movements in Latin America is to provide trade union education. He discussed a program initiated by the AFL-CIO and developed by the University of Chicago under which Latin American union leaders will be given three months training in this country followed by nine additional months at home, and then will teach "their fellow citizens in their own countries the essence of democratic trade unionism."

A story on the program in the AFL-CIO News incorrectly said about 300 Latin Americans would be trained in the U.S. each year, but the pilot program agreed upon at this stage actually was for 100 to 150.

AFL-CIO Cites Jobs Gap, Urges Action

Herewith is the text of an AFL-CIO analysis of the nation's general economic situation, and the problems of actual and threatened joblessness it presents, sent by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the presidents of all national and international affiliates, with a letter asking for a widespread "write-to-Congress" campaign:

High unemployment rates continue despite signs of mild economic improvement. Roughly 7.7 million more jobs are needed just to reduce unemployment to a 4 percent rate by the end of this year. Some 8.4 million jobs are required for a more tolerable 3 percent unemployment rate. No prospects for job-creating economic activity of this magnitude are in sight. In fact, based on present trends and planning, the outlook points to a repetition of the economic developments after the last recession: Insufficient recovery, persistent high joblessness and idle capacity, followed by another recession in a relatively short period of time.

For five months joblessness has hovered around the same level—6.8 percent of the labor force reported out of work. Neither the downturn's halt in February nor subsequent production improvements brought any real change. April's reported level of 6.8 percent joblessness really amounts to about an 8 percent rate when the 3 million jobless part-time workers' employment losses are taken into consideration. The April count of long-term unemployed reached a record postwar high despite two months of small but welcome improvements in over-all output.

Expected production upturns for the rest of 1961 do not point to a change in this unemployment pattern. Present trends predict a jobless rate of 6.25 percent - 7 percent in the fourth quarter. Unless the government acts quickly to spur economic activity more decisively, therefore, unemployment early next year will continue to exceed the level now used by the government as its standard for defining distressed areas—over 6 percent of the labor force out of work.

Furthermore, present relationships between federal revenues and both federal and business spending are expected to produce unbalances in the economy that will curb economic recovery long before anything like reasonably full employment is reached. This would repeat the pattern in 1958-1959 if basic economic policies continue with only slight changes.

The outlook, therefore, is the unpleasant prospect of a very slow decrease in high unemployment rates and restrictive federal fiscal policies before full recovery is achieved. Without action to change such trends, another recession, arriving almost as quickly as the last one, would start at high levels of persistent unemployment and idle productive capacity.

GNP Seen Rising

An optimistic interpretation of current trends (assuming the adoption of the President's requested program), indicates that total national production will increase about 4 percent by the end of this year. The annual rate could rise to $528 billion-$530 billion in the fourth quarter of this year from a yearly rate of $503.5 billion in the fourth quarter of 1960. These estimates would represent an increase of approximately 4 percent in the real volume of goods and services produced, after accounting for price changes.

The major components of such a rise in national production between the fourth quarter of 1960 and the fourth quarter of 1961 are as follows:

Total government spending for goods and services is expected to rise about $7.5 billion (annual rate), if all of Pres. Kennedy's programs are adopted. Federal expenditures will increase by about $3.5 billion, while state and local government expenditures will rise by approximately $4 billion (including federal grants-in-aid for state and local programs, such as education).

Consumer spending for goods and services will increase by a rate of approximately $12 billion-$15 billion, according to present estimates. This prospect is based on the following: Some pick-up in employment and working hours; improved family buying power from wage and salary increases, the temporary unemployment compensation program and larger old-age and survivors' insurance benefit payments.

Business inventories are expected to be rising at a $2.5 billion yearly rate during the last quarter of this year. At 1960's end, inventory cutbacks were running at a $3 billion rate. This turn-around could add about $5.2 billion to the rate of national output of goods and services, assuming expected improvements in sales and new orders for goods.

Business investment in new equipment, industrial and commercial construction will probably be down by about one-half billion dollars (annual rate). Continued idle productive capacity has caused slow declines in such investments since the spring of 1960. Despite predictions for a business investment pick-up by mid-year, therefore, such spending may be slightly lower at the end of this year than during the fourth quarter of 1960.

Home building outlays may increase by a yearly rate of about $1 billion, if the government's monetary policy eases credit and Pres. Kennedy's program is adopted.

Net exports of goods and services in the final quarter of 1961 will be approximately one-half billion dollars less than in the fourth quarter of last year; based on current estimates, exports should remain strong but imports will probably rise as business activities pick up, leaving a somewhat smaller export surplus.

Even this optimistic view, which is based on the adoption of every item in Pres. Kennedy's anti-recession legislative line-up, means that we would wind up 1961 with exactly the same amount of unemployment with which we started 1961. That is not progress.

A 4 percent rise in the real volume of total national output would be enough to offset some new job needs. But in view of rising productivity and a growing labor force, it would still be too small to reduce unemployment.

Jobless Rate Seen Higher

As stated above, the level of joblessness at the end of 1961 would probably be about 6.25 percent-7 percent of the labor force. This compares with a 6.8 percent April rate, and a 6.4 percent jobless rate during the fourth quarter of last year.

A significant part of the expected 4 percent rise in national production will come from a return to more normal workweeks in numerous industries where part-time work has been widespread in recent months. The usual pattern in an economic pick-up from a recession is for employers to increase the working hours of short-time workers before recalling large numbers of laid-off employes or any substantial new hiring.

As much as half, and perhaps more, of the anticipated increase in total output will probably be based on rising productive efficiency. During a recessionary decline productivity also declines temporarily and then rises sharply as business activities pick up. In the early months of 1961, output per manhour of work apparently declined. But by the fourth quarter of the year, productivity will probably be about 2 percent or more above the final quarter of 1960.

Employment, therefore, will rise much more slowly than production. Only about half—and perhaps less than half—of the expected rise in production will be based on increased employment. A 4 percent rise in real national output between the end of 1960 and the final months of 1961 will probably mean an employment increase in the neighborhood of only 2 percent or approximately 1 million to 1.5 million.

An increase in employment of 1 million to 1.5 million will be a significant improvement. But such improvement will be merely enough to offset the growth of the labor force.

The labor force is expected to be 1.3 million higher in the final quarter of this year over the same period last year—a rise from 70.9 million to 72.2 million.

Fourth Quarter Idle

This 1.3 million expected increase in the labor force, therefore, will approximately offset the expected employment rise of 1 million-1.5 million. The number of unemployed in the fourth quarter of the year will therefore be approximately the same as in the final quarter of 1960.

On this basis, unemployment will move from 4 million or a jobless rate of 6.4 percent in the fourth quarter of 1960 to 4 million-4.3 million or an unemployment rate of approximately 6.25 percent-7 percent in the final quarter of 1961.

Present trends, therefore, indicate rising profits from an increasing volume of sales and production and from increased profit margins based on improved productive efficiency. The trends also show a moderate increase in employment, lagging far behind the rise in sales and output. The unemployment level, therefore, will probably fail to decline very much. By the end of the year, unemployment will remain close to the level of the final quarter of 1960, unless more vigorous action is taken to step up economic activity.

Since these predictions are based on the assumption that the President's entire legislative program will be adopted, it is obvious that more steps must be taken to boost the economy. Only a faster pace of rising sales and production can create enough employment increases to begin to lower unemployment levels by the end of the year. Besides the President's program, therefore, the following actions should be taken without delay to increase job-creating economic activities, boost sales and heighten production levels:

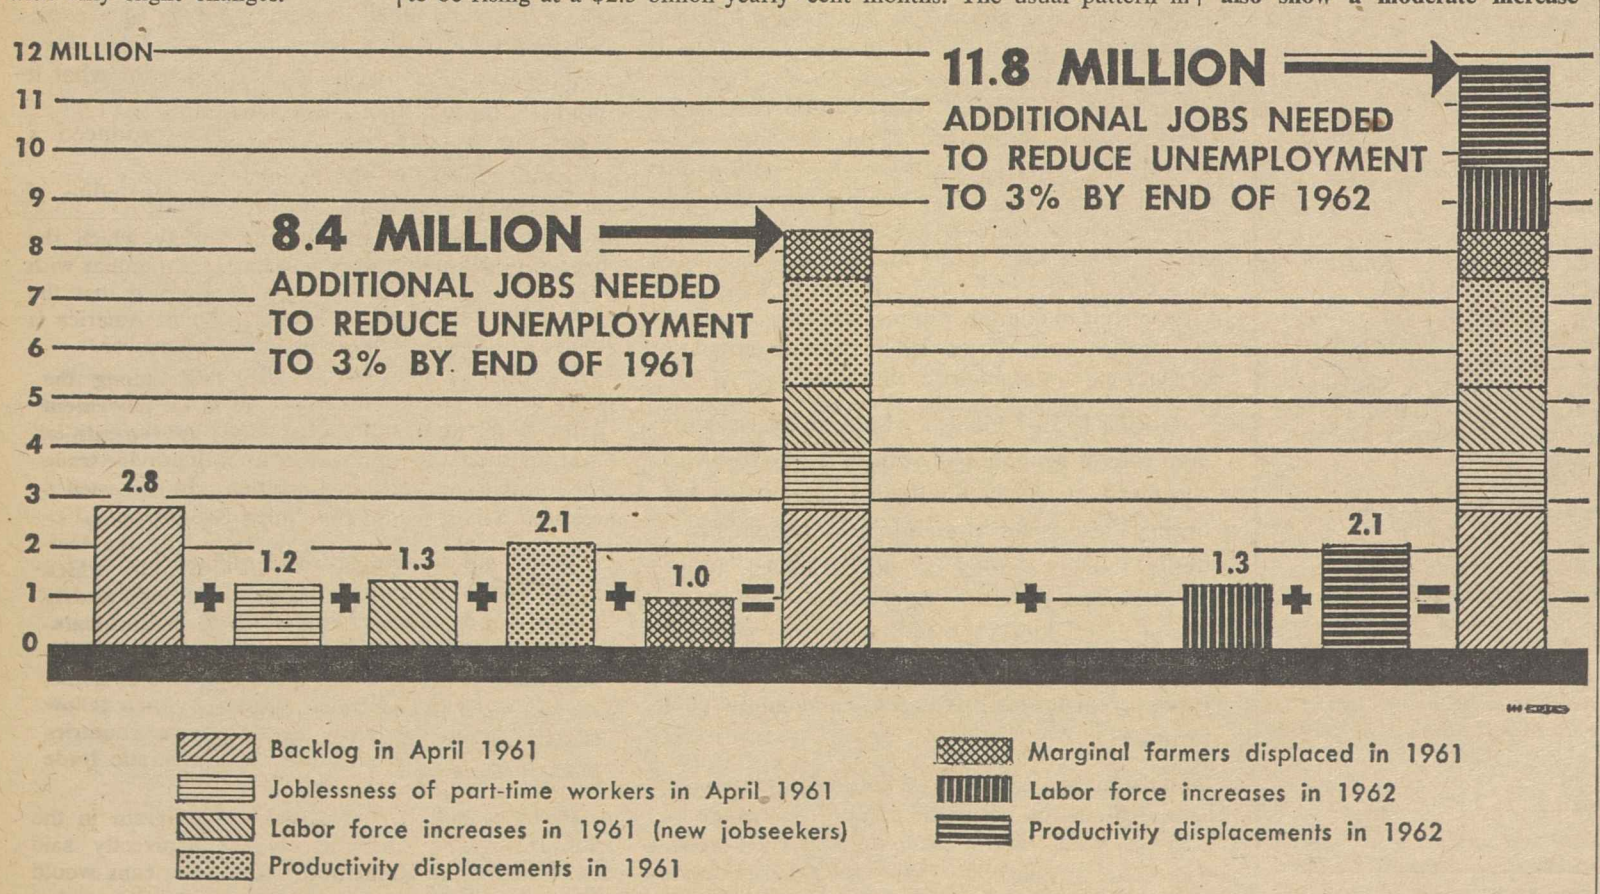
1. A temporary three-month individual income tax cut would add $5 billion to family spending power. This would be the quickest, most decisive means of spurring sales, production and job opportunities.

2. A program of federal grants-in-aid to step up necessary short-range state and local public works should be added to the President's requests for additional necessary public spending.

3. Pres. Kennedy's monetary policy should be carried out effectively by the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury. That is, credit ease should be spurred by lowering long-term interest rates and maintaining stable short-term interest rates.

4. The housing program should be improved by stronger efforts to bring down mortgage rates and additional appropriations and authorizations for the housing America so desperately needs.

These short-run measures should be followed by a comprehensive reform of the federal tax structure and a revision of federal taxing and spending policies. The latter would attempt to produce budget surpluses when the economy is operating at reasonably full employment levels, not during times of high jobless rates.



THIS IS THE SCOPE of the job problem facing the nation. The backlog in April 1961 is the number of unemployed in excess of a 3 percent rate of unemployment. If the 4 percent yardstick is used, this figure would be 2.1 million and the total number of jobs needed at the end of 1961 to reduce unemployment to the 4 percent level would be 7.7 million. Carried through to 1962, the figure would become 11.1 million.

Rail Merger Delay Sought By Harrison

Pres. George M. Harrison of the Railway Clerks has called for a continued campaign for congressional action to suspend until the end of 1962 the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to approve railroad mergers.

In a letter to local officers of the union, Harrison said a letter from ICC Chairman Everett Hutchinson to the Senate Commerce Committee fell short of a "binding commitment" that the agency will not act on major proposals until Congress has an opportunity to study the situation.

Hutchinson said that the ICC at present plans to act on only two merger requests—the Pennsylvania Railroad and Lehigh Valley Railroad, and the Central of Georgia with the Southern Railway—before the close of the second session of Congress in 1962.

Rail unions have called for a full-scale congressional study of the growing trend for merger of profitable railroads, charging that the effect is to reduce service, isolate communities, squeeze out of business marginal or unprofitable railroads and create a serious unemployment problem.

Alabama Centennial

THE CENTENNIAL of the Civil War has swept up millions of Americans in its observance. They include serious historians who mark the war as the major turning point in American history as well as others intrigued by staging mock battles on ground drenched with blood 100 years ago.

On May 30 of this centennial year the nation—less six southern states—will pause to honor the dead on both sides. In the six bitter-end states there is no Memorial Day honoring the dead of both the North and the South. There is a group that carefully nurtures vestiges of bitterness and a brutal callousness to the rights of all men of all colors.

It is this spirit, feeding on fear and ignorance, abetted by demagogues and political leaders who have made a career of racism, that has triggered the almost insane beatings and burnings in Alabama.

As long as this spirit is alive in the land, the centennial dedicated to the healing of the wounds is a hollow mockery.

Sanity Wins in Maine

A HEAVILY FINANCED DRIVE by the National Right-to-Work Committee seeking to disrupt healthy and peaceful management-labor relations in Maine has been dealt an ignominious death by that state's legislature.

A so-called "right-to-work" proposal died in the Maine Senate after the House had voted 98 to 45 against the measure. The defeat was brought about by a bipartisan effort by both Democrats and Republicans in the Maine legislature and with the aid of the Republican administration of Gov. John Reed.

Maine's Commissioner of Labor and Industry, Marion E. Martin, a Republican, told the Joint Senate-House Labor Committee that the "right-to-work" law "is not needed, is not wanted, does not work," and "interferes in the right of contract between the employer and employe."

Maine is to be congratulated on its defense of sane and constructive labor-management relations in turning back the forces that would destroy the collective bargaining processes. The State of Oklahoma, and other states that are still undergoing this assault, might well take a leaf out of the Maine notebook.

Spanish Labor's Fight

SINCE MARCH 1939 when Gen. Francisco Franco's Falangists, aided by Hitler's Nazis and Mussolini's Fascists, finally crushed the democratically-elected government of Spain, the nation has been enslaved by a totalitarian tyranny.

But the free trade unionists of Spain have never stopped fighting. From their exile posts in France and elsewhere they are working with groups inside Spain, building for the day when the democratic forces will restore freedom to the Spanish people by peaceful means.

The fight in Spain is the fight of free labor everywhere. With the uniting of the world's two free labor organizations in an anti-Franco campaign, there is new hope for the emergence of a free and democratic Spain.

Summary of Study:

Recovery Taking Up Job Slack Need of Economy, NEC Claims

(The following is excerpted from the summary chapter of a new 92-page booklet published by the Conference on Economic Progress entitled "Jobs and Growth." Copies of the booklet can be obtained from the CEP at 1001 Connecticut Avenue, N. W., Washington 6, D. C., at 50 cents a copy. Bulk rates are also available.)

THE FRAIL AND INCONCLUSIVE economic upturn in process cannot override the fact that American economy is afflicted with the chronic ailment of low economic growth, made manifest in a consistent "roller-coaster" pattern of successive "booms," "stagnations," and "recessions."

This chronic ailment has worsened in the long run. In the most recent "boom" year, 1959, the true level of unemployment (including full-time unemployment and the full-time equivalent of part-time unemployment) was 5 million or 25 percent higher than the "boom" year 1955. This was a sorely deficient "recovery" from the intervening "recession." And in the "recession" period during first quarter 1961, true unemployment seasonally adjusted was about 6.3 million, or about 25 percent higher than in the "recession" year 1954. Correspondingly, we have suffered a long-range retreat from maximum production, with total output in the first quarter 1961 running about 15 percent below maximum production.

During 1953-1960 as a whole, an average annual rate of economic growth of 2.5 percent, in contrast with the better than 4 percent needed during these years to maintain maximum prosperity, cost us about 18.5 million man-years of unrealized employment opportunity, and a shortfall of more than $260 billion in total national production (in 1959 dollars). These losses hit every sector of our private lives and public performance.

The immediate task now confronting us is not merely to encourage another "upturn," which the "roller-coaster" would probably move toward in any event. Instead, we need to generate a recovery which, unlike any other "recovery" since 1953, takes up fully the existing slack in manpower and plant, absorbs increases in the labor force and productivity, and thus restores maximum employment and production in a reasonably short time. And unlike earlier "recoveries" which established foundations for another "stagnation" and then another "recession," the new recovery should initiate a sustained rate of growth which utilizes to the hilt the great non-secret weapon of our matchless productive powers.

1. The economic program now under active consideration does not set forth explicit short-range and long-range quantitative goals for employment, production, and purchasing power; and the goals which may be inferred from the Administration's statements are far below our maximum potentials.

2. Proposed programs fall short even of compatibility with these excessively low goals, and the Administration's fiscal and monetary programs are too conventional to stake out the new approaches required for new times.

3. Short-range and long-range proposals, although intrinsically inseparable, are not sufficiently integrated in terms of a consistent overall program; thus, the short-range "recovery" proposals lose appeal as an "upturn" commences, and the longer-range "growth" proposals are made to appear postponable or secondary.

4. The numerous executive policies, and the many proposals now before Congress, are not harmonized under any comprehensive balance sheet of our needs and potentials. This tends to divide rather than unite various economic groups, to strengthen the opposition to individual measures, and to militate against the popular understanding which would maximize popular support.

Above all, these detailed insufficiencies in national economic policies arise in large part from absence of an official "model" for balanced economic development. Without such a "model," individual policies, both short-range and longer-range, tend to be improvised, sometimes at cross-purposes, and generally not well-geared to the tasks ahead.

This study urges that, entirely responsive to the Employment Act of 1946, the President include in his Economic Reports an American Economic Performance Budget. Subject to the watchful eye of an informed public, such Performance Budget would carry us more surely and speedily toward fulfillment of "a great purpose" in our economic life.

Morgan Says:

Only Alabamans Themselves Can Solve Alabama's Problem

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

THERE ARE, according to the 1960 census, 3,266,740 people in the sovereign state of Alabama. A little less than a million of them are Negroes, leaving white in the majority almost, but not quite, by two and a half to one. The state has nearly 25,000 teachers and more than 3,700 clergymen and religious workers of various denominations. I mention these population figures and these categories because they are important. They are more important than the number of federal marshals in Alabama, than the additional marshals or other federal officials who might be sent there. The federal government is committed to protect the constitutional rights of citizens in any state, including Alabama, and including the right to move about freely.

Morgan

Law enforcement officers brought in from the outside may be able to quell disturbances and even avert new flashes of violence in the current crisis over bus transportation through the state. But the underlying problem can only be solved in any durable way by Alabamans themselves.

It is inconceivable that the majority of citizens of that state condone lawlessness or violence. There are decent, responsible citizens in Birmingham and Montgomery who deplored the brutal riots on two successive weekends against the passively stubborn efforts of a little band of Negroes and non-Negroes—freedom riders, so-called—to test their rights by riding in interstate buses through the South.

Indeed after [the] savagery in Montgomery, about 100 of the city's leading citizens unanimously passed a resolution which, while it "resented and condemned" what it called the freedom riders' "act of provocation," declared "we can never condone violence" and it called on local, county and state authorities to take all necessary measures to maintain order. And yet their resolution fell like a feather on the angry mob which busied itself with fresh riots.

It is understandable that the Montgomery moderates blamed the freedom riders for "provoking" the incidents. And, as one responsible Montgomery citizen put it privately, "the decent people felt a sense of relief when the U.S. marshals came in—but this was diluted by their feeling, right or wrong, that the federal government had been, you might say, sponsoring the freedom riders." The fact is that the federal government was —and is—sponsoring them in the sense that it recognized their right to test their civil rights which, under the constitution, are supposed to be equal with those of everybody else. Basically that is all desegregation is—equality under the law.

WHAT MANY OF US, not just southerners, either, have not faced up to is the fact that any federal official would be impeachable for a violation of his oath of office if he did not enforce that concept. This dodging the issue with a double standard of justice—one for the white man, one for the black—may have been more prevalent in the South but it cannot stand anywhere in the country any longer except at our collective peril.

This wrench to face reality can be a painful thing but, heartening enough, decent people are beginning to face it. The Montgomery moderates, according to excellent sources, share another though unpublicized resentment—a rising feeling that the freedom riders were not the only "provocateurs," that Alabama political leaders from the governor down did as much or more to provoke this ugly state of affairs by warning all who would listen for months and years that desegregation would never come to Alabama.

This is the rupture of values, these are the double standards we have to deal with. Nobody who has not seceded from his senses can argue that the price in shame we paid for the acts of those sick, sorry minority groups of hoodlums in Birmingham and Montgomery was a price the United States of America could afford.

The tragedy is that apparently not a single elected official in the state of Alabama feels he can say that, though a number of them must know in their hearts it is true. They can discover and articulate the truth if the people of Alabama will help them, if the decent majority will end its silence, if the preachers will preach and the teachers will teach what we are all supposed to know, that demagoguery is not a synonym for democracy.

Washington Reports:

GI Education or Job Training 'Due in Justice', Sponsors Claim

EDUCATION OR ON-THE-JOB training for today's GIs is due in justice to the young men now in service and would also help reduce unemployment, Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) and Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.) declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 460 radio stations.

"Between 440,000 and 450,000 young men are separated from the service every year," Yarborough asserted. "They come out without any technical skills, without adequate education. They are thrown in the labor force unemployed and without qualifications."

Kuchel declared: "I want to see the American government do justice to the fellow who goes into the service for two years or more serving the peace-time military needs of the country. When we give him a ticket back home, I want him to know that a grateful government will give him an opportunity to educate himself."

Yarborough, chairman of the Senate Veteran's Affairs subcommittee, has introduced a bill to provide school education or on-the-job training and farm and home loans. Kuchel is one of the co-sponsors. One-and-a-half-days schooling would be provided for each day of service for GIs who serve between the termination of the Korean War educational program and the end of the draft in 1963.

Yarborough explained that veterans would receive a maximum of 36 months schooling under the bill. "Benefits would be $110 a month for an unmarried full-time student, up to $135 if married, with a maximum of $165 regardless of the number of children in the family," he said. "GIs, under the legislation, may attend college or high school or take vocational or on-the-job-training."

Of the 15.6 million veterans who might have benefited from the old GI bill, Yarborough said, 7.8 million took educational training. These, he said, have so increased their incomes that they pay more than $1 billion in taxes a year above what they would have paid without the training, and before 1970, they will have paid the total cost of that training.

In addition, "they gave us hundreds of thousands of engineers, scientists, school teachers, and 110,000 medical personnel, including doctors, nurses, technicians and dentists," the senator declared.

KUCHEL ASSERTED that the U.S. needs the bill for still another reason.

"Half a dozen years ago, in 1955," he said, "the Soviet Union graduated well over 16,000 chemists while in the U.S. some 8,000 were graduated, half the number. The Soviet Union has educated three times as many mathematicians, physicists and engineers in the same period as we did here in the U.S. We can give peacetime GI's an opportunity and an incentive to continue their education directly in the national interest."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

REP. CLARK MacGREGOR, a first-term Minnesota Republican, has demonstrated that a neophyte in the House can develop a high degree of dexterity in the gentle art of hornswoggling constituents. Considering the district from which he comes—the 3rd District that includes Milwaukee—it seems unlikely that MacGregor will accumulate vast amounts of seniority. Still, he deserves recognition for a fast bid for the record in mealy-mouthed distortion.

MacGregor in a news letter to his constituents reprinted a syndicated newspaper column by Miss Doris Fleeson denouncing the new minimum wage law as falling far short of what was needed.

She complained that the lowest-paid workers had been dropped from the bill in order to appease conservatives. She said that senators "logrolled shamelessly," trading off groups of workers "for a few votes."

To some observers, including this one, this judgment was an extraordinary one to come from an able student of Capitol Hill, wholly familiar with the fact that minimum wage coverage had never previously been expanded at all, but in fact had been cut down by Congress. To some, it seemed far better to get protection of 3.6 million workers than to leave them out because protection for others was thought unobtainable this year.

Everyone is entitled, however, to his own opinion. What MacGregor did with Miss Fleeson's column was to put it in juxtaposition to his own words as if he agreed with her—that he, too, was grieved that the bill did not go further.

"ONCE AGAIN," he wrote, "we find that the public interest had to take a back seat to political expediency." "It was interesting" to find Miss Fleeson's column, he remarked. Minimum wage legislation, he argued, "should strengthen our economy, should protect the poorest paid workers." He himself had voted, he said, for the original House wage bill.

What he did not tell his constituents was that the House Kitchin-Ayres bill he backed would have kept out not only laundry and hotel workers but would also have eliminated most of the retail workers who were given protection under the final bill.

What he did not tell them was that Kitchin-Ayres would have given $1.15 an hour to presently covered workers—not $1.15 in September, rising to $1.25 two years hence, as does the actual bill passed.

What he did not tell them was that the 1.3 million newly added workers would have got only $1 an hour—not even the $1.15.

What he did not tell them was that the Kitchin-Ayres bill, which he wrote he had been "pleased to support and vote for," did not provide any maximum-hour and overtime-pay protection for newly covered workers, whereas the actual bill passed—and signed by Kennedy—does.

REMEMBER THE STORIES, from back in 1948, of people who went to the polls fully intending to vote for Thomas E. Dewey for President, but discovered they simply couldn't do it and voted for Harry Truman instead?

Well, in a recent editors' meeting in Washington a midwestern editor told friends a comparable story. He and his wife, he said, didn't really admire either Vice Pres. Nixon or Sen. Kennedy—but decided the night before they would "vote the newspaper's editorial policy," that is, vote for Nixon. On the way to the polls in the morning, they concluded this was more loyalty to the publisher than was required and that they wouldn't vote for President at all.

On the way back home they exchanged confessions. Each of them, in the privacy of the voting booth, voted for Kennedy.

This correspondent was telling this story to the editor of another pro-Dewey newspaper, a member of his paper's policy-making board, who grinned sheepishly and remarked: "I thought there was some hope for the Republicans when Rockefeller's ideas got into the platform at Chicago—but I learned during the campaign and I voted for Kennedy myself."

How to Buy:

Medicine Under Generic Name Saves Money for Consumers

By Sidney Margolius

PRICES OF DRUGS and medicines have been coming down just a little in each of the last several months. But the still-lofty prices and recent exposes of overcharging by manufacturers have left people hopping mad. One of the most urgent demands among working families is for lower prices of medicines.

You can strike a blow for lower drug costs and save yourself a lot of money. You can do this by learning how to buy at least the nonprescription medicines and vitamin products by generic names whenever possible, rather than by their advertised brand names.

In fact, you can cut the cost of such needs almost in half.

This writer priced 18 widely advertised household medicine, drug and vitamin products. The total cost came to $60.55.

We then priced comparable products sold under private brand names by several leading stores and mail-order houses. The total cost of the 18 private-brand equivalents of these medicines came to $34.62. This is an average saving of 43 percent from the prices of the brand-name products.

Note the chart with this article showing the brand-name product and price, and the private-brand equivalent and price.

You can buy with assurance the lowest-priced brand of any household medicine or vitamin product as long as the label says "U. S. P." This tells you that the product is made to the official United States Pharmacopoeia formula. You also can feel reassured, no matter what the price, if the label says "N. F." This means the product has been compounded according to the standard established by the "National Formulary."

From Soup to Nonsense:

Receipts and Records, Or How To Have a Good Night's Sleep

By Jane Goodsell

I WAS PEELING CARROTS for dinner when my 13-year-old daughter Katie sauntered into the kitchen.

"Mommy," she said, "I forgot to tell you. A man called while you were out. Mr. Jenkins. He wants you to call him."

"I don't know a Mr. Jenkins," I said absently. "Did he leave a number?"

"Uh huh," said Katie. "I'll get it. He's from the Dept. of Internal Revenue," she added casually.

"WHAT?" I dropped the carrot I was peeling and snatched the paper from her hands. "What did he say? What did he want?"

"I dunno," she said. "He wants you to call him."

I dialed the number written on the paper. There was no answer. It was after 5:30. I was still sitting by the phone, staring into space, when my husband came home.

"The Bureau of Internal Revenue is after us. "We're being investigated."

"What for?"

I explained the situation and when I'd finished he said, "Oh, quit worrying. It's routine. It must be. We've always been perfectly honest."

"Good," I said. "That would be nice."

A few minutes later I overheard him quizzing Katie. "What did Mr. Jenkins sound like?" he asked. "I mean, did he sound pleasant? Or mad? What was his voice like?"

"I dunno," said Katie. "He sounded just like anybody else."

MY HUSBAND SEEMED distracted at dinner. He ate around the edges of his meat loaf, and sort of muttered to himself. Finally he pushed back his chair, announced that he didn't want any dessert and disappeared into the basement. Half an hour later he hollered to me to come down, and I found him sitting on the floor, surrounded by cancelled checks. He looked like a shipwreck survivor.

"When did Katie have her tonsils out?" he asked.

"It was 1956, I think. Or was it '57? Why?"

"I can't find the check to the hospital," he muttered. "And where are the receipts for your typewriter ribbons?"

"Look," I interrupted, "you might as well come upstairs. You're probably getting upset over nothing. Why, I'll bet all he wants to know is . . . " I stopped, unable to think of what to say next. How should I know what Mr. Jenkins wanted?

My husband left in the morning, looking glassy-eyed. "You'll have to call Mr. Jenkins," he said, "because you're the one he phoned. But you'd better not try to explain anything because you'll get it all mixed up. And don't worry."

I called Mr. Jenkins at 9 a. m. and my teeth were chattering as I told him who I was.

"Oh yes," said Mr. Jenkins, "I called to ask if you know a young man named Allan Bradley. He's applied for a job with us, and he gave your name as a reference."

WINNER OF $2,000 PRIZE in contest conducted by United Federation of Teachers in New York was Barbara Silvergate of George Washington High School faculty. UFT Pres. Charles Cogen is presenting the prize, which Miss Silvergate won in a drive to raise funds for an information campaign in connection with the long-sought representation election for New York teachers.

Survey Shows:

Durable Goods Take 10 Percent of Income

AMERICANS SPEND MORE THAN $1 out of every $10 they receive buying cars, home appliances, furniture and other consumer durable goods, according to the University of Michigan Survey Research Center.

Recent patterns in buying and financing of durable goods are described in "1960 Survey of Consumer Finances," a major new publication of the center. Based on several thousand interviews with families in their homes, the survey reaches these conclusions:

1—Early last year, more than one family in six owned more than one car—but one family in four still owned none. While multiple car ownership has risen rapidly in recent years, the proportion of families without cars has stayed quite stable.

2—Two-thirds of those buying new cars and over half of those buying used autos and major household appliances use credit. The proportion of people buying these items "on the cuff" has remained very stable in the past three years.

3—Total spending for durable goods is not greatly concentrated in upper income families. The richest 20 percent of the nation's families account for 40 percent of the total dollar outlay on new cars and 36 percent of total spending on furniture and household appliances.

4—Low-income families devote a somewhat larger share of their total income to cars and conventional home appliances than upper-income families. When spending on vacations and hobbies is taken into account, the share of income spent on these items probably is stable across most major income groups.

Trade-Ins Usually Involved

The U-M analysis indicates that 85 percent of the nation's new car purchases normally involve trade-in or associated sale of a used model. Trade-ins also were involved in more than half the purchases of used cars.

For major appliances, the proportion of trade-ins varied widely. More than one-third of those buying refrigerators, TV sets, and washing machines traded in older models. Approximately one family in four did so when it bought a range or stove. But for furniture and air conditioners, the proportions were only 9 and 4 percent, respectively.

But where trade-ins of used cars often represented a substantial part of the purchase price of a newer model, this was not generally the case for household goods. Usually, the value received for trade-ins on refrigerators and TV sets amounted to only 10 percent of the purchase price for the new model.

Monthly Installments Common

Use of monthly installment buying for furniture and household appliances was most common on expenditures ranging from $200 to $1,000. Less than half of the nation's families buy furniture or household appliances in any one year; among those who do, 30 percent spend less than $200 for this purpose and 75 percent spend less than $500.

The fact that the share of income spent for these purposes does not increase greatly among upper income families indicates that major durable goods do not represent luxury items for the American consumer, according to the center.

Report Summarizes Union-Won Fringes

A significant number of union contracts provide some form of military-leave pay, specify on-duty time allowed workers for washup. cleanup and clothes change, and require employers to furnish necessary safety and work clothing.

The current issue of Collective Bargaining Report, published by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, summarizes recent Labor Dept. surveys of contract provisions in these areas.

Not all of the benefits provided workers in these fringe fields are written into contracts, the Dept. of Research points out.

"In many situations there are quite definite, jointly recognized and mutually satisfactory practices observed without specific provisions being written into the agreement," it said.

In fact, some of the contract provision were put in on the initiative of employers who wanted to set a limit to the washup or cleanup time previously allowed on an informal basis.

Of major contracts—those covering more than 1,000 workers—about 17 percent specify time for personal washup, cleanup of equipment or clothes changes.

The most common daily washup period is 10 minutes, the period specified in 27 percent of the agreements dealing with this subject.

Allowable time for cleanup of equipment is normally described in contract terminology as "reasonable," "sufficient," or "time necessary." Where specified, five or 10 minutes are most common.

Similarly, only a minority of contracts dealing with time to change from work clothes specify the number of minutes allowed. Among those that do, most are in the meat-packing industry, where 12 minutes is normally allowed.

Nearly all contracts dealing with the subject require employers to provided necessary safety and special work clothing, although a few provided for an allowance for employes to purchase uniforms or other special clothing.

Military leave provisions usually deal with two types of cases—employes entering military service and employes on reserve duty taking part in annual tours of duty, usually two weeks.

For persons entering prolonged military service, most of the agreements (59 percent) provide for one or more weeks of pay, while 32 percent make up the difference between military pay and the employe's regular wages, usually for a two-week period. The remainder provide a specific dollar bonus.

Most of the agreements dealing with short-term reserve duty require the employer to pay the difference between the military pay for the period and the worker's normal wage. Fewer than 3 percent require that part or all of reserve training time be charged against vacation time.

Briefing Panel To Discuss U. S. Defense

America's national defense will be the subject of the next edition of "Briefing Session." Participating with the program's regular moderator, Edward P. Morgan, will be J. Sterling Livingston, of the Harvard School of Business Administration, and Rep. Gerald R. Ford, Jr. (R-Mich.), a member of the House Military Affairs Committee.

Livingston has conducted a number of research and training programs for the military services and defense contractors during the last 15 years. The development and use of management control systems on defense projects has been a part of his work.

Ford is currently in his seventh term in Congress. He is the ranking Republican member of the House Subcommittee on Defense Dept. Appropriations.

SEN. HARRISON WILLIAMS, JR., (D-N. J.), left, and Matt Triggs, assistant legislative director of the American Farm Bureau Federation, as guest panelist on a "Briefing Session" program disagreed on extent of federal legislation needed to deal with the plight of migrant farm workers.

Briefing Panel Splits On Farm Labor Aids

Two guest panelists on the public affairs program "Briefing Session" agreed that the plight of migrant farm workers is an unhappy one but they sharply disagreed on what the federal government should do about it.

In the latest edition of the TV series co-produced by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center, the panelists were Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N. J.), and Matt Triggs, assistant legislative director of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Williams is sponsor of a package of bills that would extend federal protection and aid to the hundreds of thousands of workers who follow crop harvests around the country.

Recent figures show that the farm migrants are the lowest economic class in the society, earning an average of less than $1,000 a year. Among other things Williams' bills would give migrant workers a federal minimum wage of 75 cents an hour, control child labor, provide retraining and better housing, and bring farm workers under the National Labor Relations Act.

The difference between the panelists on these proposals was made clear in two statements. Williams, speaking of the migrants' substandard living standards, said "the only way we will bring to these families a minimum of decency is through a comprehensive program of national legislation." Triggs countered that "we are very much opposed to some of these bills, particularly to the bill providing for compulsory collective bargaining in agriculture."

Triggs suggested the low income and bad living conditions of migrant workers were problems brought on by the nature of the people themselves.

"It is primarily a social problem," he said. "Most of the migratory workers are people who lack skills, capacity, ambition, people who have handicaps that have prevented them from finding permanent jobs, settling down in a permanent residence."

If there were no farm employment the same people would be present with the same problem, he maintained.

Williams looked forward to a day when farm mechanization would stabilize the work force and when any program of federal aid would "run itself out." But, said the senator, "the fact is now we need these folks because of the nature of the planting and the harvest."

"They are only needed for brief periods in any one point," he added. "We do not have the mechanization necessary to plant and harvest the various fruit and vegetable crops, therefore these hands are needed now. And these lives are wretched lives."

Concerning Williams' bill that would control the labor of children in migrant families Trigg said:

"In most rural communities boys work on farms during the summer vacation and they generally start this work at ages 11, 12 or 13, and those who get jobs think they are very fortunate."

"We are certainly not dealing with the bucolic idyll that Mr. Triggs suggests of the happy farm boy," Williams replied. "We are going to the kid who is stooping all day in the hot sun, or in dangerous work."

$18 in Pay for 102-Hour Week Told by Women Farm Migrants

The AFL-CIO has declared its support of a "farm labor stabilization" bill which "would help the public consicence to right many of the wrongs now being done to migrants."

Even as labor testified before a Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor, a special House subcommittee winding up hearings in New York took sworn testimony from two southern women migrants who said that in a 102-hour workweek they netted a top pay of $18 after deductions.

Another woman scheduled to testify about conditions among migrant workers on eastern Long Island declined to appear and told the committee staff she had been threatened by an unidentified source. Rep. Herbert Zelenko (D-N.Y.), the group's chairman, ordered an investigation.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Walter J. Mason put labor's backing behind the Senate bill, which would empower the Secretary of Labor to provide minimum health service, housing, transportation and nourishment for migratory families before and after actual employment.

David E. Christian, Labor Dept. special assistant for manpower programs, testifying on behalf of Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, commented that it was "anomalous" to find rural underemployment equivalent to 1.4 million totally unemployed domestic workers while the government each year brings in some 400,000 foreign workers.

American farm workers exist at a marginal level, Christian observed, and are not even accorded the protections and employment standards which the Mexican government insists on in the U.S.-Mexico pact covering that nation's workers.

"The primary problem," said Christian, "is bringing the employer in labor shortage areas and the workers in labor supply (surplus) areas together."

Under the bill sponsored by Senate subcommittee chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D.-N.J.), he noted, the Secretary of Labor would be authorized to assemble qualified underemployed farm workers and transport them and, in some cases, their families, to an employment area or hiring center.

He also noted the Williams' bill would provide for written agreements containing minimum protections for workers and employers.

Christian said the Kennedy Administration "enthusiastically endorses" the central principles of the stabilization bill.

The two women migratory workers who testified before the House subcommittee signed affidavits which said they were employed as potato graders on Long Island and worked 17 hours a day, six days a week. After deductions for rent, food, "union-dues" and other items, they received cash usually running from $3 to $8 a week but never more than $18.

Betty Jean Johnson, 52, one of the migrant's said she was now stranded on Long Island and had no money to return to her home in Norfolk, Va.

The crew leaders, she testified, "bring you up here and make slaves out of you—they give you a slice of bread and a piece of meat."

She said she paid $1 a week for "union dues," adding: "I don't know what kind of union I was in—never saw anybody, no button, no papers, no nothing else," she said.

Screen Extras Elect Directors

Hollywood, Calif.—Eleven members of the Screen Extras Guild have won election to the union's board of directors, it has been announced by Executive Sec. H. O'Neil Shanks.

Victorious candidates chosen for three-year terms in a secret mail ballot were Russell Ash, Jefferey Sayre, Roy Damron, Evelyn Underwood, Buddy C. Mason, Norman Stevens, Rol Thomas, Carmen Nisbet, Carol Henry, Vi Ingraham and John R. Albright.

Jersey Labor Challenges Medical Group

Newark, N. J.—Union spokesmen here have charged the New Jersey affiliate of the American Medical Association with "gross distortion" of proposals for health care for the aged and with "denying freedom of choice" of health insurance plans to the people of the state.

Sec.-Treas. Victor D. Leonardis of the State Industrial Union Council urged support for legislation which would permit unions and other community groups to set up prepaid, non-profit medical programs. Under present law, any medical service program must have the approval of the state medical society and of 51 percent of the physicians in the area where it operates.

Leonardis charged that the doctors "are denying to the citizens of New Jersey freedom of choice as far as their medical insurance is concerned."

Pres. Vincent J. Murphy of the State Federation of Labor took sharp issue with a speech by Dr. Frank Buchanan, new president of the Medical Society of New Jersey. He quoted Buchanan as labeling health insurance under social security "socialized medicine" and claiming it would make the citizenry "soft."

"Professional medicine apparently prefers to keep the population hopelessly in debt for medical bills," he said, "and prefers to see the health standards of many Americans at a disgracefully low ebb."

Labor Dept. Merit Award Given Ching

Cyrus S. Ching, veteran labor-management relations consultant and a trusted aide to four Presidents, has been presented with the Labor Dept.'s award of merit for his "significant and outstanding contributions."

The award was presented on Ching's 85th birthday by Assistant Labor Sec. James Reynolds on behalf of Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg. Still vigorously active, Ching is currently chairman of the Atomic Energy Labor-Management Relations Panel and is in private business as a consultant.

Other posts he has held, dating back to the Roosevelt Administration, include the chairmanship of the Wage Stabilization Board and membership on both the National War Labor Board and the National Defense Mediation Board.

Goldberg praised Ching as having "championed the cause of human relations" and cited his ability to bring "labor and management out of the darkness of chaos to the light of reason."

Search Refusal No Firing Cause

Windsor, Ont.—An arbitrator has ruled that Chrysler Corp. of Canada had no right to dismiss an employe for refusing to submit to a personal search.

Judge C. E. Bennett of Owen Sound, Ont., ordered reinstatement of the employe, a member of Auto Workers Local 444.

He was dismissed in November 1960 after twice refusing to submit to a search of his person by plant protection officers. The company described the search request as part of a system of spot checks carried out at the gates every three or four weeks.

Acting on a grievance filed by the UAW local, the arbitrator declared that the right to search an individual is a serious invasion of personal freedom.

ACTU Gives Honor Medal To Carey

New York—Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers has linked the price-fixing conspiracy of the electrical equipment industry to the social evils which Pope Leo XIII and Pope Pius XI warned against in historic social encyclicals.

Carey addressed the New York chapter of the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists, which presented him with its annual Quadragesimo Anno award, named after the pronouncement on social reform issued 30 years ago by Pope Pius XI.

Papal Warning Cited

He quoted the papal warning that "an immense power and despotic economic dictatorship is consolidated in the hands of a few, who often are not owners but only the trustees and managing directors of invested funds which they administer according to their own arbitrary will and pleasure."

Contrasting the social views of organized labor and business, Carey charged that "big business and industry in the United States, and their spokesmen, the NAM and the Chamber of Commerce, stand solidly against practically every principle and proposal advanced by the two encyclicals."

He charged that the chief "crime" of General Electric, Westinghouse and other conspirators "is against their employes and against the youth of the nation. They have encouraged not only a disrespect for law and morality but also an attitude of cyncism that gives top value to the organization man and to expediency."

Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) also spoke.

JAMES B. CAREY, right, receives annual Quadragesimo Anno medal awarded by New York chapter of Association of Catholic Trade Unionists, from Daniel Schulder, secretary, as Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.), who also spoke on the occasion, looks on.

Meany Hits Philosophy Of 'Business as Usual'

discrimination as usual," he said, pointing to the "disgraceful episode" of mob violence directed against the Freedom Riders in Montgomery, Ala. He assailed not only the "hoodlums brought up on a diet of race hatred" who attacked the bus riders but also the elected officials in Alabama "whose job is to uphold the law rather than to break it."

The AFL-CIO president also discussed the trade union movement itself, declaring:

"I am sorry to say that labor's attitude is not much better than the others.

"With labor it's business as usual; jurisdictional disputes as usual, inter-union rivalries as usual.

"These are not rivalries to see who can do the most for the workers. These are not rivalries to see who can do the best job of organizing the unorganized. These are rivalries to take members from other unions.

"We seem determined to reorganize or disorganize those already organized, despite the fact that there are millions eligible for organization who have never seen an organizer around."

Meany also said "numerous inexcusable work stoppages" on the nation's missile program involved "trivial things which have no real meaning in the trade union philosophy." The stoppages, he said, imperil the "welfare of all Americans."

The AFL-CIO president said that part of the present problem within the trade union movement may stem from the fact that "we have become too prosperous, and too many union leaders think of unions as big business."

"The only businesslike thing about unions," he declared, should be the manner in which they safeguard their finances. "That's where the similarity between business and labor ends as far as I'm concerned."

Meany told the convention that "in this time of national peril, I don't think we can afford the luxury of inter-union feuds if we intend to continue making progress. We can't afford civil war in the trade union movement."

He called on labor to "go back to our first principles" and make certain that unions are "protecting the interests and welfare of those who work for wages" and to apply "the principle of unity and brotherhood to unions as well as to people."

Unity between all unions, Meany declared, is essential if American labor is to "build on the achievements of the past in order to meet the threats of the future."

The three-day convention of the state federation was devoted to national and state legislative matters. Action by the delegates ranged from opposition to any increase in the sales tax to a renewal of support for federal legislation to finance health care for the aged under social security.

Joseph F. Burke of the Sheet Metal Workers and Harry Boyer of the Steelworkers are co-presidents of the state labor body. They were elected in 1960 to serve two-year terms.

Labor Asks Clear Label On 'Moisturized' Hams

Organized labor has urged the Dept. of Agriculture to require strict labeling of "watered" hams—hams pumped with water to "moisturize" them—and adopt other measures to safeguard the consumer and his "right to know."

The AFL-CIO and the Meat Cutters proposed the actions at hearings held by the department to reconsider its controversial order of last Dec. 30 on allowable moisture content.

Anne Draper of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research said labor was "as shocked as the rest of the country" by press disclosures of the widespread practice of pumping water into hams "in amounts up to 30 percent in excess of green weight."

She said labor was "dismayed" at the Dec. 30 order which, she said, relaxed standards for federally-inspected ham to permit as much as 10 percent excess moisture in the finished product, a proportion which could become 16 percent in practice and without labeling.

"The consumer has a right to know," declared Meat Cutters' Legislative Rep. Arnold Mayer, who testified for AMCBW Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman.

Mayer said that in the absence of consumer safeguards, uninspected plants were pumping 30 percent water into smoked hams. Since these hams sold for less per pound than those from inspected plants, "unmoistured, inspected ones lost out in competition. . . ."

Miss Draper said government figures showed that in the last five years, pork smoked in federally-inspected plants dropped by 20 percent and 1960 saw a net decline of 300 million pounds.

She stressed that workers, as consumers, are alarmed "at this flight of hams from federal inspection." She asserted that less than 50 percent of hams on the market at the time the order was issued were processed under federal inspection, meaning for the remainder no inspection at all or inspection under less stringent state or local regulations.

The AFL-CIO proposed these actions:

- That the Agriculture Dept. propose to Congress an amendment of the Federal Meat Inspection Act to bring the largest possible number of slaughtering and processing plants under federal inspection with the aim of securing uniformly high standards.
- That, in the absence of legislative safeguards, the 10 percent water allowance should remain in effect for the time being in an effort to keep ham and meat production in federally-inspected plants. Thus, positive labeling on water content is essential, Miss Draper added.
- That the department create a Consumer Advisory Committee to protect consumer interests.

The AFL-CIO observed that the controversial order of last December was issued without public hearings, that the consumer interest was largely ignored and that the evidence on so-called consumer preferences came from surveys sponsored by a meat packing industry which wanted a relaxation of ham standards.

Signaled at Convention:

Insurance Workers To Push Organizing

Philadelphia—An aggressive organizing campaign to bring hundreds of thousands of men and women into the ranks of the Insurance Workers was signaled here at the union's second biennial convention.

Pres. George L. Russ, in his keynote address to the 500 delegates and alternates from 246 locals in 41 states and the District of Columbia, urged that organizing efforts be concentrated on two main areas:

- Unorganized clerical workers in companies where the union currently represents agents.
- The thousand of "free-riders" at companies under contract who "are all too willing to reap the benefits of every contract we negotiate" but who, Russ said, have been unwilling to join in the fight for improving on-the-job conditions.

The convention—first since the creation of the IWIU in 1959 through merger of the former Insurance Workers and the Insurance Agents—heard praise from AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler for the manner in which jurisdictional problems were resolved through amalgamation.

"After six years of merger at the national level," Schnitzler told the convention, organized labor "is still divided over the issue of jurisdiction." The AFL-CIO official made it clear that he was "not placing blame for the disunity which still exists" in labor's ranks, but added that the insurance unions had "set an example for all of us by uniting in a combined effort to organize the unorganized instead of wasting your strength fighting each other."

Schnitzler emphasized that those who claim "the house of labor is irreconcilably divided are grossly mistaken," and forecast that efforts to strengthen harmony among the various segments of organized labor would gain headway in the months ahead.

Efforts to organize throughout the trade union movement and particularly in the white collar field, Russ told the delegates, have been slowed in recent years by the business lobby's drive to discredit organized labor—efforts, he said, which culminated in enactment of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

He said the 1959 labor law was "clearly designed to keep labor so busy defending itself against attack that unions would be unable to mount any organizing or collective bargaining offensive."

As a result, the IWIU president continued, although the union represents 17,000 agents at the Prudential Insurance Co., it has only 9,700 members; and while it bargains for 5,000 agents at the Metropolitan Insurance Co., only 50 percent belong to the union.

It will remain impossible for our union to achieve its full objective at the bargaining table," Russ declared, "until we improve our position membership-wise."

In his report, Russ reviewed the first two years of organic merger, in which virtually all local unions of the former internationals have now completed amalgamation. Most of these were achieved, the report noted, within the 18-month grace period permitted by the founding convention, although a handful came about only under order from the union's executive board.

Locals from 16 areas have carried to the convention appeals from the executive board's directive to accomplish merger. In four of the cases, involving locals in two or more cities, the appeals are from the geographical areas established by the executive board.

Ahead of the convention, in addition to action on the merger appeals, lay the election of officers for the coming two years, and action on a wide range of resolutions dealing with collective bargaining, political education, legislative action, education and community services.

UAW Disputes Industry On Farm Implements

Direct labor costs in the production of farm equipment have probably gone down in the last 14 years, Vice Pres. Pat Greathouse of the Auto Workers told a House Agriculture subcommittee.

Greathouse's testimony contradicted industry witnesses who appeared before the committee previously. He charged that "rubber yardsticks, hidden assumptions, semantic camouflage and plain misrepresentation" were among statistical devices used to distort the facts.

Citing statistics presented by the agricultural implement companies to the subcommittee, Greathouse emphasized that they showed the number of production workers had declined in the last 14 years while overhead personnel and workers on salary and bonus had increased.

He asked the committee to direct the companies to report their unit production costs, saying these figures would show that direct labor costs probably had declined.

Comparing the careers of a John Deere stockholder and a John Deere worker, both of whom had the same income in 1947, Greathouse said in 14 years the stockholder collected 3.13 times as much as the worker. A worker during the period—assuming he worked 2,000 hours each year—collected a total of $55,000, while a John Deere stockholder received $172,448. Of this, $70,709 came in dividends and $101,739 in capital gains, the UAW official said.

Greathouse said a National Planning Agency could have contributed significantly to heading off the farm depression and anticipating the problems arising out of automation. Such an agency, he declared, is needed now to help assure stable prosperity for the entire economy.

Cornell Scholarship Memorializes Lacey

Ithaca, N. Y.—The New York City AFL-CIO will sponsor a four-year scholarship to Cornell University's School of Industrial & Labor Relations as a memorial to the late Martin T. Lacey.

The scholarship will be awarded to a son or daughter of a member whose union is affiliated with the city central body. Applicants must be high school seniors graduating in June and able to meet school requirements. The scholarship memorializes the late president of the former AFL New York City central body who died in 1957.

Cleared by Subcommittee:

Omnibus Housing Bill Set for Senate

An omnibus housing and urban renewal bill, one of the key measures Pres. Kennedy has asked Congress to pass this year, has been cleared for Senate action by a 10-5 vote of the Banking & Currency Committee.

The bill steps up federal grants for urban renewal, authorizes construction of 100,000 additional public housing units and provides a fresh flow of funds for low-cost loans to colleges for student housing.

It also doubles the funds available for construction of housing for the elderly through long-term, low-interest loans. These loans could be made to public bodies and consumer cooperatives in addition to private non-profit corporations now eligible.

Another provision would encourage local public housing authorities to lower rents for needy families by authorizing an additional federal payment for each dwelling unit occupied by an elderly family if needed to protect the solvency of the project.

The Senate committee bill is considerably broader in scope than two housing bills vetoed by former Pres. Eisenhower in 1959 even though they had been sharply scaled down in efforts to meet Republican objections. The threat of a veto also blocked comprehensive legislation last year.

Anti-Recession Role Cited

The pent-up backlog of need plus the importance of home construction as an anti-recession measure were cited by the AFL-CIO in testimony urging even bigger strides than the Kennedy Administration has proposed.

While the Senate bill falls short of labor's proposals, it breaks new ground in the housing field with innovations, including:

- An "experimental" program of 40-year, no-down payment FHA mortgages for moderate income families. The committee said the program is aimed at helping families with income of between $4,000 and $6,000 a year who are largely priced out of the present housing market.
- Long-term loans at interest rates below the market level for rental and cooperative apartment projects for moderate-income families who cannot qualify for public housing and cannot afford suitable private housing.
- Authorization for 25-year FHA loans up to $10,000 for major repairs and additions to homes. The present limit on FHA home improvement loans is $3,500, repayable in five years.
- Up to $100 million in federal grants to enable communities to buy up "open space" for recreation and park areas.
- Allocation of $100 million for loans to local communities to buy railroad cars, rights of way and other commuter transit facilities plus authorization for earmarking $50 million of the $2.5 billion urban renewal fund for mass transportation demonstration projects and planning.

In all, the committee's new long-term authorizations add up to nearly $5 billion, of which an estimated $122.5 million would be utilized during the 1962 fiscal year for programs administered by the Housing & Home Finance Agency. With previously-authorized spending the agency's 1962 expenditures would total $951.5 million. The omnibus bill also includes separate authorizations for Veterans Administration direct home loans and for farm housing programs.

The Senate committee report declared:

"The committee is concerned about the state of the national economy and the continued lack of sustained vitality shown by the home-building industry."

The 10-5 Senate committee vote broke through party lines as two eastern Republicans, Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.) and Prescott Bush (Conn.), joined with Democratic Senators John Sparkman (Ala.), Paul H. Douglas (Ill.), Joseph S. Clark (Pa.), William Proxmire (Wis.), Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (N. J.), Edmund S. Muskie (Me.), Edward V. Long (Mo.) and Maurine B. Neuberger (Ore.) in approving the bill.

Committe Chairman A. Willis Robertson (Va.) and Sen. William A. Blakley (Tex.), Democrats, joined Republicans Homer E. Capehart (Ind.), Wallace F. Bennett (Utah) and J. Glenn Beall (Md.) in opposing significant portions of the proposal.

Robertson denounced the bill as "extravagant and inflationary."

While Sparkman, who heads the subcommittee on housing, steered the bill through the Senate committee, his fellow Alabaman, Rep. Albert Rains (D), headed a House subcommittee which was drafting a somewhat revised version of the Administration bill.

The House bill is expected to put greater emphasis on rural housing and substantially increase federal loans for community public works.

CLC Votes To Suspend Litho Union

Ottawa, Ont.—The executive council of the Canadian Labor Congress has voted to suspend the Amalgamated Lithographers of America from membership, CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin has announced.

The union withdrew from the AFL-CIO in 1958 rather than accept decisions of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and impartial umpires under the no-raiding agreement with regard to jurisdictional disputes.

It was a jurisdictional dispute that was responsible for the CLC suspension, Jodoin said. The action was based on charges by the Pressmen that the ALA had raided their membership in plants in Winnipeg, Man.; Saskatoon, Sask., and Calgary Alta.

The CLC constitution requires each affiliate to "respect the established bargaining relationship of every other affiliate and no affiliate shall raid the established collective bargaining relationship of any other affiliate."

Secretary-Treasurers Note Bonding Cost Rise

Chicago—The sharp increase in union bonding costs since enactment of the Landrum-Griffin Act was discussed here at a one-day session of the AFL-CIO Conference of Secretary-Treasurers.

Financial officers from 70 national and international unions reported that rates have increased 50 percent in the past year because of the L-G requirement that union officers be bonded for "faithful performance of duty" as well as for fiscal responsibility.

The conference heard a report from AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler on meetings earlier this year with officials of the bonding industry, who told labor leaders that in the first year of operating under L-G there had not been a single claim involving the "faithful performance" clause in the labor law.

Schnitzler also discussed current problems arising under the federation's no-raiding agreement and the impact of unemployment on trade union activities.

John Holcombe, director of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor-Management Reports, which administers the Landrum-Griffin Act, discussed the bonding problems and the general subject of reporting procedures.

Holcombe told the secretary-treasurers that his bureau is currently studying a draft of a new simplified form for local union reports to ease the pressure on local officers. If approved, he said, the new form would probably be put into use this fall.

To substantiate labor's contention that unions are being penalized by L-G bonding requirements, the conference agreed to conduct a survey among all affiliates comparing premium costs and claims experience in the years immediately prior to passage of the labor law and in the first year of operating under L-G.

The secretary-treasurers heard a report from Alexander Bookstaver, director of the newly created AFL-CIO Dept. of Investments, on the manner in which the department can assist affiliated internationals to invest general funds as well as health, welfare and pension funds in such areas as housing.

Building Trades Back Local Works Program

Enactment of an emergency $1 billion local public works program would provide "immediate relief" from the "serious unemployment" problems of the construction industry, the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. has told Congress.

Testifying in favor of legislation proposed by Sen. Joseph S. Clark, Jr. (D-Pa.), William J. McSorley, Jr., assistant to the BCTD president, told a Senate Labor subcommittee that joblessness in the industry stood at nearly 20 percent in April.

"Our problem of unemployment is not limited to any particular locality," McSorley testified, "but is widespread throughout the industry and the country."

Clark's bill would provide $500 million in federal grants—plus standby authorization for an additional $500 million—for short-range projects which states and municipalities could launch within 90 days and which would be completed in a year. Authorizations for projects would halt when unemployment fell below 4 percent, and could be reinstated by the President if joblessness later exceeded that figure.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, leadoff witness at the subcommittee hearings, endorsed the Clark proposal as a "necessary supplement" to Pres. Kennedy's long-range program for revitalizing the economy.

McSorley told the subcommittee that Kennedy's school and housing programs will, if approved, "definitely provide employment" both for building tradesmen and workers in supporting industries.

He forecast, however, that a "definite time lag" due to the problems of planning and site acquisition would "preclude any immediate solution to the unemployment problem."

In addition the BCTD spokesman said, the public works called for in the Clark bill are "needed in some form and to some degree in almost every community throughout the country." He said they are projects that are already planned but that have been deferred "for lack of adequate funds."

McSorley expressed the department's support of language in the bill which would require payment of prevailing wages in accordance with the Davis-Bacon Law.

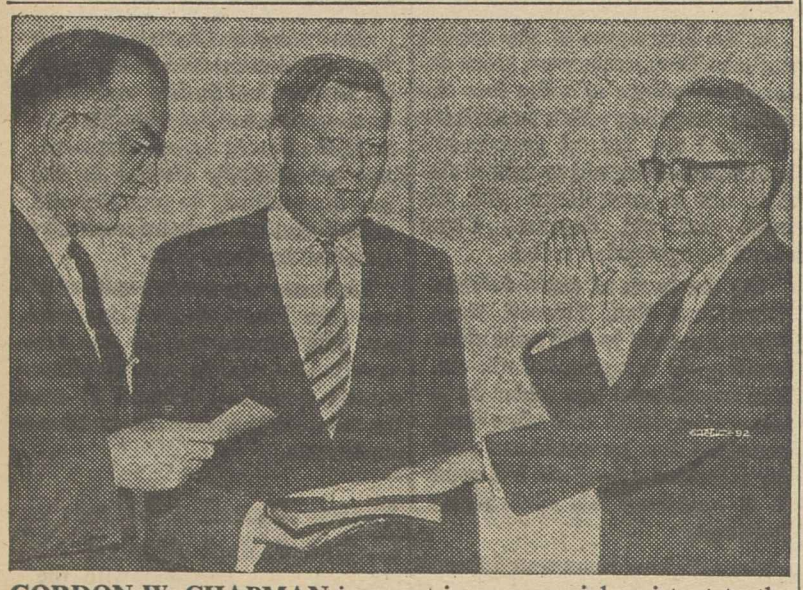
Teen Job-Hunting Leaflets Ready

A series of leaflets directed to teen-agers who hope to land suitable jobs this summer has been issued by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Standards.

The 4.5 million youths from 14 to 17 expected to get jobs after school closes in June may find it harder than usual, the department pointed out in an announcement, because the number of teen-agers is at an all-time high and employers are demanding more education and training.

The leaflets emphasize that young summer workers should return to school in the fall, complete their educations and "add to [their] job potentialities."

The leaflets are "Young Workers Under 18," "Summer Jobs for Students" and "Stay in School," and a related one, "Memo to Employers." Copies may be obtained from the Bureau of Labor Standards, U.S. Labor Dept., Washington 25, D. C.



GORDON W. CHAPMAN is sworn in as a special assistant to the Secretary of State and coordinator of international labor affairs at a State Dept. ceremony. Alexis Johnson, deputy undersecretary of state for political affairs.

AFL-CIO Asks Disclosure Law 'Teeth'

Reforms Sought in '58 Urged on Congress

The AFL-CIO has called on Congress to "put teeth" into the 1958 Welfare & Pension Plan Disclosure law by adopting "strong and enforceable" provision which the labor movement supported three years ago.

The federation's backing for amendments proposed by the Kennedy Administration was spelled out by Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris in testimony before a House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.).

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, leadoff witness at the subcommittee hearings, declared that the 1958 law on disclosure of the finances and operations of welfare and pension plans was "weak," and said there is "a compelling need to protect more adequately the equities of the millions of persons" covered by such plans.

The Administration amendments would:

- Give the Secretary of Labor investigative and enforcement authority, including the right of subpoena, to uncover abuses of reporting requirements.
- Authorize the Secretary to bring civil actions to enjoin violations, instead of relying on private suits by individuals.
- Require the retention of records for a minimum five-year period.
- Make both the payment and receipt of bribes or kickbacks a federal felony.
- Make it a felony to steal or embezzle from any employe benefit plan.
- Require each administrator to submit reports to the Labor Dept. on a prescribed form to insure detailed information on all phases of a plan's operation. At present, use of Labor Dept, reporting forms is optional.
- Eliminate the present requirement that statements of assets, liabilities, receipts and disbursements need be only in "summary" form, in order to insure more detailed disclosure of many key aspects of these financial operations.
- Establish new criteria for coverage so that all welfare and pension plans claiming federal tax exemption will be required to report on their activities.

In a message to Congress calling for enactment of the amendments —all of which were contained in the AFL-CIO-backed bill introduced by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) in 1958—Kennedy declared that studies over the past three years have "disclosed several serious deficiencies" in the disclosure law.

The Douglas bill was passed by the Senate that year, but the House adopted a watered-down measure which spelled out the federal government's responsibility for overseeing the law but which, Biemiller told the subcommittee, "failed to include essential provisions for adequate enforcement."

Enactment of the Administration amendments—sponsored by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.), chairman of the House Labor Committee, and Rep. Neal Smith (D-Ia.)—is "essential if the interests of America's wage and salary earners are to be adequately protected," Biemiller said.

Welfare and pension trust funds, now estimated to have resources of over $46 billion, the federation spokesman said, "belong to millions of wage and salary earners [and] should be rigorously protected."

Despite the 1958 law, he continued, "there is nothing to assure us that abuses which have been revealed from time to time by committees of Congress have in any way diminished."

"On the contrary, as these plans grow, opportunities for fast practices and embezzlement by unscrupulous administrators and trustees also increase," he added.

In his analysis of the amendments, Harris pointed out that many of the proposals—including the investigative and civil suit powers which they would confer on the Secretary of Labor and the strong criminal penalties for embezzlement and bribery—parallel provision of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

Prescribed Forms 'Important'

The associate general counsel declared that the authority which the amendments would give the Secretary to prescribe reporting forms "is among the more important provisions" of the Administration bill.

The lack of authority to force the use of a standard form, Harris said, makes it easier for "an administrator who decides to withhold some of the information . . . to escape detection." Honest administrators, he said, "will welcome the use of the prescribed form, and the others are not entitled to consideration."

Goldberg told the subcommittee that "it is high time that the government carries out its obligation to the millions of men and women who are participants in these welfare and pension benefit plans to insure that the full spotlight of public disclosure is focused on operations which are so vital to their present and future security and well-being."

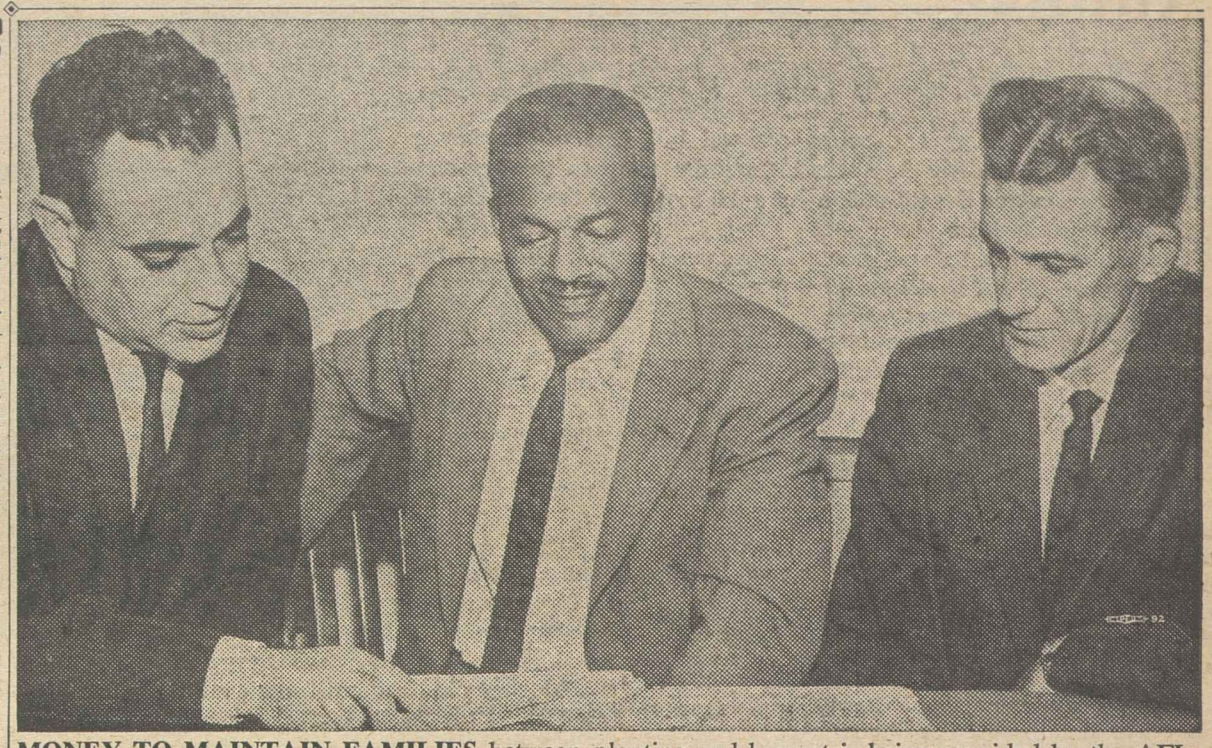
"We can no longer . . . continue to betray the interests of the millions of workers and their beneficiaries who may well believe the law now affords them some real measure of protection," he added. "Instead, we must see to it that the billions of dollars received and disbursed by these plans are being honestly managed."

Chamber Asks Jobs For 'Conservatives'

Milwaukee, Ind.—The Employers' Association of Milwaukee is urging its members to emphasize the hiring of students with "conservative ideas" for summer jobs, advocating what the Milwaukee Journal in an editorial called "a strange standard to set for temporary help."

In its official publication the association called on employers to recognize that students who have "been courageous in their support of free enterprise and conservative ideas" on campuses "have not accepted the anti-business propaganda and are eager to work and help a firm make a profit rather than change a company into a welfare project."

"They will soon be available for summer work and we believe that they should be given priority in assigning available jobs," the bulletin said.



MONEY TO MAINTAIN FAMILIES between planting and harvest is being provided by the AFL-CIO to 53 Negro farmers in Fayette and Haywood Counties, Tenn., who lacked funds from usual sources after they had registered to vote last year. Examining the list of those to receive the aid are left to right, Assistant Dir. Don Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, Field Rep. Richard Haley of the Committee on Racial Equality (CORE), and Sec. Matthew Lynch of the Tennessee AFL-CIO, in whose office in Nashville the conference took place.

Labor Gives 'Run Money' In Vote Fight

Nashville, Tenn.—The families of 53 Negro farmers in Fayette and Haywood Counties who have been subjected to economic reprisals after they registered to vote last year will eat this summer after all, thanks to the AFL-CIO.

Organized labor is providing them with "run money," the local term for funds they need for day-to-day maintenance between the time their crops are planted and the harvest.

Those receiving grants are among some 700 families met with economic boycott following their registrations. Many are tenant farmers who were faced with eviction, but a federal court ruling halted the ousters. However, the court could not guarantee land for them, or the capital to work it and to keep their families going until the crops are in.

The grant program will be administered for the national AFL-CIO by Sec. Matthew Lynch of the Tennessee State AFL-CIO.

"These checks," he said, "will go to farmers who have land to work and have been given crop loans by volunteer groups but are unable to get their usual 'run money' from customary sources.

"Our aim is to help those who want to stay in countries where they have lived all their lives and who want to do the only work available to them."

The subsistance money will vary from $30 to $100 a month, depending on family size. The families to receive it include more than 400 persons.

Guild Unit Backs Peace Corps

"Wholehearted support" for Pres. John F. Kennedy's Peace Corps program has been voted by the executive board of the Washington Newspaper Guild.

The board approved a resolution pledging its assistance in recruiting qualified newspaper personnel for the corps to help develop news media in the newly emerging nations. At the same time it called for aid in developing wages, hours and working conditions for native journalists in the Guild tradition "consistent with their local economies."

Kennedy's School Bill Assured of Senate OK

sas. The Administration had originally asked for a minimum allocation of $15 per public school pupil, plus invocation of an equalization formula based on per capita income.

The Senate bill also calls for $840 million for a three-year extension of the program of aid to "impacted" school districts—those in which the school population is swollen because of the presence of federal employes at missile sites, military bases or other federal facilities. This is $240 million more than the Administration had requested.

The Thompson bill, which cleared the House Education Committee by a 19-12 vote, differs from the Senate measure only in its formula for distributing funds. It provides a base of $12 per pupil—again including private school students for the purpose of allocating money, but earmarking funds only for public schools. States with less wealth would receive up to 2.5 times the minimum.

In the week-long Senate debate on school aid, opponents sought to defeat the bill by tacking on amendments calling for aid to religious as well as public schools and other amendments which raised the controversial school desegregation issue.

In the first stages of the debate, southern Democrats were twice defeated on efforts to write into the message language which would have prevented the federal government from withholding aid to school districts not in compliance with the seven - year - old Supreme Court school desegregation ruling.

On the heels of these defeats, Republican Sen. Prescott Bush (Conn.) sought to add on a rider banning aid to segregated schools. The amendment was tabled by a resounding 61-25 vote after Bush conceded that he would not vote for a federal school-aid bill even if it contained his civil rights language.

The religious issue was injected by right-wing Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.), an outspoken critic of federal aid to education. The Goldwater amendment, tabled by a 61-32 rollcall vote, would have provided $351 million over a three-year period for loans to private and religious schools for classroom construction.

Defeat of the Goldwater amendment came as Chairman Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.) of the House Education Committee ruled out of order a proposed amendment by Rep. Herbert Zelenko (D-N. Y.) which would have broadened the House bill in committee to include loans to private schools.

Powell said the question of aiding classroom construction for private schools would be considered when the committee takes up expansion and extension of the National Defense Education Act of 1958. Morse gave a similar pledge on the Senate floor.

When the school-aid measure reaches the House floor, its stiffest test is expected to come over the question of using federal grants for raising teachers' salaries.

Last year, the House passed the first aid-to-education measure in its history, but limited assistance to classroom construction. By contrast, the Senate approved a measure substantially similar to the one it was ready to pass to assist school districts both on construction and teachers' pay.

The issue was never resolved because the House Rules Committee, last year dominated by the conservative Republican-southern Democratic coalition, refused to send the measure to a joint Senate-House conference.

Automation Effect Cited By Kennedy

Pres. Kennedy has called on Congress for "prompt enactment" of a federally financed four-year program to retrain and relocate several hundred thousand unemployed workers idled by the impact of automation.

The President, in letters to the Senate and the House, said these unemployed "whose skills have been rendered obsolete by automation and other technological changes must be equipped with new skills enabling them to become productive members of our society once again."

The Administration program is designed to grapple with the job displacement problem at three levels—the unemployed who need retraining before they can find new jobs; the unemployed who must be aided in relocating to new areas where their skills are in demand; the employed who need additional training to meet industrial change.

Kennedy noted that "the skills of other workers must also be improved to enable them to meet the more demanding requirements of modern industry."

Early Hearings Expected

The Kennedy program has been introduced in the Senate by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and in the House by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.). Both are chairmen of subcommittees dealing with automation and unemployment problems and are slated to hold early hearings on the new program.

In a statement explaining the Kennedy program, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg declared that to achieve maximum levels of employment, production and purchasing power "it is essential that there be rapid technological progress," but that the short-term effects of automation and technological change "can impair the livelihood of individual displaced workers and can depress the economies of entire communities."

"The remedy," he said, "is not to stay the development of an improved technology. Instead it is to find solutions for the problems which this progress creates for workers."

The new programs, based on existing federal-state employment service and vocational training pro-

First Food Stamp Distribution Made

The first of eight pilot programs set up by the Kennedy Administration to distribute food in areas of widespread and chronic unemployment is in operation in McDowell County, W.Va.

An unemployed miner with 13 children was the first of 13,000 persons in the county certified as eligible to receive the stamps. He was given $95 in stamps to purchase a month's supply of food.

Persons unemployed or receiving some form of public assistance are eligible for the stamps, redeemable at food stores certified by the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture. Only food can be purchased. Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman, who made the first stamp presentation, estimates the government will spend about $50 million through the project in the next fiscal year.

Meany Urges Good Faith In Discrimination Fight

WELCOME TO WHITE HOUSE was given by Pres. Kennedy to Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson (right) and Pres. James A. Suffridge of Retail Clerks on their return from visiting six Asiatic countries. Johnson's party landed at Andrews Air Force Base in Washington and made the trip to the White House by helicopter, seen in background. (See story, Page 6.)

Renews Pledge to Abolish Race Bias

By Robert B. Cooney

Unity House, Pa.—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has proposed that the labor movement and civil rights organizations join in a good-faith common effort in pressing the attack on racial discrimination.

This position was re-enforced by impromptu discussion of delegates to the Jewish Labor Committee's fourth National Trade Union Conference on Civil Rights here. They urged a rebuilding of "lines of communication" between the two movements.

Meany, in a recorded speech to some 200 delegates, noted that "for the last two years there has been growing friction, publicly aggravated, between certain spokesmen for Negro organizations and the AFL-CIO."

"It seems to me," he declared, "that much of this public criticism has been inaccurate, unnecessary and ill-advised."

Saying he was "speaking frankly," because of the long association between the AFL-CIO and civil rights advocates, Meany pointed to two "basic facts:"

- "Much as we deplore it, Negro workers as a group still fit the old pattern of 'last hired, first fired.'" Even where job discrimination has been broken down, "the victory was won recently enough so that Negro workers tend to be concentrated at the lower end of the seniority list."
- "To the extent that Negroes have begun to break out of this pattern of employed poverty and total insecurity the labor movement has played a decisive part."

"Through collective bargaining on the one hand and legislative action on the other, the trade unions have been the most important single

Fair Taxes Asked for Dividends

Failure of the government to require withholding taxes on dividends and interest constitutes "gross discrimination" against wage and salary earners and costs the Treasury taxes on more than $3.8 billion annually, the AFL-CIO has declared.

Testifying in support of Kennedy Administration proposals to extend the withholding tax system to these additional classes of income, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the House Ways & Means Committee that "no one type of income should receive favored treatment denied to the others."

The withholding system, the federation spokesman declared, "operates with ruthless efficiency" in its application to wage and salary earners. "It leaves no room for the forgetful, the neglectful, or those who would deliberately try to avoid payment of taxes," he said. "Uncle Sam receives his due share of wage income almost at the same time that the wages are paid to the worker."

As a result, Biemiller said, 97

May Rate Stays High:

Job Recovery Lags In Spite of Pickup

"There has not been the job recovery we have been looking for," a government manpower expert has announced, despite "a turnaround in the economy" bringing the usual seasonal reduction in unemployment and job boost between April and May.

The summary job report released by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg showed unemployment dropped by 200,000 as expected to a total of 4.8 million as of mid-May.

The key seasonally adjusted unemployment rate edged up to 6.9 percent from April's 6.8 percent.

Seymour Wolfbein, Labor Dept. manpower expert, pointed out the jobless rate has been "hanging high" at this level for the past six months. In comparison, in May a year ago there were 1.3 million fewer jobless workers and a rate of 5.1 percent. The postwar low-point for the month was 2.6 percent in 1953.

In response to questions, Wolfbein told reporters that while "the evidence is pretty good that the economy is turning around"—in terms of production, sales, shipments and related job improvements—"there has not been the job recovery we have been looking for."

Wolfbein said a key indicator—hours of work—will be available when the detailed regular monthly job report is issued June 13. He observed that the general pattern of economic recovery is for an increase in hours of those employed before the jobless are recalled.

The total of long-term unemployed — those out of work 15 weeks or longer—dropped seasonally by 213,000 to 1.9 million. This represents a postwar record high for May and is more than double the total for May a year ago.

The report noted "there con-

AFL-CIO Urges Senate Approval Of House Social Security Changes

Prompt Senate approval of House-passed improvements in social security benefits will help pump additional purchasing power into the economy and ease the impact of the recession, the AFL-CIO has declared.

Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the Federation's Dept. of Social Security told the Senate Finance Committee that the House bill—which fell short of recommendations made by Pres. John F. Kennedy—contains "more limited improvements" than those sought by organized labor.

He declared, however, that these improvements are geared "to the specific and limited needs of a recession period" and would go a long way toward "meeting pressing social needs and providing an urgently needed stimulus to the economy." It is estimated the bill would provide $780 million in added purchasing power in its first year of operation.

At the same time, Cruikshank reiterated labor's call for action at this session of Congress on legislation that would provide health benefits for the aged financed through social security. The fact that the House Ways & Means Committee has scheduled hearings on the Administration-backed Anderson-King bill, he said, brightens the prospects for action this year on "this all-important legislative proposal."

Accompanying Cruikshank in his appearance before the Senate committee were Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller; Mrs. Katherine Ellickson, assistant director of the Dept. of Social Security; and Leonard Lesser, director of social security activities for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Kennedy Hails Anti-Bias Agreement at Lockheed

Lockheed Aircraft Corp. and the federal government have signed an anti-discrimination plan which Pres. John F. Kennedy hailed as "a milestone in the history of civil rights in this country."

The agreement, worked out in cooperation with the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, calls for an end to segregated eating and recreation facilities at all Lockheed plants and provides for greater activity in the recruitment, employment and promotion of members of minority groups.

The document was signed by Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity committee, and Lockheed Pres. Courtlandt Gross in brief ceremonies in Kennedy's office.

The President said that the "voluntary action" by the aircraft firm "is setting a pattern which can open new doors and expanded employment opportunities." He added that "few actions of my Administration have been more significant than the signing of this document."

The agreement with Lockheed constituted the first major anti-discrimination action taken by a firm holding a government contract since Kennedy's Executive Order of Mar. 6, which set up the special committee and armed it with broad powers to end discrimination by either the federal government or its contractors.

Johnson and Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, vice chairman of the President's committee, declared in a joint statement that the "substantial progress" signaled by the agreement with Lockheed "was achieved through study and cooperative action, not through compulsion and threat."

Discrimination Charged

Signing of the agreement — labeled a "program for progress" and covering all nine divisions of Lockheed—came in the wake of complaints filed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which charged discrimination at the company's Marietta, Ga., plant.

Johnson and Goldberg said it is not the committee's policy to make public announcement of complaints filed, but pointed out that the Marietta charges received "widespread publicity," making it necessary to publish the details of the agreement. They cautioned that this will not set any precedent for the future, adding: "We intend to adhere to our policy of seeking results, not publicity."

The agreement pledges that the President's committee will work with State Employment Service offices to "intensify efforts" to obtain applicants for referral to Lockheed on a non-discriminatory basis; will cooperate in promoting the selection of minority group members for Labor Dept.-sponsored apprenticeship training programs; and work with the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare on strengthening minority job counseling and guidance services in school systems.

IUE Bids GM Join in Job Security Hunt

The General Motors Conference Board of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers has voted to invite company representatives to join union negotiators in seeking solutions to the job security problems of 25,000 GM electrical division workers.

Pointing out that the number of employes in the division has dropped 25 percent in the past 12 months, the 27-member committee voted not to submit the usual set of union contract demands but to suggest joint union-management discussions of worker problems in eight general areas.

The Auto Workers at a recent convention in Detroit decided on a similar apporach.

E. J. Kraft, chairman of the IUE's GM Conference Board, said the union will suggest that GM meet the problem of declining jobs in these two ways:

- Establishing a fund during prosperous periods which could be used during recessions to provide a full week's pay for a reduced workweek.
- Placing production and maintenance employes on salary like white collar workers.

Improvements in the company insurance, health care and pension programs are among the principal IUE aims. Others include a ban on the subcontracting of work that can be done by those in the IUE bargaining unit; continuation of the annual improvement factor and cost-of-living adjustments; and protection against speedups and discrimination.

Full Cooperation Pledged:

Kennedy Names Committee On Missile Site Operations

Pres. John F. Kennedy has issued an Executive Order establishing an 11-member Missile Sites Labor Commission in a move designed to insure "uninterrupted and economical operations" of the nation's $3 billion space program.

In announcing the creation of the tripartite commission, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg also reported that manufacturers, construction firms and unions had given the Administration no-strike, no-lockout pledges to speed construction of missile launching sites.

Goldberg made public the text of a letter from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who expressed "full agreement with the purpose and general terms" of the President's order, and who pledged "without reservation" the full cooperation of the federation and its affected affiliated departments and member international unions.

Similar pledges, the Secretary said, were given by Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and Pres. C. J. (Neil) Haggerty of the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Commission's Powers

The commission set up by the Executive Order is empowered to:

- Establish local committees at missile and space sites to "anticipate" and dispose of labor problems, including jurisdictional disputes.
- Work out procedures for handling problems which cannot be resolved by local committees.
- Set up panels to hold hearings in disputes and to issue directives "to insure uninterrupted and economical work" at missile and space sites.

Kennedy designated Goldberg to serve as chairman of the commission, with Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service Dir. William E. Simkin as vice chairman.

Labor members of the commission are Meany, Reuther and Haggerty. Public members include David L. Cole, former president of the National Academy of Arbitrators; Arbitrator David H. Stowe; and Prof. John T. Dunlop of Harvard University. Representing management will be Pres. Edgar F. Kaiser of Kaiser Industries, Inc.; Vice Pres. Douglas Dorman of the Martin Co.; and Executive Dir. James D. Marshall of the Associated General Contractors of America.

Designated as executive secretary was Julian Kuczma, who was granted leave from his post as labor relations advisor to the Navy Dept. to take the special assignment.

Goldberg expressed a "deep sense of gratification" at the agreement and declared that both management and labor were demonstrating that they can "respond to the responsibility of observing the national interest without the compulsion of law."

May Jobless Rate High Despite 'Turn-Around'

tinued to be 900,000 among the long-term unemployed who had been without jobs for more than half a year."

Employment Up 1 Million

Total employment climbed by 1 million to 66.8 million in May, the report added. Half the gain took place in agriculture. The total, however, was still 400,000 below a year ago, the report said.

Wolfbein forecast a jump in unemployment in the early summer as students leave school seeking permanent jobs or summer work.

A companion report showed that the spring pickup brought improvements in a few of the nation's 150 major labor market areas. Two-thirds of the big cities had been classified as experiencing "substantial unemployment"—6 percent or more jobless—in March and April.

For May, five areas were removed from this list, dropping the total from the 101 of March and April to 96. Five other areas were reclassified to categories of less severe unemployment.

The five areas shifted from "substantial unemployment" to "moderate unemployment" were San Francisco-Oakland, Calif., New Haven, Conn., Fort Wayne and Indianapolis, Ind. and the Steubenville-Weirton area in Ohio and West Virginia.

Areas of Improvement

These were the areas with heavy unemployment which showed improvement; two steel centers—Lorain-Elyria and Youngstown-Warren, O.—the auto center of Flint, Mich., and the heavy metalworking area of Erie, Pa., — were moved from the group with unemployment of 12 percent or more to the group with unemployment of 9 to 11.9 percent. The Utica-Rome, N. Y., area was shifted from the 9 to 11.9 percent group to the 6 to 8.9 percent classification.

The number of "smaller areas of substantial unemployment" increased to 215 in May from the 199 of April and the 184 of March. In May a year ago there were 113 such areas.

The Labor Dept. report said that additions to the list of smaller areas are based partly on the extent to which they are called to the government's attention for special surveys and do not reflect a local job worsening.

The report said that local public employment offices expect difficulty in dealing with the influx of young jobseekers when schools close since they will be competing with "a sizable pool of older, experienced, unemployed workers."

Oregon Court Upholds ABC Unit on Funds

Portland, Ore.—The Oregon Supreme Court has held that a local union which voted to transfer its affiliation to the AFL-CIO American Bakery & Confectionery Workers does not have to surrender its treasury to the expelled Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

By a 5-to-2 vote, the state's highest court reversed a circuit judge's decision and ruled that the $30,000 treasury be yielded to ABC Local 364. The Bakery & Confectionery Workers, expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957, had claimed the money on the basis of a constitutional provision that local unions forfeit all funds to the international union if they disaffiliate.

The Oregon Supreme Court held that affiliation is a two-way bargain and the expelled union broke its share of the bargain when it lost its AFL-CIO affiliation on findings of corrupt domination.

Using the same reasoning as state courts in New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, New Jersey and California, the Oregon court held that the loss of AFL-CIO affiliation relieved the local union of complying with the forfeiture clause of the B&C constitution.

The 850 members of Local 364 voted to switch affiliation in May 1959. While the union's funds were tied up in the court case, the ABC lent money necessary for the local to carry on its activities.

Clerks Back Upholding Of Sunday Closing Laws

The Supreme Court's decisions upholding the constitutionality of state laws prohibiting commercial activity on Sundays have been hailed by the Retail Clerks as upholding "an integral part" of the nation's social legislation.

RCIA Pres. James A. Suffridge said the union was "gratified" by the rulings, pointing out that "for the better part of this century the RCIA constitution has supported Sunday as a day of rest." The union had filed a brief with the Supreme Court asking that it uphold the Sunday closing laws.

The court's decisions came in four cases involving laws in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and Maryland. By an 8-to-1 majority it rejected the argument that the Sunday closing laws were invalid because they ran afoul of the First Amendment to the Constitution prohibiting establishment of religion.

By a 6-to-3 vote the court rejected the argument that the Sunday laws interfered with the free exercise of religion by groups whose religion requires them to rest on another day of the week than Sunday.

Justice William O. Douglas dissented in all cases, contending the Sunday laws were invalid as an establishment of religion. Justices William J. Brennan, Jr., and Potter Stewart thought the state laws could not be constitutionally applied to those groups that marked another day than Sunday. Chief Justice Earl Warren wrote the majority decisions.

Warren said in his opinions that the court was not now upholding any conceivable Sunday law if the state law had the clear purpose of using the state's power to aid religion. This would be unconstitutional, he said.

As presently written and administered, Warren added, state Sunday laws "are a secular rather than of a religious character."

All states except Alaska have laws prohibiting some activities on Sunday and 34 have statutes broadly prohibiting all commercial labor. Of these 21 states provide limited exemption for religious groups which celebrate another day as the Sabbath.

For Pilots, Flight Engineers:

Commission Advises Air Dispute Merger

By David L. Perlman

A presidential commission has recommended a merger between the Flight Engineers and the Air Line Pilots, and has offered its services to help bring it about.

The commission, headed by Prof. Nathan Feinsinger, said its "considered opinion" was that "neither peace nor safety on the airlines will be fully assured as long as there are two unions in the cockpit."

It emphasized that the job security and employment rights of members of the Flight Engineers should be protected, both through the terms of any merger agreement between the two unions and through collective bargaining agreements with the airlines.

As a starting step, the commission urged that the two organizations establish a Joint Committee on Inter-Union Cooperation on each airline.

It proposed a gradual transition to a three-man flight crew on the four airlines which through contracts with the two unions employ three pilots and one flight engineer on jet planes. These are American, Eastern, Pan American and Trans World.

The commission said the airlines which agreed to four-man jet crews to satisfy conflicting demands of the Pilots and Flight Engineers were at a competitive disadvantage with other airlines which operate jets with three-man crews. The third member of a jet flight crew, the commission said, should have both flight engineer and pilot training.

Would Keep Jobs

Flight engineers on jet equipment would retain their jobs even if they don't qualify as pilots under the commission's recommendations. In addition, the commission said the airlines "should have the obligation to provide . . . job protection or pay protection" for employes whose job opportunities would be impaired by the transition from propeller-type to jets.

Pres. Kennedy called on the airlines involved and the two unions "to negotiate a final settlement of their differences" on the basis of the commission's recommendations.

"They must in the light of overriding public interest resolve their differences at the bargaining table . . . we cannot have further strikes over these disputed issues," he said.

The President also gave his endorsement to a separate emergency board recommendation for settlement of a dispute between Northwest Airlines and its flight engineers, who are members of the Machinists.

Northwest, which had originally used four-man jet crews, switched to three-man, all-pilot crews after IAM flight engineeers refused to fly jets until agreement had been reached on pay scales. Thereupon the IAM withdrew its flight engineers from all of the company's aircraft, grounding most flights.

The emergency board's recommendations coupled a pay raise for all flight engineers with establishment of a three-man jet flight crew with the company to provide pilot training for flight engineers.

The Feinsinger commission, in recommending a merger, pointed out that its proposal paralleled the findings of an AFL-CIO Executive Council committee in 1958. The committee, while recommending that the Pilots "refrain from attempting to enlist flight engineers as ALPA members," said it "can find no trade union reason why the merger of these two organizations should not become a reality."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council approved the recommendation and Pres. George Meany said at the time that his office "stands ready to assist" the two unions in resolving their differences.

It was an issue of representation which led to a walkout by members of the Flight Engineers on seven airlines in February and to the subsequent establishment of the Feinsinger commission.

A committee appointed by the National Mediation Board—which supervises labor-management relations on the airlines under the Railway Labor Act—had held that all United Air Lines flight deck personnel should be represented by a single union and granted a petition by the Pilots for a representation election.

Seven Lines Struck

Although the Flight Engineers at United—who also have pilot training—remained on the job, members of the Flight Engineers struck seven other carriers—Pan American, American, Trans World, Eastern, National, Flying Tiger and Western Air Lines.

Under an agreement worked out by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, the Flight Engineers returned to work on six of the airlines, were not disciplined for their walkout, the status quo was maintained under existing bargaining agreements, and the Pilots agreed not to press demands relating to cockpit assignments or jurisdiction.

Western refused to reinstate its flight engineers and declared it had permanently replaced them with pilots holding flight engineer certificates.

The Feinsinger commission, pointing out that the other six airlines "considered it in the national interest to comply with the request of the Secretary of Labor to take no disciplinary action against their striking employes," suggested appointment of "a neutral person or persons authorized to make recommendations after hearing both sides.

The representation election on United Air Lines, tabulated after the presidential commission had made its report, resulted in the expected victory for the Pilots. With 2,143 eligible to vote, they received 1,682 to 58 votes for the Flight Engineers. Forty-nine ballots were voided or cast for other groups.

TWUA Ends Long Strike At Henderson

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America has announced the official end of its 30-month strike against the Harriet-Henderson Cotton Mills, Henderson, N. C., effective June 1.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said the decision to end the struggle was endorsed by the union's 22-member executive council at its quarterly meeting here.

He said that financial assistance, currently being paid some 300 of the original 1,040 striking members of Locals 578 and 584 who are still without employment, would be continued until July 1.

Since the start of the strike on Nov. 17, 1958, Pollock said, the TWUA strike fund—augmented by contributions from other labor organizations and the public—has paid out more than $1.25 million in assistance.

The decision to end the strike, the TWUA president said, was made in the hope that it might be "helpful in procuring the release from prison" of seven officers and rank-and-file members serving long sentences for alleged participation in a dynamiting conspiracy.

He said it might also "bring an end to the blacklist which has been posted by many employers."

IBEW Wins Retraining For Automation Victims

Bellingham, Wash.—A retraining program for radio station employes displaced by the introduction of automated equipment manufactured by Intl. Good Music, Inc., has been established under an agreement between the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the company.

The agreement—first of its kind in the broadcast industry—pioneers a new principle in meeting the impact of technology. Negotiated by the union representing IGM's production employes, the program is intended, the IBEW says, to aid workers of any category at any of the nation's 35,000 radio stations who may be displaced by station purchase of Intl. Good Music equipment.

In Washington, Deputy Assistant Labor Sec. Seymour Wolfbein, head of the newly created Office of Automation & Manpower, called the agreement a "good step forward along the road" the nation should travel in meeting the effects of technological improvements.

The re-education fund is based on company contributions of 5 percent from sales of equipment and program services. When augmented by federal funds available for retraining under several existing national programs, the fund will exceed $500,000.

The agreement calls for payments for tuition and fees at established schools so that displaced radio station personnel will be able to learn new skills either in the broadcast industry or in other fields.

The proposals by the Kennedy Administration for creation of a new manpower development and training program could, if passed by Congress, provide a supplement for the IBEW-negotiated program by giving the displaced broadcast employes subsistence allowances.

The IGM-IBEW agreement stated as a principle the belief that "automation will create more income and wages than it destroys, while creating new channels of employment and destroying old ones." The purpose of the fund, it added, is to "lessen the shock to those employes displaced by automation."

The fund will be controlled by a single trustee, having no connection with either the union or the company.

The contract states that displaced employes qualifying for benefits will receive the cost of educational training or retraining, paid directly to the schools. The specific type of training provided each individual would be determined by the results of aptitude tests given by the U.S. Employment Service.

Commenting on the agreement, IGM Pres. Rogan Jones declared:

"Re-education of employes displaced by automation is really a form of profit-sharing. Having practiced this in my own business for a number of years, I very much believe that this is a step in the same direction. Good management never finds that good wages are a bar to profitable operations. We hope this will have the same effect."

IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman asserted:

"We do not feel that the worker should bear the full impact of automation. We think that management and society, which stand to benefit from technological change, have responsibility to the worker directly affected. The substitution of machine skill for human skill must not result in reduced living standards for a large number of workers, even over the short run."

Withholding Supported On Dividends, Interest

percent of all wage and salary income is reported on income tax returns and the remainder, composed largely of wages for domestic servants and farm laborers with low incomes, would not yield much tax revenue.

By contrast, he said, Treasury Sec. Douglas Dillon recently told the committee that 9 percent of all dividends and 35 percent of all interest—totaling $3.8 billion a year—goes unreported.

. . Spokesmen for the insurance and investment industries told the committee that the proposed 20 percent withholding tax on dividends and interest would cause confusion both for the public and the companies.

Biemiller said that corporations opposing a withholding system on dividends and interest contend they would be forced to bear a heavy administrative burden. He pointed out that the Treasury Dept. has worked out a simple system that would eliminate maintenance of separate records for each individual, with the result that the system would be less burdensome than withholding income taxes on wages.

In addition, he said, there is little validity to the argument that low-income recipients of interest and dividend payments would be "forced to undergo personal hardship" while awaiting refunds from the Treasury for payments which were not actually taxable.

A great many taxpayers find that they are entitled to refunds, he pointed out, and relatively few would be added by a withholding system on dividends.

In 1958, he said 59 million individual income tax returns were filed, of which 37 million involved overpayments on which refunds were due.

IUD Gives CORE $5,000 To Aid 'Riders'

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has given $5,000 to the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) to help defray expenses growing out of the Freedom Riders' project.

The gift was sent "as an expression of our solidarity with CORE and our support of its work in the field of civil rights," IUD Pres. Walter P. Reuther and Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey said in an accompanying letter to James Farmer, CORE national director.

In arresting Farmer and other Freedom Riders at Jackson, they said, "the Governor of Mississippi has placed state law above the U.S. constitution."

"This check is one way," they wrote, "in which we salute the courage, humanity and dignity of the Freedom Riders. The nonviolent stand of these students before a howling mob inspired by bigots will go down in history as a turning point in the struggle for full civil rights in America."

Reuther and Carey said some Alabama officials "encouraged . . . elements motivated by hate and have provided more propaganda fodder for the Communists."

6.9 Percent Jobless

THE MERRY, MERRY MONTH of May was a grey, grim month for the 4.8 million unemployed who queued up for jobless benefits or public assistance.

Most of those 4.8 million were located in 96 major job areas and 215 smaller ones—the depressed areas where unemployment runs to at least 6 percent of the labor force.

In contrast to the other economic indicators, which showed an upswing from the bottom of the 1960-61 recession, the May unemployment figures disclosed that for the sixth straight month the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment remained practically unchanged. Since December 1960 the rate has been static between 6.5 and 6.9 percent.

The impact of unemployment can be seen quickly by a glance at the basic figures of 12 months ago. There were 3.4 million unemployed, contrasted to 4.8 this May; the jobless rate was 5.1 percent compared to 6.9; the number of major job areas with 6 percent or more unemployed was 35 compared to 96 this May.

The increase in economic activity this spring is not absorbing the unemployed. Last month among those listed as employed were 2.8 million workers on a part-time basis. If former patterns persist, these workers will be moved up to a full workweek before the totally unemployed are rehired.

The job outlook for the rest of 1961 is bleak. The most joyful of the recession-is-over school of economists agree that the unemployment rate will yield little, if at all, by the end of the year. AFL-CIO economists forecast a year-end jobless rate of between 6.3 and 7 percent unless some action is taken quickly to spur the level of economic activity.

The quickest way of spurring sales, production and job opportunities would be a temporary three-month individual income tax cut to add $5 billion to spending power. This should be augmented by a $1 billion federal program of grants to step up short-range public works programs. Lowering of long-term interest rates and a stronger housing program all could be helpful this year.

The unemployment rate contains the seeds of a new recession if it is allowed to remain at the present high level into the winter of 1961-62.

A Vital Necessity

THE SAME forces responsible for the passage of the Landrum-Griffin Act, which vests in the Secretary of Labor investigative and civil suit powers and sets up stiff criminal penalties, are now strongly opposed to giving the Secretary these same powers and setting up the same penalties on reporting the finances and operations of employe welfare and pension plans.

This opposition comes in the face of a long record of welfare and pension plan abuses that led to the 1958 law. The trouble is that the 1958 law makes no provision for effectively policing the welfare and pension area to determine whether or not these abuses are continuing.

The estimated $46 billion in these plans represent deferred wages or benefits due millions of workers. In the great majority of cases their operations and finances are controlled solely by management.

The Kennedy Administration has proposed—and the AFL-CIO has strongly supported—a series of amendments to provide for detailed disclosure of the operation of the welfare and pension plans. These are a vital necessity if the interests of millions of workers who have struggled in collective bargaining and on the picket line to establish these benefits are to be adequately protected.

Background Analysis:

Pressures, Restraints on Press Interfere With Flow of Ideas

The following is excerpted from the "Briefing Session" program on "Mass Media in the U.S." and was presented by news analyst John MacVane in the background briefing portion of the television program co-produced by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

WHEN THE CONSTITUTION was drawn up in 1787 there were only 100 newspapers in the country—just two of them dailies—and the average circulation was about 1,000. There were no papers read outside their local communities; no magazines. The principal means of communication actually was the town meeting, where any man could get up and have his say.

Any man could be an editor simply by getting together a few sticks of type and a handpress and going to it. Many did, and their opinions were colorful and forthright.

The reason there were not more newspapers was that there were not many readers. Three-quarters of the colonists could not read much more than their own names.

But as literacy grew in this country, so did the press. Today, U.S. newspaper circulation is at a new all-time peak of 59 million daily. The nation's magazines have a circulation approaching half a billion.

Booksellers last year turned out a record 15,000 titles—70 percent of them non-fiction. And then there is the electronic counterpart of the press—television and radio.

Although broadcasting stations must be licensed by the government to use a public utility—the air—the information business enjoys a minimum of government interference.

But there are honest critics who see pressures and restraints that interfere with the free flow of news and ideas. Let us look at some of the dangers.

FIRST, THERE IS MONOPOLY. As our newspapers became bigger, they bought up smaller papers which could not stand the competitive battle. Rival giants merged to insure continued profits for stockholders. Today, 95 percent of American cities have only one paper; or, if there is more than one, they are owned by the same men, generally of conservative leanings.

But repeatedly, political events raise a question as to just how significant this monopoly control really is.

In 1948, Gov. Thomas E. Dewey of New York, supported by nearly 80 percent of the nation's newspapers, was trounced in the presidential race by Pres. Harry S. Truman, running as the underdog.

Television and radio, too, have come under attack for a concentration of power. There are only three national networks in television, four in radio. One of these came into existence only after a government anti-trust action forced one company to give up one of its two networks. Some critics feel that these networks do not provide an adequate variety and conflict of opinion.

We have come a long way since that day in 1897 when publisher William Randolph Hearst got a cable from his ace newspaper artist, William Remington, in Cuba: "Everything is quiet. There is no trouble here. There will be no war. I wish to return." And Hearst cabled back the cynical instructions: "Please remain. You furnish the pictures, I'll furnish the war." Hearst did his best. His New York Journal ran headlines of the sinking of the Maine in February 1898. And they were the first banner headlines ever used in journalistic history.

Yet recently in the New York Times, a Ford Foundation consultant—David Heaps—who had spent much time in the Congo during the past troubled year, complained that: "Accounts of mob scenes and mayhem, almost inevitably proving later to be inflated or fictitious, characterized much of the reporting of events in that country; reports generally have distorted out of all proportion the deplorable events which did occur."

As one social critic, Eric Larrabee, says in his book, The Self-Conscious Society: "It has often been said that ways of crime and juvenile delinquency are the invention of newspapers, but this is equally applicable to great international crises."

FINALLY, THERE IS the influence of the reader, listener, viewer. Editors and producers, who need his patronage, often assume him to be stupid or uninterested, and this provides some excuse for bad taste, sensationalism, for sloppy reporting or writing. And there is the haunting question: "Is anyone really listening?"

The Minneapolis Star & Tribune made a poll of citizens in its circulation area just as the Eichmann trial with its attendant flood of publicity was starting in Israel. They found that half of those questioned literally did not know who Adolph Eichmann was.

As one great newsman, the late Ray Clapper, once said: "Never underestimate the intelligence of the public or overestimate its information."

Morgan Says:

AMA Members Farther Apart Than Propaganda Indicates

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

NOT LONG AGO this department irreverently suggested that the American Medical Association's violent opposition to the Kennedy Administration's old age medical care program and related liberal legislation might not be just what AMA doctor-members ordered. There was some interesting reaction, headed by a letter from a senior at Western Reserve University's Medical School in Cleveland, Arthur S. Blank, Jr. Perhaps it should be pointed out that because of a nine-year-old curricular revolution in which students from the start are exposed to the practical application of medicine, Western Reserve is considered, in some quarters, radical.

Morgan

Blank said some students and faculty watched with amazement "the frantic effort of the AMA to defeat social security health insurance" because "it seems apparent that Mr. Kennedy has outlined a scheme which would further the establishment of medical care as a public responsibility, and thereby (further) the cause of comprehensive, preventive medicine—the shining ideal which medical schools in the Sixties are teaching their students. . . ."

"The AMA's crusade," the Western Reserve medical student continued, "is, of course, consistent with its record of irrational opposition to progressive legislation. How this record of obstruction can grow out of the climate of scientific medicine is something of a puzzle. I suspect that in part, the explanation may lie . . . in the political distance between the AMA's national staff and the large mass (175,000) of its members. This has enabled the officers to speak as the unified voice of the medical profession, irrespective of the size (or existence) of a majority opinion in the profession on a particular matter.

"An excellent example of this point is the other current issue of social security for physicians themselves. Although the AMA has vigorously lobbied for several years against all attempts to bring doctors into social security, the most recent poll on the issue conducted by the magazine Medical Economics revealed that (by projection) 50 percent of the nation's doctors are for compulsory social security for themselves, 47 percent against and 3 percent undecided."

MORE SPECIFICALLY, Medical Economics' findings, published in the Apr. 24 issue, showed a majority of doctors polled in favor of social security in 18 states, against in nine. These findings, as the editors suggest, would certainly seem a powerful justification for a referendum on the AMA stand. AMA sources in Washington think it "rather unlikely" that any will be taken.

Actually, professional opposition to the AMA opposition is more impressive than the public at first may be able to see through the smokescreen of AMA propaganda. A prestigious swath of organizations, publications and individuals, ranging from the 1960 Governors' Conference to Business Week, from Life Magazine to Dr. Spock, has endorsed old age medical care through the social security system.

It may well be that it required more devotion and courage for the American Nurses Association to take this stand than for any other group. It is not a position calculated to endear the nurses to the medical hierarchy. Indeed, since doctors are usually by far the most dominant voice in most hospital administrations, the nurses risked unhappy consequences. And they are not leading from a position of economic strength. The nursing profession is the fifth largest in the country—probably the lowest paid, with the average general duty nurse with three years of higher education making about $3600 a year, measurably below the $3900 average for stenographers.

The nurses' official position seems all the more courageous against the fact that the AMA at a "secret" strategy meeting in Chicago earlier this year decided, as one grass roots approach in opposition to the Kennedy program, to pressure local nursing groups to repudiate the stand of their association.

Help to the ANA in its battle with the AMA is on the way. Young Blank and 14 other Western Reserve seniors, all of whom will be able to add "M.D." to their names in June, recently wrote the Washington Post and the New York Times in bold support of Kennedy Administration health legislation. Slowly the old order changeth—an important point for the public to keep high in mind even if the AMA hierarchy refuses to.

Washington Reports:

Conservation Corps Program Proposed for Jobless Youth

A YOUTH CONSERVATION Corps program can be a major means of providing constructive employment for jobless youth and at the same time help conserve the nation's natural resources, Rep. John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.) asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 460 radio stations.

Rep. John V. Lindsay (R-N. Y.) said on the same program that he is interested in the measure, but urged that such a program could be handled better by the states. He said that New York's Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R) has undertaken to set up camps for youths, and asserted the program was a major means of keeping young men busy and preventing juvenile delinquency.

Blatnik stressed the need for immediate action since 5 million are now jobless, with young people among the groups most seriously affected. Some 5 million college and high school students will be seeking permanent or summer-job work by July.

Blatnik is sponsor of a bill in the House, (with Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) as sponsor in the Senate), to set up an organization similar to the Civilian Conservation Corps of the 1930's. Blatnik was a CCC director.

AS MANY AS 150,000 youths between 16 and 22 could get jobs in the YCC. They would be paid $80 a month if they are able to live at home, or $60 a month plus board, clothes, medical care and transportation if they cannot live at home.

Lindsay, stressing problems in large cities like New York, said he was concerned with priorities. He believed that trained social workers and psychiatrists are more urgently needed.

Blatnik replied that a program like the YCC could help prevent juvenile delinquency.

"Many of these young people have not finished high school," he said. "Some have started advanced education, but have not been able to complete it. They are not trained for any particular job, nor have they had opportunities to learn skills, or get experience on the job and the seniority that goes with it. Dr. Conant, former president of Harvard, claims that this situation is one of the most explosive in America today."

Lindsay pointed out that some young people will be able to find jobs in the projected Peace Corps, for which they would be fitted by training in languages and skills. It will provide "an exciting opportunity for certain young people," he said, and at the same time make a valuable contribution to U.S. foreign policy.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE WOODS ARE FULL of stories interpreting the Texas special senatorial election that sent conservative Republican John C. Tower to the Senate and equally conservative Sen. William A. Blakley, a nominal Democrat, into political discard. No one seems to have wondered why Blakley—a kind of millionaire caricature of a Texas conservative Democrat—ever got to the Senate at all.

He got there by appointment of Democratic Gov. Price Daniel, who named him to succeed Lyndon B. Johnson when Johnson resigned in January to become Vice President. It was the second time Gov. Daniel had given Blakley the great favor of choosing him for an interim term in the Senate. The first time Blakley decently announced in advance that he would retire promptly, and he did, and Sen. Ralph Yarborough replaced him. It was a mistake for Daniel to give Blakley a second go-round, because ambition had risen in the temporary senator, as it does in nearly all men.

Texas is in the turmoil of becoming a two-party state, and the way the Republicans play it is to thrust forward their most articulate conservative spokesman—to wit, in this case, John C. Tower. Under the peculiarities of Texas voting law, everybody and his grandnephew can run without hindrance in a special election, and Texas liberals split badly between various Democratic major candidates. Blakley and Tower, two peas in a pod, ended a preliminary election as the topmost candidates, entitled to face each other in the May 27 runoff, and Tower won.

BLAKLEY LISTENED to the wrong advice for his contest with Tower. He announced just before the runoff election that he had sold his controlling stock in an airline to be a "fulltime senator," but he would not agree to say a kind word for Pres. Kennedy's farm program, an issue of some importance to rural voters who were long the center of the Texas Democratic Party system.

He alienated himself also from Texas voters who believe in the national domestic program of the Kennedy Administration by voting against long-belated school aid proposals and similar measures.

The handicaps were fatal. Voting Democratic in Texas is no longer, obviously, an article of faith for all citizens. If the election system and Gov. Daniel arrange things so that the only choice is between Tower and an equally conservative Democrat, the party label is no longer a guarantee of victory.

If Gov. Daniel had picked a Democrat closer to Texas liberal elements as Johnson's successor, things might have turned out differently. Republicans are now talking of the possibility that their whole party base in the state will expand—and they may well be right, since a good many conservative Democrats including former Gov. Allan Shivers have been supporting Republican presidential candidates for years.

WHEN THE FOREIGN AID BILL reaches the Senate floor, the spurious issue of so-called "backdoor" spending is likely to be raised on Pres. Kennedy's proposal for five-year loan authority to finance long-range economic projects abroad. A year ago Chairman J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.) of the Foreign Relations Committee had to drop his proposed five-year authorization for development loans because Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) threatened that the mutual security bill would be killed or delayed.

The phrase "backdoor" spending is used by opponents to describe the financing of programs duly authorized by Congress through Treasury borrowing.

There is nothing new or sinister in long-term Treasury financing in place of yearly appropriation bills for programs that inherently require more than a single year to plan and execute. The original authorization of such financing came when the Reconstruction Finance Corp. was created during the Hoover Administration to bail out business firms and banks caught in the fiscal and economic mess of the early Thirties.

JOBLESS YOUTH may find fruitful occupation in the Peace Corps and the proposed Youth Conservation Corps, according to Rep. John V. Lindsay (R-N. Y.), left, and Rep. John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.), who appeared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

THE STRENGTH of America's military defense and the people's understanding of the needs were discussed by Rep. Gerald R. Ford, Jr. (R-Mich.), left, and Harvard Prof. J. Sterling Livingston, guest panelists on "Briefing Session."

'Briefing' Panel Differs On Morale of People

Are the American people prepared to fight for their country? Guest panelists Rep. Gerald R. Ford, Jr. (R-Mich.), and Prof. J. Sterling Livingston of the Harvard School of Business Administration expressed differing views on this question during a discussion on "Briefing Session," the public affairs television program co-produced by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

Said Livingston: "I have some strong feelings that we may be slipping" in the area of psychological readiness to fight, if necessary, to defend our system.

But Ford said "my constituents, if I read my mail right, are ready to go and they are probably further ahead in this regard than the people here in Washington."

Ford is a member of the House Military Affairs Committee and Livingston has conducted a number of research and training programs for the military services and defense contractors during the past 15 years.

The over-all posture of America's national defense was the subject of this latest program in the series. Both panelists agreed that the country's will to fight is the essential fuel for the military machine.

"Our military people can give us the leadership," said Ford, "if we get the backing from the people at home."

Livingston called 1962 the year of greatest danger and added he thought it "very important that we steel ourselves in terms of our will to fight, our willingness to use nuclear weapons, if necessary, and hence be prepared for all-out military action."

Livingston contended that the Soviet objective is to undermine the free world's determination to fight for its principles.

Ford took issue with one recommendation in Kennedy's message to Congress on defense. He objected to any cutback in Titan-2 missile program.

"It is our longest-range, biggest payload, most flexible ICBM," he said.

Both of the "Briefing Session" panelists agreed that the present increased emphasis on so-called "paramilitary" or guerilla warfare was needed. Ford added a proviso that before troops are committed in this way it must be verified that the potential ally really has desire to preserve his own country.

Ford and Livingston hold divergent views on civil defense. Livingston called an increase in our civil defense program "vital." Ford argued that the large sum of money needed to build shelters would be better spent on the nation's offensive weapons.

Panel Plans Discussion of Farm Plight

The problems of American agriculture and programs to solve them will be discussed in the next edition of "Briefing Session."

Marvin L. McLain, assistant legislative director of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and Wesley McCune, public relations director of the National Farmer's Union will join Moderator Edward P. Morgan.

McLain worked in the Dept. of Agriculture as supervisor of the Commodity Credit Corporation and from 1956 to 1960 served as Assistant Secretary. For many years he operated a livestock farm in Iowa.

McCune also served in the Agriculture Dept. as executive assistant to Sec. Charles Brannan from the latter's appointment in 1948 until 1953. During his career he has worked as a correspondent for Newsweek, Time and Life magazines. He is the author of several books on farm policy.

Suffridge Recounts Johnson Trip:

Aid Sought from U.S. Labor To Help Asians Build Unions

By Gervase N. Love

Asian union leaders want from American labor the kind of help that will aid them in building effective union movements in their own countries, Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks discovered on a six-nation good-will tour as labor adviser to Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson.

"In general, they recognize their problems and are searching for the answers," he said on his return to Washington from a grueling trip that covered the Philippines, Formosa, Vietnam, Thailand, India and Pakistan and included stops in several other countries.

"They often asked for, and would appreciate, assistance from the U.S. labor movement—not financial assistance, but help in other ways.

"They cited the technical aid the U.S. government through its different programs has given to practically everybody but labor, and they asked for people from the unions—not the government—to help them set up union administration and to help them learn more about collective bargaining and other such down-to-earth things generally.

"The kind of help they need is the kind that the U.S.-type business agent could give—practical help, from someone not on a good-will tour but who will live with them and spend some time among them and show them how a trade union can grow and can help in the development of labor codes and other social legislation without being engulfed by a political party."

Suffridge, an AFL-CIO vice president, said he was touched and impressed by the warmth of the greetings given the Vice President and his party. At most stops they were bedecked with garlands of flowers, he said, and in the Philippines were welcomed at one place by a brass band.

"We saw no evidence anywhere of any kind of unfriendly gesture toward the Vice President, toward the rest of us or toward the United States," he said. "The attitude of the union people to me as a U.S. labor representative and to the U.S. as a nation was extremely friendly."

Suffridge met with national and local labor leaders in each country, and often with the minister of labor. He talked with management representatives also, and visited many plants and factories.

The people in the Philippines, Suffridge said, feel close to this country because of the long relationship and usually spoke more openly than those in other nations, "but in a friendly, constructive way."

They would like to see the U.S. give the kind of aid that would result in continuing employment and building up the economy, he said, instead of merely building roads or installing water pumps.

"They say that type of project gives employment only while it is being built," he explained. "The road may wash out, they say, but the economy won't let them repair it; the pump may wear out and they can't replace it. What they want is continuing jobs of producing things so they can develop economically and be able to repair washed-out roads or replace worn-out pumps."

Suffridge said he found no overt opposition to trade unionism in any of the countries he visited. Even in Thailand, where unions are outlawed, the minister of labor assured him that a "satisfactory" labor code will be prepared for implementation when the new constitution is adopted.

He observed that "many needs" must be met before the countries he visited can make any economic progress. Labor laws or codes must be liberalized and something like the fair labor standards of the U.S. must be developed, he said; land reform is imperative, and so is health education, and there is a widespread need for a basic "primer-type" of education.

"If communism is to be defeated in Asia, or even contained, certain of these reforms will have to be made, and soon, in order to insulate the people against Communist activities," he said.

"The people are not very curious, on the worker or tenant farmer level, as to the relative merits of the ideologies of democracy and communism. But they are susceptible to Communist promises of land reform and of other ways to fill their empty stomachs.

"They have to be given hope so they'll have reason to feel they belong, they have to have something to live for and to die for if they are to defend the western concepts of freedom."

Appeals Court Upholds Reinstatement for 23

Chicago—A National Labor Relations Board order finding the Butcher Boy Refrigerator Door Co. guilty of unfair labor practices has been upheld unanimously by the U.S. Court of Appeals here.

The court ordered the company to reinstate Kenneth Hall, a union leader who was fired, and to rehire 22 other strikers with back pay. It further ordered the company to bargain collectively in good faith with Carpenters Local 2674.

Since 1954, when Butcher Boy moved its plant from Chicago to Harvard, Ill., its relations with organized labor have been a cause celebre.

After an unsuccessful attempt to organize in 1955, the employes obtained a charter from the Carpenters in 1957 and set a date for negotiations on Feb. 26, 1958.

When negotiators arrived for the conference, they found Hall, president of the local, had been fired by George Slopa, president of Butcher Boy.

During the organizing period, Slopa had promulgated a new rule prohibiting smoking in the plant. When employes began going to the locker room for smokes, he ordered locks installed. Hall objected to the loss of smoking privileges and was fired in a heated argument.

When Butcher Boy refused to reinstate Hall, his fellow employes voted unanimously to strike. After a strike from Feb. 27 to Mar. 10, they returned pending further negotiations, but struck again from Aug. 4 to Dec. 18.

On Dec. 18, after walking the picket line for four months, a large group offered through W. E. Corbin, president of the Carpenters' district council, to return to work unconditionally. Slopa, who had hired replacements, refused reinstatement.

The union then pressed charges before the NLRB, which found the company had refused to bargain in good faith, had fired Hall for union activity, had refused illegally to reinstate the strikers and had committed other unfair practices.

The company took the case to the Court of Appeals, arguing, among other things, that the strike was an economic walkout rather than an unfair labor practices strike.

"The dilatory tactics, 45-day no-strike pledge sought to be imposed as a prerequisite to contract negotiations, failure to furnish wage and classification data requested, and unilateral granting of a wage increase during negotiations all support the board's finding of failure to bargain in good faith," the court ruled.

High Court Clarifies Gate Picketing Dispute

The Supreme Court has ruled that union picketing of a plant gate reserved for use by outside contractors doing work in the plant is in violation of the boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act unless the contracted work is "unconnected to the normal operations of the struck employer."

The court's decision upheld in this restricted form the policy of the National Labor Relations Board in a case involving Local 761, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, during a strike in July 1958 at a General Electric plant near Louisville, Ky.

The high tribunal sent the case involving the IUE local back to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, however, to determine if the gate set aside at the GE plant for outside contractors was used to perform "conventional maintenance work necessary to the normal operations of GE," thus creating a "mingled" use of the gate which might not outlaw IUE's picketing.

The special gate would not be immune to picketing, the court noted also, if it were used for deliveries, or by customers.

The boycott provisions of T-H, including Landrum-Griffin Act amendments, were designed to prevent a union from inducing neutral employes to refuse to work in an effort to have their employers cease doing business with the struck employer.

The IUE picketing of the special gate, set up by GE before the strike, prevented almost all the employes of independent contractors from entering the plant, the court found.

In the majority opinion, Justice Felix Frankfurter said that the legal path by which the NLRB and the Circuit Court reached their opinions "did not take into account that if Gate 3 [the special gate] was in fact used by employes of independent contractors who performed conventional maintenance work necessary to the normal operations of GE, the use of the gate would have been a mingled one outside the bar" of the Taft-Hartley section.

"In short, such mixed use of this portion of the struck employer's premises would not bar picketing rights of the striking employes . . .," he wrote.

Justice William O. Douglas, who did not vote to have the Supreme Court hear the case, maintained that the appeals court decision upholding the NLRB covered the matter in light of previous decisions.

Union Officers Study Costs of Compensation

A study of the cost of workmen's compensation insurance for trade unions has been launched among all affiliates of the AFL-CIO.

The study—based on the fact that the claim experience of unions indicates the rates are too high—was voted by the AFL-CIO Conference of Secretary-Treasurers at its recent meeting in Chicago.

Named to the committee which will conduct the survey were Toney Gallo, secretary-treasurer of the Cement Workers and chairman of the AFL-CIO Conference of Secretary-Treasurers; Joseph D. Keenan, secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Arthur P. Gildea, secretary-treasurer of the Brewery Workers; William A. Smallwood, secretary-treasurer of the Communications Workers; and Hunter P. Wharton, secretary-treasurer of the Operating Engineers.

In Extortion Cases:

Justice Dept. Hit On 'Immunity' Plan

The AFL-CIO has denounced as "unnecessary, discriminatory and pernicious" proposed legislation that would, in its application, grant employers immunity from Taft-Hartley Act prosecution on bribery charges in exchange for testimony accusing union representatives of extortion.

The proposed legislation, sponsored by Rep. William C. Cramer (R-Fla.), has been supported by Attorney Gen. Robert F. Kennedy. During the Eisenhower Administration, former Attorney Gen. William P. Rogers endorsed similar legislation.

AFL-CIO Gen. Counsel J. Albert Woll assailed the proposal in testimony before a House Judiciary subcommittee headed by Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.).

He noted that Kennedy, in an earlier appearance before the subcommittee, opposed a more sweeping proposal introduced by Rep. Herbert Zelenko (D-N.Y.) to grant immunity from either federal or state prosecution as a means of compelling testimony in "any matter which affects interstate or foreign commerce."

'Special Treatment' Charged

Instead, he said, the Attorney General gave his backing to legislation which would "single out for special treatment from the whole vast array of federal criminal statutes two provisions peculiarly adapted for the prosecution of union officials and agents."

Woll referred to the Hobbs Anti-Racketeering Act, passed in 1951, which applies to any person obstructing commerce by robbery or extortion and which, he said, "has almost invariably been used against labor union representatives;" and Taft-Hartley's ban on both giving or receiving bribes, which "in practice," he said, "has generally been used to prosecute union officials receiving unauthorized payments."

He noted that in his testimony, Kennedy "quite frankly explained this particular immunity statute would be used to grant employers immunity against Taft-Hartley Act prosecutions in order to secure their testimony in prosecutions of labor representatives under the Hobbs Act."

Woll declared that although both statutes involve illegal financial transactions between employers and union representatives, under the Hobbs Act the payment must be made by an employer in the face of "violence or threatened violence or fear," while under the Taft-Hartley provision an employer would be "equally guilty."

Gray Area Cited

He noted that the Attorney General insisted there is a "gray area" where it is uncertain which law has been violated, but he charged that Kennedy gave "no concrete facts or specific figures whatsoever to justify" the need for such an immunity statute.

Rep. William E. Miller (R-N.Y.) conceded that neither Kennedy nor Rogers had substantiated the need for the legislation beyond declaring there was an "urgency" behind the request for action. The subcommittee agreed to ask Kennedy for substantiating information.

The AFL-CIO, Woll said, "can be justifiably proud of its record in taking a vigorous stand against racketeers and subversive elements in American society, and at the same time never faltering in its espousal of civil liberties."

The federation's Codes of Ethical Practices and its expulsion of unions failing to meet "proper standards of trade union conduct," he said, "offer conclusive proof of the firmness of the federation's opposition to any attempt by crooks or racketeers to infiltrate and victimize the labor movement."

On the other hand, he continued, organized labor through convention resolutions and briefs in court cases "has continuously maintained that the fight against subversion and organized crime can and must be carried on without infringing upon our traditional personal liberties."

PLAQUE SIGNIFYING first four-year college scholarship awarded by Ironworkers Local 40, New York, is presented by the international union's treasurer, James V. Cole, for whom award was named, to Edward Nicholson, first winner of the $1,000-a-year grant. Left to right are Raymond R. Corbett, Local 40 business agent and legislative chairman of New York State AFL-CIO; Cole, Mrs. Walter Nicholson; the scholarship winner; Walter Nicholson; Ironworkers Pres. John H. CARE Gifts Aid Unions in New Nations

American trade unions are helping workers in newly emerging nations of Asia, Africa and Latin America by sending them much-needed union office supplies through CARE, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton has declared.

In the past year, AFL-CIO affiliates have financed shipments of union-labeled typewriters, duplicating machines, ink, stencils and office supplies to more than a score of unions.

Minton, president of the Glass Bottle Blowers and a vice president of CARE, said the cooperative program is designed to help "free unions preserve their independence and growth." He added:

"With modern office equipment, particularly typewriters and mimeo machines, our friends in the underdeveloped areas can do two things—stimulate organization and combat totalitarian propaganda."

Minton released a letter from E. E. W. Nakibinge, secretary of the Uganda Trades Union Congress, expressing gratitude for the gift of two Remington Rand union-made typewriters.

"This kind of assistance," Nakibinge wrote, "is a practical example of the spirit of solidarity and brotherhood."

Good Faith Urged by Meany in Fight on Bias

force in the economic progress of the Negro worker. That, too, is a fact."

Meany pointed out that the labor movement "needs the Negro workers," and "not just for moral considerations either, as paramount as they may be," and that Negro workers "need the trade union movement."

Citing the employment of Negro workers as strikebreakers in the past, when "they were denied every normal access to decent jobs," and "rejected by unions as well as by employers," he declared:

"We have come a long way since then, and we can't afford to go back."

Meany said that while unions should not be exempt from criticism, "incomplete or untrue reports" of racial discrimination by unions have been publicized "with cynical delight by the reactionary press" and by a Negro press "almost solidly anti-union in dealing with its own employes."

"Every one of these attacks helps to alienate the non-labor liberals, the well-meaning but uninformed citizens, the white-collar and professional groups—the people whose support we badly need," Meany added.

"I repeat, we do not pretend that all is well in the ranks of labor—that there is no discrimination, no unfairness, no remaining racial barriers," Meany said. "They exist. And we intend to abolish them."

"Let us extend to each other the understanding, the charity and the spirit of brotherhood that we seek to establish elsewhere and move ahead together toward a society of true freedom and equality for all."

The relations between the labor movement and civil rights groups became a central subject of discussion at a session on "labor and the fight against employment discrimination."

Panelists discussed such issues as high unemployment and other effects of anti-Negro discrimination; the need for equality in upgrading and training; the leverage offered by government contracts in ending bias; and the need for federal fair employment practices legislation.

Jerry Wurf, director of State, County & Municipal Employes' District 37, observed that while AFL-CIO civil rights machinery "can be used more effectively," the publicized attacks on unions and the JLC have had the effect of "dividing forces" and have "caught in the middle" the Negro, Puerto Rican and other minorities.

Charles S. Zimmerman, vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers and chairman of the JLC's Trade Union Council, said the breakdown in communications results from charges which blame the entire labor movement for the wrongdoing of a local union.

Zimmerman, manager of ILG Local 22, said both he and his local have been attacked, although the local includes Japanese, Chinese, Negroes, Latins and others from 32 ethnic groups. All are represented in various staff and leadership posts, he added.

Bert Jemott, assistant manager of the Laundry Workers Joint Board of the Clothing Workers, said the crux of the problem is to get Negroes trained and into skilled trades. Only in this way can the Negro improve conditions for his family, live in a better home and send his children to college, he added.

Robert Horsham, business agent of Local 327 and a member of the joint board, pointed out that many Negro and Puerto Rican workers come from farm areas, are unskilled and have to take the lowest-paying jobs.

In other developments at the four-day conference:

- Boris Shishkin, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, called for a federal fair employment practices law and other advances in the civil rights field.
- G. Mennen Williams, assistant secretary of state for African affairs, told delegates the work of the JLC and organized labor in fighting discrimination strengthens America's image before the newly-emergent nations of Africa and Asia. He paid tribute to labor's support of a labor college in Kampala, Uganda, which is training English-speaking leaders, and expressed hope for a similar college to serve the 17 newly-independent nations of French-speaking Africa.
- The delegates adopted a series of resolutions pledging support to the "Freedom Riders"; called for a permanent federal Civil Rights Commission and a civil rights committee at every level in the labor movement; and mapped an anti-recession program designed to achieve fair as well as full employment.

Union-Made Film Gets Typo Backing

Glens Falls, N. Y.—The Empire Typographical Conference, composed of 35 New York State locals of the Typographical Union, at its recent conference here, called on "all good union men" to patronize products of the Ansco Corp., the only unionized manufacturer of photographic equipment and film in the U.S.

Cost of Living in April Remains 'Stable' at All-Time Record

The nation's cost of living in April remained unchanged from the month before, "marking a further extension of the overall stability" shown since last October, the government has reported.

The Labor Dept. also reported that the spendable earnings and the buying power of factory workers rose for the second straight month.

The April index will mean no change in cost-of-living allowances for some 1 million automobile industry and agricultural implement workers.

About 56,000 employes of General Dynamics Corp. and Rohr Aircraft Corp. will receive a 3-cents-an-hour hike on an annual adjustment, and 25,000 workers at Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. will get a 1-cent increase on a quarterly adjustment.

The Consumer Price Index of 127.5 for April compares to 127.3 as of last October. The April CPI means the market basket which cost $10 in the 1947-49 base period now costs $12.75. This all-time record high was first reached last December and is 1 percent higher than in April a year ago.

The stability of consumer prices between March and April, the Labor Dept. said, was the result of mixed price movements.

The most important decreases were for gasoline, some costs of home purchase, women's apparel and new cars. Significant advances were recorded for used cars, movie admissions and medical care services, the report said.

Gasoline prices, it added, dropped by about 4 percent primarily because of "seasonally heavy inventories and widespread price wars," despite gas tax hikes in two states.

Robert J. Myers, deputy commissioner of labor statistics, said the average price for ordinary gasoline last month was 19.8 cents a gallon, lowest in a decade. He said taxes average 10.3 cents a gallon on ordinary gasoline and are creeping upward.

The other sharp movement in the transportation grouping was a record jump of 7 percent in used car prices, although these levels were still 11 percent below the most recent high when compact cars were introduced in late 1959. Myers said the April increase as explained by the fact that fewer people are trading in old cars for new ones, thus reducing stocks and boosting prices.

The report said the cost of medical care rose slightly, pushed by higher hospitalization and surgical insurance rates.

The accompanying report on factory worker spendable earnings showed a rise of about 50 cents over the month to $81.39 per week for a production worker with three dependents and to $73.82 for a worker without dependents. Since prices remained unchanged, this meant a direct boost in buying power.

Spendable earnings in April were about $1.40 per week higher than in April 1960, as a 5-cent hike in earnings offset a workweek shorter by 6 minutes.

Debate Opens Soon:

Congress Ready for Housing, School Aid

The 87th Congress prepared to advance two of Pres. John F. Kennedy's "big five" legislative proposals—housing and education—in the wake of the Memorial Day holiday.

The House was set to open early debate on the Administration's $2.5 billion federal-aid-to-public-schools measure, which passed the Senate by a 49-34 vote after surviving efforts to add on racial and religious riders that could have doomed its final passage.

The Senate, meanwhile, turned its attention to an omnibus $3 billion housing and urban renewal proposal which the White House had urged to battle slums and provide homes within the reach of millions of American families.

Of the remaining three measures which topped the President's priority list for the first session of Congress, two—minimum wage improvements and aid to depressed areas—already have been signed into law.

The last key bill, medical care for the aged financed through social security, is scheduled for hearings shortly before the House Ways & Means Committee.

As Congress turned its attention to the two big measures, there were these other developments on Capitol Hill:

● Sec. of State Dean Rusk, in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, urged approval of the Administration's $4.8 billion foreign aid program and declared the bill is urgently needed.

5-Year Power Asked

Rusk especially appealed for approval of Kennedy's request to permit five-year borrowing authority—instead of annual congressional appropriations—so that loans to underdeveloped nations could be put on a more orderly planning and programming basis. The proposal has been strongly backed by the AFL-CIO.

● The Senate Public Works Committee approved an antipollution bill calling for $440 million in construction grants over five years to help states and cities build waste treatment facilities. The House earlier passed a measure providing for a 10-year, $1 billion program.

● The White House sent Congress the draft of a proposed bill to establish the Peace Corps, and asked for a $40 million authorization for fiscal 1962 to send between 500 and 1,000 volunteers overseas this year and to have 2,700 abroad or in training by June 1962.

The House debate on the school bill is expected to center on its provisions allowing states and school districts to exercise the option of using federal grants either for classroom construction or teachers' salaries, or both.

In 1960, the Senate approved grants for such alternative use while the House limited federal aid to construction only. The issue was never resolved because the powerful House Rules Committee, then under conservative control, blocked action by joint Senate-House conferees.

The Senate-passed school bill, sponsored by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), provides for grants of $850 million a year for three years, to be allocated to states on the basis of total school-age population under an equalization formula based on each state's per capita income. It also provides $840 million for a three-year extension of aid to school districts where attendance is swollen because of families of federal employes.

The House version, sponsored by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N. J.), calls for the same general program but adopts a different equalization formula for distributing funds, under which the poorest states would receive 2.5 times as much, per pupil, as the wealthiest state. The Senate's formula is 3-to-1.

The two issues which threatened the bill in the Senate—the question of segregation in southern schools and the controversial subject of aid to private as well as public schools—also are expected to crop up in the House debate.

The housing bill set for Senate debate provides for $2.5 billion in urban renewal funds, authorizes construction of 100,000 additional public housing units, and provides a fresh flow of funds for low-cost loans to colleges for student housing, for housing for the elderly, and for no-down-payment mortgages for moderate income families.

The measure contains two important additions to more moderate housing measures vetoed by former Pres. Eisenhower in 1959—$100 million in federal grants to enable communities to buy up "open spaces" for recreation and park areas; and $100 million for loans for local communities for mass transportation projects to help solve commuter problems.

A generally similar measure which, however, cut $500 million from the Administration's request for urban renewal grants has won approval in a House Banking subcommittee.

Texans Elect Republican to Senate Seat

Texas voters have elected Republican John C. Tower, a self-proclaimed adherent of conservative Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.), as the state's first GOP member of the Senate since post-Civil War days.

The party lineup in the Senate, as a result, is 65 Democrats and 35 Republicans.

Tower campaigned on the doctrine, "I've never had a liberal thought in my life," and beat conservative Democratic Sen. William A. Blakley by a margin of approximately 8,000 out of a total of less than 900,000 votes cast.

The Texas vote for the Senate last November, when Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson ran both for re-election to the Senate and for national office, totaled more than 2.2 million, and Johnson won by a margin of 1.3 million to 930,000.

Blakley was appointed to the Senate by Gov. Price Daniel (D) to succeed Johnson last January. Since then the interim senator has voted steadily with the southern conservative Democratic bloc and against Pres. Kennedy's domestic policies.

The Texas AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education supported Maury Maverick, Jr., against Blakley in a free-for-all preliminary special election in April with Tower the only Republican and more than 60 Democrats entered. The liberal vote was split and Tower and Blakley emerged as the two top candidates for the runoff.

The Texas COPE announced a position of "staunch neutrality" and "no recommendation" as between Blakley and Tower in the runoff. State Pres. H. S. Brown urged voters to "perform their duties as citizens and exercise their right of franchise."

Kennedy Asks Funds For Training Jobless

grams, would work as follows under the proposed legislation:

● Unemployed workers who cannot secure full-time jobs without retraining would be granted a minimum weekly federal allowance for a maximum of 52 weeks while attending a vocational school but not more than the average weekly unemployment compensation paid in the state. Extra allowances for transportation and subsistence would be available for those who would have to travel to a training school.

When training is completed the workers would receive job placement service from the government and continued counseling as well as payments covering half the cost of moving their families to available job areas.

● Unemployed workers eligible for on-the-job training would receive payments equal to 50 percent of jobless benefits plus wages from the employer, with the total not to exceed $46 a week.

Help in Relocating Provided

● Unemployed workers whose skills are no longer needed in their present areas, who have bona fide offers of employment elsewhere and who are qualified for these jobs, would receive 50 percent of the cost of relocating to the new job if the worker has been idle six months or more.

● Employed workers who need to improve their skills to meet new technological changes would be entitled to attend training courses, with the government bearing half the cost of the courses.

An unemployed worker, under the proposed legislation, would seek enrollment for training through a USES office where he would be tested, counseled and placed in a program. A determining factor would be whether a need existed for the skill to which he would be trained.

The bill would direct the Secretary of Labor to establish a program of studies "of practices of employers and unions which tend to impede the mobility of workers or which facilitate mobility, including but not limited to early retirement and vesting provisions and practices under private compensation plans, the extension of health, welfare and insurance benefits to laid-off workers, the operation of severance pay plans, the operation of seniority systems and the use of extended leave plans for education and training purposes."

The Dept. of Labor and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare would both be involved in the program—the Labor Dept. in terms of on-the-job training, testing and counseling, HEW in the vocational school training.

Labor Backs Changes In Social Security Act

which Cruikshank urged the Senate to approve would raise a widow's benefits from 75 percent to 82.5 percent of her husband's benefit amount; boost minimums from $33 to $40 a month; and give men the option of retiring with reduced benefits at age 62.

Consistent with Labor's Aims

The federation spokesman said that Kennedy's proposals—which, in addition to early retirement for men, also called for widow's benefits of 85 percent and a $43 minimum—were "consistent with the objectives of the AFL-CIO."

Cruikshank urged the Senate committee to make only one change in the House-passed measure, so that the increased social security tax of one-eighth of 1 percent each for employers and employes would not become effective until 1963. The House bill would raise the contribution level beginning next January. Employers and employes now are each taxed 3 percent on the first $4,800 in earnings.

The federation spokesman asked for the postponement on the ground that a "serious gap" exists between the nation's "economic potentialities and actual levels of production."

Witnesses for the National Association of Manufacturers, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Life Underwriters vigorously opposed both the increased benefit levels for widows and the provisions for earlier retirement of men.

NAM spokesman John E. Carroll contended the bill would increase the "already heavy" payroll taxes paid by active workers for the "benefit of those who have already retired."

Step Toward Expansion

Albert C. Adams of the Life Underwriters said the bill was another step toward "questionable expansion" of the social security system and "overtaxation" of workers to "meet the cost of providing economic security for the non-workers."

The CofC position, contained in a letter to Finance Committee Chairman Harry F. Byrd from the chamber's Clarence R. Miles, endorsed only one provision in the House-passed bill—raising the minimum benefit to $40 a month.

Textile Unions Ratify Locals' Mutual Aid Pact

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America and the United Textile Workers have ratified a mutual aid pact negotiated by 19 local unions representing 40,000 workers in synthetic yarn plants in 12 states.

The agreement calls for a 25 cents a week assessment per member in the synthetic yarn industry to provide financial support for any local union which is forced to strike as the result of employer demands for reductions in wages or fringe benefits.

Meeting at Asheville, N. C., delegates from 15 TWUA locals and four UTW locals set up the mutual aid program because "in our competitive industry, any attack on the standards of a single local union will immediately have repercussions throughout the entire industry."

The TWUA executive council ratified the agreement during its five-day quarterly meeting here. It had previously been approved by the UTW board.

In other actions, the TWUA council:

● Endorsed Pres. Kennedy's proposed reorganization of the National Labor Relations Board which delegates to trial examiners the power of decision in unfair labor practice cases, subject to review by the labor board.

● Warned against the "new faces" of reactionary groups which "aim to discredit and undermine all of the social advances made by the people of our nation since the New Deal."

'Truth-in-Lending' Booklet Available

A pamphlet on interest rates and the protection that consumers would get from a "truth-in-lending" bill is available from the Industrial Union Dept. of the AFL-CIO at 815 16th Street N. W., Washington 6, D. C.

The pamphlet is called "In Your Interest" and is Publication No. 39. Copies may be obtained by writing the IUD.

The "truth" bill, introduced by Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) and others, would require merchants and finance firms to tell buyers how much true simple interest they must pay on loans or time-payment plans.

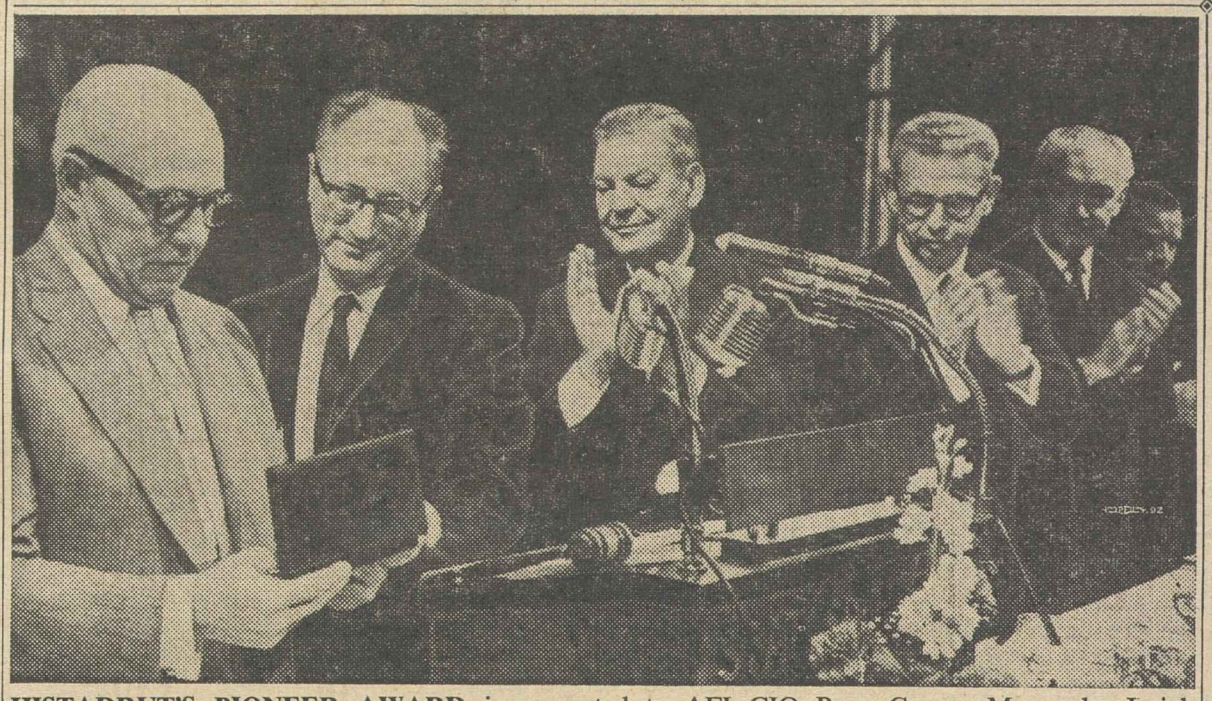
Labor-Management Body Backs Jobless Retraining



HISTADRUT'S PIONEER AWARD is presented to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by Isaiah Avrech, Histadrut's American representative, at dinner marking 40th anniversary of Israeli federation of labor. Watching the presentation are AFL-CIO Vice Pres. George M. Harrison, dinner chairman; Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg; Eliahu Elath, co-chairman of the Afro-Asian Institute of Labor Studies in Tel Aviv and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Walter P. Reuther.

Senate and House Open Hearings

By Gene Zack

Pres. John F. Kennedy's tripartite Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy has voted unanimously to support "in principle" the Administration-proposed program of retraining and relocating workers made jobless by the impact of automation and industrial changes.

The 21-member advisory panel—composed of labor, management and public members—called the federally financed plan a "desirable program," Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg reported following the committee's third day-long meeting at the White House since its creation in March.

This marked the first time that a group composed of management, labor and public spokesmen had reached unanimous agreement on the need for mounting a new type of federal attack on chronic unemployment.

Support from the panel came as subcommittees of House and Senate opened public hearings on the four-year, $700 million proposal aimed at easing the short-term effects of technological progress.

Ruttenberg Cites Statistics

Appearing as the leadoff witness before a House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), Goldberg said enactment of the program is essential to avoid having "the benefits of automation and technological improvement become burdens of unemployment, financial distress and loss of dignity" for workers whose jobs

Housing Bill Action Near In Senate

The Kennedy Administration's $3 billion omnibus housing and urban renewal bill neared final passage in the Senate after surviving most attacks on key sections.

The bill, sponsored by Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.), is aimed at reducing slums and providing homes within the reach of millions of American families.

After first defeating 50-41 an amendment by Sen. Homer E. Capehart (R-Ind.) to knock out the bill's provisions for 40-year loans for construction of rental housing for medium-income families, the Senate accepted a comparable amendment, 49 to 44, by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) eliminating the 40-year loans and also striking out 40-year mortgage periods with no down payment. Floor leaders for the bill hoped to restore at least part of the provisions.

Before the vote, Sparkman warned that the amendment "strikes at the heart of the bill," and declared there was a demonstrated need for providing shelter for families making $4,000 to $6,000 a year who cannot afford higher priced rental units and are not eligible for public housing.

Earlier, by a 53-36 margin, the Senate rejected another Capehart amendment designed to trim the bill's program of home improvement loans to 15 years, and to set a $7,000 ceiling on such loans.

After defeat of this amendment, Sparkman agreed to a compromise to limit loans for major home repairs and additions to 20 years, instead of the original 25 years proposed by the Administration.

The Sparkman bill provides for $2.5 billion in urban renewal funds, authorizes construction of 100,000 additional public housing units, and provides a fresh flow of funds for low-cost loans for housing for the elderly, and loans to colleges for student housing.

The measure—one of Pres. Kennedy's "big five" legislative proposals for his first session of the 87th Congress—contains two important additions to more moderate housing measures which former Pres. Eisenhower vetoed in 1959.

One of these provides $100 million in federal grants to enable communities to buy "open spaces" for recreation and park areas. The other authorizes $100 million in loans to local communities for mass transportation projects aimed at solving commuter problems.

On Overseas Earnings:

Labor Backs Closing Of Tax Loopholes

Existing tax laws which confer "major privileges" on earnings of American corporations with overseas subsidiaries should be repealed or drastically amended to end "distortions in U.S. investment decisions [and] loss in U.S. jobs," the AFL-CIO has declared.

In testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee, Research Dir. Stanley H. Ruttenberg expressed the federation's support of proposals by the Kennedy Administration to close loopholes in tax laws applicable to corporate and individual earnings abroad.

The AFL-CIO spokesman was particularly critical of "the legal monstrosity" of tax escape areas under which corporations with foreign offices can "divert the bulk of their profits to the countries with the lowest tax rates."

Countries such as Switzerland and Panama provide "tax havens" for U.S. firms operating overseas, Ruttenberg said, and thus "unfairly deprive the U.S. of taxes."

American concerns, he said, establish "token offices" in these countries and then "funnel their profits, regardless of where earned," to these offices in order to take advantage of "liberal tax benefits." He said the trade union movement "agrees fully" with the White House recommendation that provisions permitting "tax havens" be abolished.

Other Phases Backed

The federation, he said, also supports the President's recommendation that the present deferral of taxes on income earned overseas until the income is brought back to the U.S. be repealed insofar as income earned in industrialized nations is concerned.

In addition, Ruttenberg told the committee, the deferral should apply in the less-developed countries "only so long as 90 percent of the income of a particular company, corporation or branch comes from the sale of products in markets outside of the United States."

Although foreign investment has

Meany Hails Example Set By Israel

Israel has provided "living proof" to the new nations of Asia and Africa that it is "possible to combine democracy with socialized economy" to attain speedy economic progress, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has delcared.

He urged the countries which have recently won or are still fighting to win their national independence that "the experience of the trade union movement and democracy in Israel can be of the greatest help to you in building your countries into virile democracies with healthy and vital free trade unions."

Meany's tribute to Israel and Histadrut—the Israeli federation of labor—came at a dinner in Washington marking Histadrut's 40th anniversary and the presentation of the organization's "pioneering award" to the AFL-CIO president.

The award dinner, attended by 600 trade union leaders, climaxed a series of events including a day-long conference on the new problems confronting the 13-year-old nation and its unique labor movement.

Meany stressed the dangers of world communism to the new nations, noting that "it is understandable that leaders of the newly born nations should be eager to have their countries make economic progress rapidly. Toward this goal they can learn much from the Israeli experience."

The People Control

The state of Israel, he said, is not under the "absolute and total control of one party. Through their various parties, through trade un-

Meany Urges Teachers Vote 'Yes' Ballots

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has urged the 40,000 teachers of the New York public school system to vote "yes" in overwhelming numbers in a referendum set by the city's Board of Education on the question of whether the teachers desire collective bargaining.

The referendum will be held by mail ballot, sent to school buildings on June 16, and ballots are returnable by June 23. They will be tallied by the Honest Ballot Association.

Meany was sharply critical of the Board of Education for rejecting the recommendation of its own study committee that an election be set up under which teachers would have the direct

Florida Firm Guilty Of Inciting Violence

A National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has found the Cone Brothers Contracting Co.—Florida's largest road-builder—guilty of inciting violence against striking members of the Operating Engineers and threatening employes with blacklisting.

Branding the company guilty of unfair labor practices, Trial Examiner George A. Downing specifically recommended that Cone Brothers be ordered to "cease and desist" from conduct including:

- Threatening to shoot strikers.
- Directing employes to run over strikers.
- Threatening to deal with strikers "like shooting at a covey of birds."
- Arming supervisors and employes with "guns and other miscellaneous weapons."
- Threatening that employes who sign union cards or refuse to cross a picket line will be "discharged and blacklisted . . . throughout the state."
- Characterizing as "quits" employes who refuse to carry weapons.
- Threatening to arrest employes because of their organizational activities.
- Threatening to go out of business rather than "go union."
- Promising benefits to employes for "going along" with the company.

In a parallel case, the trial examiner found a subsidiary of Cone

Economist Warns 'Work' Laws Could Wreck Free Enterprise

A prominent Catholic economist has warned that so-called "right-to-work" laws are a threat to the American free enterprise system and could lead to its "impairment or collapse."

He said that "suppression of collective bargaining" or destruction of effective union representation of employes, if achieved by such anti-labor legislation, could lead "sooner or later to state control."

The warning was voiced by the Rev. William J. Lee, S.S., dean of studies at St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Md., in a 600-page, five-year study of the state laws that seek to prevent management and labor from entering into union shop agreements through collective bargaining.

The priest-economist said in his study:

"Many social thinkers are convinced that suppression of collective bargaining or the determent of unions from effective representation of employes would, under present conditions, lead sooner or later to state control and to the impairment or collapse of the free enterprise system."

An abstract of the study, "Right to Work Laws: Some Economic and Ethical Aspects," has been published by the Catholic University Press. A special printing is being distributed by the National Council for Industrial Peace, a citizens' committee headed by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and former Sen. Herbert Lehman, of New York, which opposes the "right-to-work" laws in the belief they are disruptive of industrial peace and are aimed at destroying nationally-accepted collective bargaining processes. Copies may be obtained from the NCIP, 1074 National Press Building, Washington, D. C.

The Catholic economist said the "right-to-work" laws, enacted principally by non-industrialized states, have "created ill will," and have "had a most disquieting impact on the quest for industrial peace."

The system of collective bargaining between labor and management, he declared, has "proved to be one of the great bulwarks of economic freedom in modern industrial society."

In a general indictment, Father Lee said that the "implications of the 'right-to-work' laws lead to the conclusion that these laws have not been an exercise of prudent public policy."

"They have not contributed to better social order . . . The ill will created by the dispute has had a most disquieting impact on the quest for industrial peace," he declared, and added that the controversy over them "has contributed more than its proportionate share" to the hardening of attitudes and the obstruction of industrial peace which have marred labor-management relations in more recent years.

"Muddled by . . . doubletalk"

Campaigns seeking to impose the laws have been "muddled by an extraordinary amount of doubletalk" and have been used by some employers, who "will do almost anything to thwart the organization of their employes," to "cloak" their hostility toward organized labor, he warned.

Father Lee said that the existence of strong and secure labor unions, which is threatened by the "right-to-work" laws, is essential in the American industrial economy.

"While collective bargaining does have inherent limitations, it is the best method so far devised for changing and improving labor conditions," he said.

"Moreover, the absolute necessity of harmony and order in economic and social life in industrialized countries has moved leading moralists to regard independent labor organizations as essential to prevent chaotic labor conditions as well as to correct social evils."

Flight Engineers Reject Feinsinger Proposals

The executive council of the Flight Engineers has declined to accept recommendations of a presidential commission on airline disputes involving qualifications and jurisdiction of plane crews, declaring that the proposals do not represent a "framework . . . for realistic negotiations."

Pres. Ron Brown said the union's officers will meet with Prof. Nathan Feinsinger, chairman of the commission, on June 12 at his request, "although we are not encouraged as to the hope of an early, equitable solution to the problem."

The Feinsinger commission urged a merger between the Flight Engineers and the Pilots to resolve long-standing jurisdictional disputes, and Pres. Kennedy called for the two unions to negotiate a "final settlement" of their differences on the basis of the recommendations.

The commission also proposed a standard three-man cockpit crew for jet planes, including a crew member with both flight engineer and pilot qualifications. At present, some airlines use three pilots and a flight engineer on jet planes, while others have three-man, all-pilot crews.

In Chicago, the executive committee of the Pilots prepared to consider the commission's recommendations at its quarterly meeting.

The Flight Engineers said the union will pursue its goals of job security and continued recognition of the flight engineer as a separate craft through collective bargaining with the airlines.

"We assume that we still have the same rights as other working Americans—the right to bargain collectively and if need be the right to take economic action," Brown declared.

He said the one recommendation of the Feinsinger commission with which the union concurs deals with steps to restore the jobs of members of the Flight Engineers on Western Airlines.

After a walkout by flight engineers on seven airlines last February, Western was the only company which refused to accept Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg's request that the engineers return to their jobs without penalty while the Feinsinger commission studied the issues. Western declared it had "permanently replaced" the engineers with pilots holding flight engineer certificates.

The commission suggested appointment of a "neutral" party to make recommendations on the Western Air Lines dispute. Brown said this proposal "will be vigorously pursued" by the union.

As Kefauver Probe Closes:

New Price Scandals Hit Electric Industry

New evidence of illegal price fixing in the electrical equipment industry has led to the sentencing of four companies and two executives by a federal judge at Dayton, O., and the indictment of six manufacturers by a federal grand jury in Milwaukee.

The court action came as the Kefauver Senate Anti-Trust subcommittee wound up its investigation of the industry's multi-billion dollar price-fixing and bid-rigging conspiracy, for which 29 companies and 44 individuals were sentenced last February. Five of the companies involved in the Dayton and Milwaukee cases were also defendants in the earlier trial.

Ralph J. Cordiner, president and board chairman of General Electric Co., spent a rigorous six hours under questioning by Kefauver and the subcommittee staff.

In the course of his testimony Cordiner said:

- He was "not proud" of GE's record of anti-trust violations and the company's involvement in the industrywide conspiracy was "a humbling experience."
- He does not consider that he was "negligent" in not knowing that GE was violating the anti-trust laws. However, as chief executive of the company, he accepts "my share of responsibility."
- He "regrets and deplores" a sharp personal attack on Kefauver made recently by a GE official who addressed the Mississippi Manufactures Association.
- He saw nothing wrong with identical prices on standardized items. "The manufacturer who prices his product below the market will quickly discover there is no advantage to him because his competitors drop their prices to the price level he establishes."

Kefauver, before excusing Cordiner from the witness table, told him he found it "hard to understand" how Cordiner could remain unaware of the conspiracy when "others less active of mind, less well-paid, with less responsibility, seemed to have found out very early in their careers."

Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges, final witness at the hearings, declared that "management of corporate America must assume the responsibility for a more aggressive program of acquainting its own people with its policies, its commitments and its philosophies."

In the sentencing of four companies for conspiring to fix prices of electrical resistors to the armed forces and private firms, U.S. District Judge Carl A. Weinman imposed the biggest penalty — a $35,000 fine—on the Allen-Bradley Co. The same firm had been fined $40,000 in the Philadelphia sentencing in February. The other firms sentenced, not involved in the earlier case, were Speer Carbon Co., $25,000 fine; Stackpole Carbon Co., $20,000; and Intl. Resistance Co., $15,000.

Indicted at Milwaukee were Hubbard & Co., McGraw-Edison Co., Joslyn Mfg. Co., and A. B. Chance Co., all of which were defendants in the Philadelphia case, and Oliver Electrical Mfg. Co., and Utilities Service Co.

The six firms, which manufacture "hardware" for use in electrical transmission and communication lines, were charged with having "for many years past" conspired to fix non-competitive prices and to establish non-competitive distribution practices.

As a result, the indictment charged, prices "have been raised, fixed and maintained at artificially high levels" and price competition has been "suppressed."

N. J. Federation Picks Marciante

Newark—Charles H. Marciante has been appointed secretary-treasurer of the New Jersey State Federation of Labor. He is the son of Louis P. Marciante, federation president until his death earlier this year.

The secretary-treasurer's post has been vacant since Apr. 12 when Vincent J. Murphy was designated president by the state body's executive board.

Marciante, 31, is a member of Trenton Local 269 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and has been its delegate to the Mercer County Central Labor Union. He is a graduate of Rutgers University.

ABC Cancels Truce With Expelled Union

A two-month truce, which had been expected to lead to merger negotiations between two unions of bakery workers, has been cancelled by the AFL-CIO American Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

ABC Pres. Daniel E. Conway charged that the Bakery & Confectionery Workers, expelled in 1957 on findings of corrupt leadership, has failed to clean up its "internal mess" and said "the corruption has apparently spread."

He pointed out that James Landriscina, new B&C president, and four vice presidents of the expelled union have been charged with involvement in alleged misuse of union funds by James G. Cross, who resigned as both president and a member of the union on the eve of his trial by the executive board. The board majority granted him a pension.

Also during the truce, the B&C board ordered the trial of four reform leaders, associated with the Local Union Reunification Committee, on charges of "character assassination."

The B&C board also threatened "disciplinary action" against any local or member "that participates directly or indirectly in the activities of the Local Union Reunification Committee."

The committee, originally made up of 11 large B&C locals, has a suit pending in federal court accusing Cross of misappropriating union funds and charging members of the executive board with covering up for him.

Conway, in his statement announcing cancellation of the truce agreement, said the ABC's "dedication to the fight against corruption rules out any possibility of our considering merger discussions with an organization whose leadership is charged with involvement in the misuse of the workers' money."

He added:

"At the same time, as an organization, we are pledged to aid and assist those in the B&C who are carrying on the fight to rid that organization of corruption and who seek merger with our organization so that they may return to the AFL-CIO and become part of the legitimate mainstream of the American labor movement."

Florida Road-Building Firm Guilty of Inciting Violence

Brothers—the Tampa Sand & Material Co.—guilty of an unfair labor practice in firing three truck drivers during an organizing campaign of the unaffiliated Teamsters because they refused to cross the Operating Engineers' picket lines.

Declaring that a subsequent Teamsters strike in protest against the firings stemmed from the company's unfair labor practices, the NLRB examiner recommended reinstatement of the three drivers with back pay.

Testimony at the hearings indicated the company sought to use the Operating Engineers' picket lines to weed out pro-union truck drivers by ordering them to report to the struck plants, even though there wasn't work for them to do there. The drivers were told they would be considered to have "quit" their jobs if they refused to cross the lines.

Last fall, the Cone Brothers firm was barred from bidding on state road contracts after a legislative investigating committee had uncovered a scandal involving wholesale cash payoffs by the company to state road inspectors.

Lifting of the ban recently has been strongly protested by the Operating Engineers, which has asked the Federal Bureau of Public Roads to bar any federal highway payments on contracts awarded the company.

Third NLRB Action

The current NLRB proceeding against the company is the third in recent years. In 1955, the labor board found it guilty of refusal to bargain with the Stone Workers, which then represented a group of employes. The company's defense was that it had asked each worker as he collected his pay check whether he belonged to the union and, on the basis of this "poll," decided the union didn't speak for the majority of employes.

In 1959, the labor board ordered the reinstatement of a worker who was fired during an earlier Operating Engineers' organizing campaign. The worker had been dismissed, the company said, because he was "dissatisfied" with his job. His "dissatisfaction" was demonstrated by the fact that he was actively supporting the union, the company indicated.

During the NLRB hearings on the current dispute, nearly 100 witnesses testified against the company.

One striker produced a statement given him by the superintendent of another construction company where he had been hired and fired the same day. The superintendent's statement read in part:

"I was forced to discharge this man because of a company policy not to hire anyone that had walked off from Cone Brothers. . . ."

At another point, a witness described how a strikebreaker had walked out of the plant, started a fight with two strikers and had been knocked to the ground.

The witness then testified that a shop foreman had picked up the worker in a station wagon, driven away and returned to the scene about five minutes later. The strikebreaker then "laid down in the street. He stayed there about five to 10 minutes until the [TV] cameraman got there," the labor board examiner was told.

Downing, explaining why he recommended an order which also bars the company from "in any other manner interfering with, restraining or coercing its employes," declared:

"The flagrant nature and the widespread scope of the unfair labor practices which respondents [Cone Brothers] engaged in, coupled with the past record of Cone Brothers as a violator of the Act, demonstrates convincingly that the present violations are potentially related to other unfair labor practices . . . and that the danger of their commission in the future is to be anticipated from the respondents' conduct in the past."

WORKER-FATHER OF THE YEAR, Earl Durham, is congratulated by his foreman, F. C. Loeser, and fellow union members at the Brown & Williamson tobacco plant at Louisville on his selection by the National Fathers' Day Committee. Durham is a shop steward of Tobacco Workers Local 185.

Tariff Barriers Peril Jobs, AIW Board Says

Chicago—The way to solve the problem of cheap foreign imports is not to raise tariff barriers but to maintain "procedures and safeguards to protect American workers," the executive board of the Allied Industrial Workers has declared.

Meeting here in quarterly session, the board adopted a policy statement favoring a liberal world trade policy and urging Congress to re-enact the Reciprocal Trade Act when it expires in 1962.

Noting that some workers, including AIW members, may be hurt by imports, the board warned that a "misguided effort" to save the jobs of some workers could cost the livelihood of 4.5 million others if the United States slips back into a "protectionist policy."

"Exports for 1961 are running at an annual rate in excess of $20 billion," the board said. "Without dollars earned from the sale of goods to us, other nations could not purchase our export products."

The board listed steps that could be taken to safeguard American workers whose jobs are jeopardized by imports: Legislation to encourage more rapid U.S. economic growth; voluntary import quotas; international fair labor standards; reduction of tariffs by other countries on American products; raising world living standards; adoption by Congress of a trade adjustment program of aid to suffering workers and communities.

The blame for many of the problems workers face was put at the doorstep of American manufacturers.

The ability of industrialized nations to compete in world markets on a par with American manufacturers comes as a "rude shock" to many firms which, the board said, "detest real competition." They "trumpet praises of the free enterprise system," it said, while "arranging to divide up the market."

The AIW board urged all union members to keep local television stations informed of their interest in better programs, and praised chairman Newton Minow of the Federal Communications Commission for asking less "blood and thunder" and more "great debates" on television.

Also approved was a resolution calling on sons and daughters of AIW members to volunteer for Peace Corps service.

Board Orders Split Vote At Cyanamid

The National Labor Relations Board, by a 4-1 margin, has ordered separate collective bargaining elections for production and maintenance employes at American Cyanamid Co.'s acrylic fiber plant at Milton, Fla.

The employes have not previously been represented by collective bargaining agencies.

The decision constituted a reversal of a Feb. 2, 1961, ruling by the board that a single collective bargaining unit of both production and maintenance employes was appropriate.

In granting the separate elections, the NLRB indicated it would approach the problem of single as against multiple bargaining units on the merits of each individual case.

In the American Cyanamid case, the majority held, there was evidence that employes in maintenance and production were "separately identifiable," and were established in separate sections.

Filing briefs in support of separate bargaining units were the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., and the Pensacola, Fla., Building & Construction Trades Dept. Urging a single unit of production and maintenance employes were the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., the Chemical Workers, the unaffiliated Mine Workers, and American Cyanamid.

CORE Chairman Hails Labor for Aid

The AFL-CIO's support of the Freedom Riders has been "invaluable," Charles R. Oldham, national chairman of the Congress of Racial Equality — sponsors of the rides testing interstate desegregation in the South—has declared.

In a telegram to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Oldham expressed "our deepest appreciation" for the "very real support" extended by organized labor.

"Your aid in mobilizing public opinion and material help," the CORE official wired Meany, "has been invaluable at this critical moment."

Louisville Man Named Worker-Father of Year

Louisville—Earl Durham, a 25-year member of the Tobacco Workers, has been chosen Worker-Father of the Year by the National Fathers' Day Committee.

Durham, who works at the Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. here, is a shop steward and sports director of Tobacco Workers Local 185. The 47-year-old father of four, he has put in many hours of volunteer work in municipal recreation programs for Louisville youngsters. He and Mrs. Durham have also been active in church activities and in fund-raising for the March of Dimes and the Heart Fund.

As representative of the nation's workers in the annual Fathers' Day observance on June 18, Durham and his family will be given receptions in both New York and Washington.

During four days in New York, the Durhams are scheduled to be received by Mayor Robert F. Wagner and be guests of New York Yankees' Manager Ralph Houk—who has been named Sports Father of the Year—at a baseball game.

In the nation's capital, the family will be greeted by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, top officials of the AFL-CIO and Pres. John O'Hare and Sec.-Treas. Robert J. Petree of the Tobacco Workers. He will also be presented with the George Washington Medal, the award which goes with the title.

The Brown & Williamson firm, makers of Raleighs and other brands of cigarettes, was the first major cigarette manufacturer to sign a union label agreement—back in 1933. The spurt in sales which followed helped pull the company out of a slump.

As union sports chairman, Durham has organized softball and basketball teams and set up 26 bowling leagues of Brown & Williamson employes.

His older daughters, Sandra, 19, and Mrs. Janice Compton, 23, are office employes at Brown & Williamson. Attending high school are Carole, 16, and Robert, 15.

Zoo Strikers Return With First Contract

New York—Employes of the Coney Island Aquarium and the Bronx Zoo are back at work, after a 47-day strike, with their first contract with the New York Zoological Society.

Members of Local 1501, State, County & Municipal Employes, they struck after two years of vain efforts to get recognition. Their strike-ending agreement, announced by Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D), provides these benefits for some 600 workers at the two institutions:

- Union recognition, maintenance of membership and a dues checkoff.
- A 10 percent increase in wage minimums for part-time employes, and an agreement that the union, city and Zoological Society would promptly negotiate wages of regular employes.
- Time and a half pay for work over eight hours in one day or 40 hours a week; fully prepaid Blue Cross and Blue Shield hospital benefits, with increased benefits effective next February.

The new one-year pact also provides that the present retirement plan will remain in effect while a joint committee meets over a six-month period to propose improvements, and that regular employes will have seniority status in selecting vacations and in case of a layoff.

The zoo and aquarium were closed during the walkout that started Easter Sunday, but live exhibits were cared for by agreement with the union.

The union recently had signed its first agreement in the New York area with a publicly supported museum or zoological society—the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Negotiations were resumed shortly afterward with the New York Zoological Society at Wagner's urging, and agreement was reached 12 days later.

The AFSCME also has requested three other institutions to start contract negotiations for employes. Dir. Jerry Wurf of AFSCME District Council 37 said the union represents a majority of workers at the City of New York Museum, Brooklyn Museum, and Richmond Zoological Society.

Safety Course Call Issued By AFL-CIO

A call has been issued for the second session of the AFL-CIO National Safety Training Institute, scheduled for July 10-14 in Washington.

Mechanical and physical safety training will be the topic of study, it was announced by Chairman Richard F. Walsh of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health.

In inviting students from affiliated unions, Walsh pointed out that more and more collective bargaining contracts are providing unions with the opportunity to take part in developing safety and health programs, thus increasing the need for qualified personnel.

The institute's first unit covered the introduction to safety training. Later sessions will take up chemical and environmental safety, including radiation, and teacher training in safety. The institute's faculty is drawn mainly from the training staff of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Standards.

Additional information on the institute's program is available from John D. Connors, executive secretary of the standing committee, at AFL-CIO headquarters, 815 16th Street N. W., Washington 6, D. C.

Loss of Jobs Seen in Work Rule Changes

Chicago — Proposals for work rule changes made by railroad management would mean uprooting large numbers of workers from their homes, doubling their work loads and cutting their hourly earnings, Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen has charged.

Addressing 300 BLF&E members attending the union's midwest meeting, Gilbert said one management proposal involving the elimination of a Pennsylvania Railroad terminal at Ft. Wayne, Ind., would adversely affect 233 railroad workers. Of these, he said, 90 would lose their jobs and 143 would be transferred either to Chicago or to Crestline, O.

An engineer assigned to the run, Gilbert charged, would have to work an average of 7.7 additional hours each week, but would have his hourly pay reduced by $2.37.

Declaring that railroad workers "know they are in a real fight," Gilbert said he was hopeful that railroad communities will "wake up to the fact that they, too, are in danger of losing a valuable asset, the railroad worker and his wages."

Steinberg, Curran Head Hotel Group

New York—Four Freedoms Hotels, Inc., a union-backed enterprise designed to deal with housing problems of older citizens, has held its first annual meeting and mapped a major campaign.

The officers of Four Freedoms decided to open a full-time office in New York City and arrange to have participating unions utilize the President Madison Hotel in Miami Beach., Fla., for retirees and other union members.

Pres. Joseph Curran of the Maritime Union was elected chairman of the board of directors and William R. Steinberg, head of the American Radio Association, president.

Steinberg reported to the meeting that, since the President Madison opened last December, the following groups became Class A voting members: NMU, ARA, Operative Potters, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Auto Workers, Ladies' Garment Workers and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Walter F. Scholes Dies in Iowa

Council Bluffs, Ia.—Walter F. Scholes, a union member for 61 years and one of the major architects of the labor movement in this area, died recently in a hospital near Iowa City. He was 78.

He joined the Boilermakers in 1900 when he went to work for the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad near Lincoln, Neb. Later he came to Council Bluffs, where he worked for the Chicago & Northwestern Railway from 1906 until he retired in 1949.

He was a leader in the 1922 railroad strike that firmly established the trade union movement in this area, and was a pioneer in farmer-labor unity. A member also of the Laborers, he had been business agent of Local 1140, was president of the Council Bluffs Central Labor Union for 13 years, was legislative representative of the State Federation of Labor for about 20 years and was the first labor member of the Iowa Employment Security Commission.

EASTERN LABOR PRESS Association conference is addressed by Mrs. Esther Peterson, head of the Dept. of Labor's Women's Bureau; AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler; Assistant Sec. of Labor Jerry D. Holleman.

AWARD IS GIVEN by Eastern Labor Press Association to Saul Miller, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, in recognition of "high place in the newspaper field" occupied by AFL-CIO News as a labor newspaper of record. Left to right, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. George M. Harrison, chief speaker at dinner; ELPA Pres. Arnold Beichman; Miller; ELPA Sec.-Treas. Joseph P. Murphy.

Labor Press Parley Studies World Affairs

Labor and the labor press have done a "tremendous job" in the past and can do even more in the future in focusing union attention on international problems, speakers told the Eastern Labor Press Conference at its 1961 convention.

The importance of full exposure to world affairs was stressed by Roger Tubby, assistant Secretary of State for public affairs; Pres. George M. Harrison of the Railway Clerks, chairman of the AFL-CIO Intl. Affairs Committee; Dir. Michael Ross of the federation's Dept. of Intl. Affairs; and others, including labor attaches in Washington from Canada, Sweden, and the West German Republic.

State Dept. mail has doubled in recent months, indicating a "real hunger for information" on the part of Americans, Tubby told the labor editors. He said it is "most essential for all of us to arouse our people" to the true meaning of international affairs and the effects of racial intolerance on other nations.

A strong U.S. economy also is essential, he said, "for U.S. success in foreign policy."

Harrison told delegates at the convention banquet that labor has moved to meet its responsibilities in world affairs "more realistically than any other segment" of society and the labor press, he said, has done a "tremendous job." The average European nevertheless is much better informed and more concerned about world affairs than citizens in some sections of the United States, he declared.

Saying that America "captured the imagination of the world" in the past with Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points, Franklin D. Roosevelt's Four Freedoms, and Harry S. Truman's Marshall Plan, Harrison called for "bolder and more imaginative programs" to meet world problems in the Kennedy Administration.

Labor Attaches Herman W. Bremer of West Germany and Thorbjorn Carlsson of Sweden told how their governments have encouraged a "full employment" economy. Patrick Conroy, Canadian labor attache, said U.S. and Canadian labor never have been accepted into full partnership with other segments of society and have had to fight the "most militant opposition."

The association presented an award to Saul Miller, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, and the staff of the AFL-CIO News "in recognition of the high place it occupies in the newspaper field" as a labor newspaper of record. It said this high standing reflects the "judgment and ability" of the editors and the devotion to "integrity and the best principles of trade unionism" of the paper's "dedicated staff of professional newspapermen."

The convention re-elected Pres. Arnold Beichman of the Electrical Union World, New York, and Sec.-Treas. Joseph P. Murphy, public relations director of the New York State AFL-CIO. It added James H. Toughill of the IUE News to the executive council.

Extension, Improvements:

Labor Again Backs Defense School Aid

The AFL-CIO has renewed its request to Congress to extend and improve the 1958 National Defense Education Act, declaring its loan and grant provisions for a wide variety of school assistance are needed "to attack the shortcomings of our educational system."

The Kennedy Administration, in addition to calling for continuation of NDEA, has proposed a broad range of measures in the education field, headed by the $2.5 billion aid-to-public-school bill passed by the Senate and pending in the House. Other proposals call for federally-financed scholarships and college construction loans.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew Biemiller, testifying before a House Education subcommittee, said the total Kennedy education program is "excellent" and has the support of organized labor. Enactment of all of the measures, however, would "not do away with the usefulness" of NDEA, which provides loans for needy college students and federal grants for specific grammar and high school programs, he said.

Dr. Sterling M. McMurrin, U.S. Commissioner of Education, leadoff witness at the House hearings, said continuation of the program—scheduled to expire in June 1962—is necessary to make certain that the country does not lose its "momentum toward excellence" in education.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce voiced vigorous opposition to the bill and urged that it be allowed to die next year. Dr. John R. Miles, manager of the chamber's Education Dept., charged the Administration with seeking power to "direct the course of American education."

The bill would:

- Make permanent the student loan program and remove the present $90 million annual ceiling on such loans.
- Forgive 50 percent of the loan for students who become college and university teachers, in addition to those becoming public elementary and secondary school teachers who currently enjoy the 50 percent forgiveness feature.
- Increase from 1,500 to 5,000 the number of annual fellowships for graduate study in education.
- Continue for three additional years the programs of financial assistance for science, mathematics and modern language instruction.

Under questioning by subcommittee members on the controversial question of aid to private schools, Biemiller said that organized labor has "no objection to extending loans to private schools" for the construction of facilities "in those areas that are covered in the present law."

This position, the AFL-CIO spokesman said, was a "logical extension" of labor's earlier support for loans to private as well as public schools for specialized equipment furnished through NDEA.

Biemiller registered the AFL-CIO's "serious objection" to one feature in the measure—a provision for continuing, without change, the present structure of the vocational education programs.

The federation spokesman noted that prior to passage in 1958, the bill was "sharply restricted" by adoption of an amendment offered by Sen. Prescott Bush (R-Conn.) which limited the program to "highly skilled technicians" taking training "necessary for national defense."

He urged that these artificial barriers be removed, and that funds appropriated for this purpose be used "for the training of individuals designed to fit them for useful employment as technicians or skilled workers . . . in fields necessary for national defense or economic well-being."

James A. Brownlow, president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., said that the Bush amendment provisions contributed to "unrealistic confusion" about the thrust of the area vocational training program.

Brownlow, whose testimony was presented to the subcommittee by MTD Research Dir. Paul R. Hutchings, joined the federation in urging that the language be broadened to include skilled workers "and to meet occupational requirements for technical as well as scientific knowledge."

Biemiller told the subcommittee that labor supported extension of guidance and counselling services to seventh and eighth-grade pupils, but declared "we, in common with many educators, are gravely concerned with the quality as well as the quantity of counsellors."

In addition to guidance for the more gifted children, he said, counsellors should give attention to "those at the other end of the scale." He cited, in particular, the nearly 33 percent of high school pupils "who drop out before getting their diplomas."

"This," Biemiller said, "is a staggering figure in an era when skill is such an essential element to a job-seeker; and when our nation's need for skills, all the skills we have, is so pressing."

Ex-Rep. Yorty Elected Mayor of Los Angeles

Los Angeles—Norris Poulson, two-time mayor of this third largest city in the country, was defeated for re-election May 31 in a close race with Samuel W. Yorty.

Municipal elections here are officially nonpartisan, but Yorty is a former Democratic member of the House of Representatives and Poulson is a former Republican member. In the presidential election last November, Yorty declined to support John F. Kennedy, the Democratic nominee, and gave his backing to then Vice Pres. Nixon, Republican nominee.

FDA Upset by False Swiss Cheese Holes

The "man who waters the workers' beer," villain of the labor song by that name, has company now—the man who cuts holes in imperfectly-cured Swiss cheese so he can sell it at a higher price.

The Food & Drug Administration says that top-grade Swiss cheese should get its holes or "eyes" naturally during curing. So-called "blind cheese," without natural holes, is supposed to sell at a lower price. Not only have some manufacturers been faking holes, but they have also been slipping slices of holeless cheese between slices of the top-grade product in cellophane-wrapped packages sold in stores.

The FDA has requested seizure of 2,700 pounds of "misbranded" Swiss cheese and plans a meeting with major producers "to put a stop to this form of consumer cheating."

Church Council Backs Health Care Vote

Defends Endorsement Against AMA Attack

The National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. has defended its recent endorsement of the principle of financing health care for the aged through social security, declaring that religious bodies have a "responsibility for the state of community life."

The council—largest church federation in the nation, representing 34 Protestant orthodox denominations with 40 million adherents—has come under fire from the American Medical Association for its resolution, adopted unanimously by its highest governing body.

Speaking for the AMA, Dr. W. W. Bauer labeled the pronouncement "high-handed," and accused the church federation of engaging in "political jockeying." Another medical association member accused the church board of being "pink-tinged."

The Rev. William J. Villaume, executive director of the council's Dept. of Social Welfare, said the action on the economics of medical care was taken because churches "not only have the right but also the duty" to express judgments in "any area of life where moral, ethical or spiritual values are involved."

At the same time Rev. Villaume described as "obviously exaggerated" charges by the medical lobby that adoption of the Administration-supported Anderson-King bill would lead to "socialized medicine," and violate "the privacy of the examination room."

"Prepayment of health care via social security for the years of one's retirement is not 'socialized medicine,'" Rev. Villaume declared in an open letter to his AMA critics, and the proposed health care legislation, contrary to charges by the medical lobby, "expressly guarantees freedom of choice of both physician and hospital."

The council's resolution pointed out that most persons over 65 cannot afford the high cost of adequate health care, and that "voluntary health plans are unable to offer coverage for even a fraction of health care needs at charges [the elderly] can possibly afford."

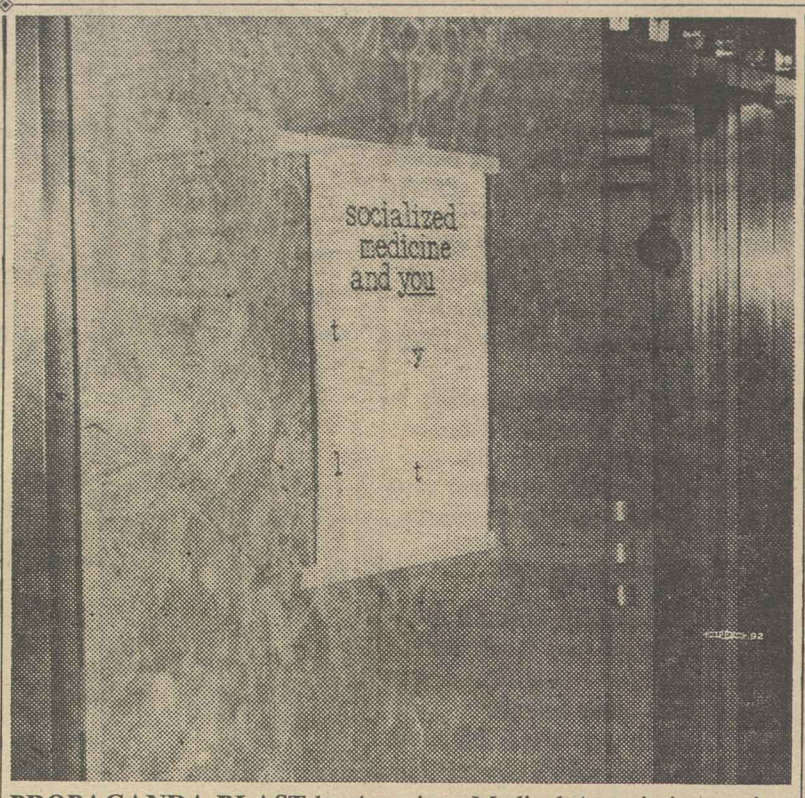
It declared that while it "is to be preferred" that health needs be met "without resort to governmental action," the problem "can be met only by united, socially planned action."

Rev. Villaume said that two of the council's sections—the Dept. of Social Welfare and the Dept. of Church & Economic Life—collaborated in a study of the problem and in preparation of a draft statement which was discussed and revised at a series of subcommittee meetings. The revised statement was then mailed to the 376 members of the general committees of the two departments.

It was subsequently adopted at regular meetings of the two departments, Rev. Villaume said, without "one negative vote nor one abstention." Later it was approved "without dissent or abstention" by the executive board of the Div. of Christian Life & Work, following a presentation by Dr. Roscoe P. Kandle, commissioner of health for the state of New Jersey, before its unanimous approval by the general board, highest governing body of the church federation.

Rev. Villaume said the medical lobby's "obviously exaggerated statements" attacking the medical care legislation "undermine the faith of the public in doctors."

At the same time, he ran the record of AMA opposition to social legislation over the past 30 years—including a 1930 attack on federal grants to aid states in reducing infant and maternal mortality; opposition in 1939 to old age and unemployment insurance; 1949 opposition to inclusion of disability benefits under social security; and initial opposition to voluntary health insurance—all of which the AMA tagged with the same "socialistic" label it has now applied to health care for the aged.



PROPAGANDA BLAST by American Medical Association against legislation to provide health care for the aged under social security is displayed prominently in lobby of Baroness Erlanger Hospital in Chattanooga, Tenn. Hospital officials have refused to remove poster, which calls health measure "socialized medicine." More than $5 million in federal, state and local funds have been poured into construction projects at the Chattanooga institution.

Tax-Assisted Hospital Parrots AMA Dogma

Chattanooga, Tenn.—The facilities of a tax-supported hospital here have been appropriated to carry on the American Medical Association multi-million-dollar propaganda assault against legislation which would finance health care for the aged under social security.

Posted conspicuously in the lobby of Baroness Erlanger Hospital is an AMA poster which attacks the Administration-backed Anderson-King bill as "socialized medicine."

The poster is the one the medical lobby has circulated widely among doctors, urging that it be posted in their waiting and consultation rooms to convince patients that the "doctor-patient relationship" would be destroyed by passage of the health care bill.

The propaganda piece is being displayed in Baroness Erlanger Hospital despite the fact that more than $5 million in federal, state and local tax funds have gone into three major construction projects to enlarge its facilities.

Of this amount, more than $2.3 million has come from the federal government in direct grants under the Hill-Burton Act which helps subsidize hospital construction and expansion; $500,000 has came from the State of Tennessee; and the remaining $2.2 million has been raised through the sale of city and county bonds.

The chairman of the hospital board of trustees, Roy McDonald, has rejected protests against the poster—similar in content to the AMA's newspaper advertisements which have been denounced as "false and misleading" by Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff and Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D.-N. M.), one of the sponsors of the bill.

McDonald, owner of a chain of Chattanooga grocery stores and owner and editor of the Chattanooga Free Press, has indicated the poster will remain on display despite the protests.

Three major construction projects—including one begun in January of this year and scheduled for completion early in 1962—have been involved in the outpouring of federal, state and local tax funds for the hospital.

The first, a 104-bed addition, cost $1.7 million, of which $692,000 came from Hill-Barton funds; $305,000 from the state; and $707,000 from city and county bonds.

The second, a 66-bed addition costing $801,000, was made possible through the use of $410,000 in federal funds and $189,000 in state grants.

The current project, a 154-bed addition, will cost $2.5 million. The federal government is putting $1.25 million into this expansion, and the remaining $1.25 million will come from city and county bond issues.

Labor Backs Proposal For Atomic Power

The AFL-CIO has urged Congress to approve an Administration request for funds to equip the world's largest atomic reactor, now being constructed at the Atomic Energy Commission's Hanford, Wash., plant, to generate needed electric power for the Northwest.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in a statement to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, said the dual-purpose reactor would be an important step "toward the goal of breaking through the barrier to achieving nuclear electric power competitive in cost with conventional power."

When the reactor project got under way during the Eisenhower Administration, private power companies voiced strong opposition to proposals to utilize the vast quantities of waste heat from the plutonium facilities to generate electricity.

The Joint Congressional Atomic Energy Committee, backed by the AFL-CIO, successfully prodded the AEC to agree on a construction plan which would permit either plutonium production only or, through addition of electrical generating features, would make the reactor a major source of electric power.

Biemiller told the committee that "labor is heartened by the affirmative approach . . . initiated by the new Administration" in requesting $95 million in supplemental funds to begin ordering electric power equipment. The present timetable calls for the start of power production by October 1964.

Biemiller strongly endorsed a provision of the bill which calls for the power to be marketed by the Secretary of the Interior through the Bonneville Power Administration. He pointed out that industry and workers in the area have already been hurt by "brownouts" caused by inadequate power from existing facilities.

He said that the multi-purpose reactor "will hasten the day when an electric utility can make a decision . . . as to whether it should plan its next power installation to be fueled by natural gas, coal, hydro or nuclear material."

Medical Group Ordered To Admit Physician

Trenton, N. J.—The New Jersey Supreme Court has ruled that a county medical society violated public policy by barring a qualified doctor from membership.

The court ordered the Middlesex County Medical Society to admit as an active member a licensed doctor who had received full medical training but was being denied admission because he had not studied the full four years at a school accredited by the American Medical Association.

To the medical society's contention that there is no "judicially enforceable right of admission to membership," the court said:

"When the county society engages in action which is designated to advance medical science or elevate professional standards, it should and will be sympathetically supported." When its actions have no relation to these objectives, it went on, "but run strongly counter to the public policy of our state and the true interests of justice, it should and will be stricken down."

The court said the county society "possesses a virtual monopoly over the use of local hospital facilities" and by excluding the doctor from membership can "preclude him from successfully continuing his practice of obstetrics and surgery and to restrict patients who wish to engage him as an obstetrician or surgeon in their freedom of choice of physicians." It continued:

"Public policy strongly dictates that this power should not be unbridled but should be viewed judicially as a fiduciary power to be exercised in a reasonable and lawful manner for the advancement of the interests of the medical profession and the public generally."

Major Role Seen For New Party

Oslo, Norway—A prediction that by the middle of the summer Canada will have a new political party of the democratic left, with union members participating, was made by Executive Vice Pres. Stanley Knowles of the Canadian Labor Congress in a speech to the 20th congress of the Norwegian Federation of Trades Unions.

Knowles, CLC fraternal delegate to the convention, said the new party "can become one of the two major parties in our country." It means, he contended, that "sooner or later we should form a government and thus be able to move on toward achieving the ideals that inspire the free labor movement in all parts of the world."

Passage of FEPC Bill Assured in Illinois

Springfield, Ill.—A state fair employment practices bill providing jail terms for violations has been passed by the Illinois Senate, virtually assuring enactment.

The House already has passed a stronger bill, which is expected to be dropped. In previous sessions, the House has consistently approved FEPC legislation which the Senate consistently killed.

Five Republican senators joined with 26 Democrats to pass the new bill. Lt.-Gov. Samuel H. Shapiro, who steered the legislation, worked out a compromise in a conference of Republican and Democratic leaders which made passage possible. The vote was 31 to 23, with 30 votes needed to pass.

The compromise provides that employers of 100 or more persons would be covered during the first two years, employes of 75 or more in the second two years and employers of 50 or more thereafter.

Of 90,000 employers in Illinois, only about 3,800 have at least 100 workers. About 7,800 have 50 or more employes.

Shapiro called the measure "a milestone of progress," the Illinois State AFL-CIO supported the bill.

Enactment would make Illinois the 21st state with an enforceable FEPC, the last northern industrial state to act. Attempts to pass such legislation have been made in every legislative session since 1947.

The bill would create a Fair Employment Practices Commission and give it $100,000 of state funds to operate. It would act on sworn complaints made within four months after an alleged offense. There would be investigation, an open hearing before the commission or a hearing officer and a right of appeal to Circuit Court. Conciliation efforts could be followed by a directive. If an employer or labor union official refused to comply with a court order, he could be jailed for contempt.

Five members of the commission would be appointed by the governor, to serve without pay, but an executive director would be engaged for $15,000 a year.

Throwback in Florida

AMERICAN WORKERS seeking to exercise their right to organize into unions and bargain collectively still face threats of shooting, physical violence and blacklisting.

In a throwback to the dark ages of industrial relations where employers maintained arsenals and workers were slain as they fought for human dignity and a decent standard of living, the Cone Brothers Contracting Co.—Florida's largest road-building firm—has been found guilty by a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner of a long list of acts keyed to violence and threats against workers.

The Cone case, in which the trial examiner cited among other acts threats to deal with strikers "like shooting at a covey of birds," is not an isolated example, although by and large anti-union employers have fallen back on intricate legal maneuvering to frustrate organizing and bargaining.

The Cone case reflects a different group of employers which is still not ready to accept trade unionism as an essential ingredient in a democratic society. Until all employers understand that free, responsible, strong unions are vital to the nation's survival and progress, there can be no meaningful industrial peace and stability.

Histadrut's Influence

THE AMERICAN TRADE UNION movement's historic dedication to the creation and strengthening of free trade unions in all lands is based on the keystone principle that a democratic society can flourish only where there are free trade unions.

From this approach has flowed aid from American labor to Histadrut—the Israeli federation of labor—long before the creation of the State of Israel. Histadrut's dedication to the creation of a social democracy has been instrumental in the flourishing democracy that is Israel today.

Now, on its 40th anniversary, Histadrut is involved in turn in spreading the gospel of free trade unionism. With the aid of the AFL-CIO it has established the Afro-Asian Institute of Labor Studies in Tel Aviv to train labor leaders from the new nations of Asia and Africa in the methods and philosophy of free trade unionism.

It is this extension of the ideals and ideas of free labor to all corners of the earth that is the ultimate answer to the totalitarian forces seeking to stamp out democracy and freedom in the new nations.

The Church Unafraid

THE AMERICAN MEDICAL Association's campaign to block legislation to provide health care for the aged has reached an almost incredible new low—an attack on the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. for endorsing the principle of financing such care through the social security system.

To the credit of the church council, in the face of the demonstrated potency of the AMA and of its attempts to manipulate opinion, it has courageously replied by running the record on the AMA's opposition to social legislation over the past 30 years. And it has underscored the basic point—that religious bodies have a "responsibility for the state of community life."

The AMA attack on the Anderson-King bill cannot stand the test of logic, fact or responsibility. To accuse the church federation of engaging in "political jockeying" because it opposed the AMA's shallow position is to pull the medical profession down another notch in public esteem, a development unfair to most physicians.

'Just Pretend They're Birds'

Sales Tax vs. Income Tax:

Anguished Cry of States' Rights Usually Originates in the Wallet

WHEN GOV. JOHN PATTERSON of Alabama took the position that federal authorities had no right to come into his state to enforce federal law without an invitation from the state, he was taking an extreme "states' rights" position. But the Alabama governor's cry of "states' rights" is symptomatic of what has been happening for many years—the use of the slogan to justify local defiance of the federal government and the constitution itself.

Usually the "states' righters" paint the federal government as a kind of foreign enemy that has imposed itself on the country, despite the fact that the federal government is entirely the creation of a free electorate. More than once members of Congress—themselves part of the federal government, with a powerful vote to determine what the federal government can and cannot do—have given us this picture of the very structure of which they are a part.

The sincere belief that a great country like the United States can continue indefinitely to govern itself through a loose confederation of 50 states, each fiercely and jealously determined to go its own way, is forgivable if not understandable.

But what is unforgivable is the use of the "states' rights" slogan as a gimmick to get your own way and to turn your back on "states' rights" when it suits your purpose to do so.

This is nothing new in American history. Creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission was largely the result of this kind of "double-play" by 19th Century railroad management. For half a century railroad companies had displayed the utmost arrogance in their operations, playing favorites, disregarding safety precautions, buying politicians right and left. As a result, more and more states began to regulate the operations of such railroads as crossed their boundaries.

RAILROAD MANAGEMENT strongly resented this state interference with their operations and complained to the courts bitterly. Eventually the Supreme Court upheld them and state regulation of interstate commerce was barred. Yet it was obvious that the railroads simply could not be trusted to regulate themselves and Congress stepped in, creating the ICC.

Railroad management reacted instantly. It had said that the states had no right to regulate interstate commerce, but now it no less protested against federal regulation. In the end, Congress had to strengthen the hand of the ICC in its long fight to keep the railroads under control.

Then, only a few years ago, the railroads fought strongly for federal ICC control over the railroad industry. The reason? Local and state bodies need transportation and have fought against permitting the railroads to curtail or drop local passenger service. The ICC was far more sympathetic to railroad demands for abandonment, and so this time railroad management was all for federal rather than state control.

This cynical shifting from federal to state "rights" over any activity, depending upon personal interests, can be duplicated in many areas of American life.

This is especially true when it comes to taxation. Business organizations invariably favor "states' rights" whenever the federal government understakes projects involving expenditures. The states and local communities should carry out these projects, the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers exclaim.

The reason for their opposition is obvious. State and local taxation is regressive—that is, it takes the form of heavy sales taxes, which means that the lower income brackets bear a disproportionate share of the burden. Federal taxation is mostly based on income taxes—that is, it is progressive. The higher the income the heavier the burden.

Senator Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), a wealthy man in his own right, put his finger on the issue recently in an address before the 49th annual meeting of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Washington when he said:

"MANY OF THOSE who inveigh against the federal government are really not devotees of states' rights as such; they are interested in the incidence of taxation, and they know that they fare better when needed services are financed through local property taxes and state sales taxes. It is not that local democracy is purer democracy; it is just cheaper—for them."

The passion that so frequently surrounds the whole subject of "states' rights" may not be passion at all. Most likely it stems from an evaluation of who is most likely to give you your way—the federal government or the state and local governments. As such, the "states' rights" cry should always be coldly analyzed by the thoughful citizen (PAI).

Morgan Says:

Free World Economic Planning A New Weapon in the Cold War

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

BEHIND THE SCENES, out of sight of the ceremonial wreathed lanes, out of earshot of the press briefings, and in a sense out of line as far as the public is concerned, a lot of things are going on within the western alliance which in the end may have much more effect on western policy than the Kennedy-de Gaulle and the Kennedy-Khrushchev conferences.

Morgan

One reason that these events have not emerged into clear view is that they deal basically with economic problems which are enormously and confusingly complicated. Another reason is that though in world affairs economic and political problems are all and always tangled up together, we have insisted on regarding our competition with the Communists primarily in military terms. This is an American national weakness which should be corrected without delay, and the corrections should begin at the White House because the public, and for that matter Congress too, need urgently to understand the change of emphasis.

The fact is that although we must remain militarily strong and maintain a striking power, including the terrible nuclear weapons, sufficient to deter big war, we can never successfully compete with the Communists until the western allies tackle their economic problems and gradually their political problems more in unison.

Intelligent people in the Kennedy Administration have known this for a long time and are aiming at this target. The trouble is that our aim is too easily deflected. When a crisis comes, we react—or so it looks on the surface—in classic terms of military defense. It is the tangible items of missiles or the more far-fetched one of moon shots which receive the biggest play and usually get the most sympathetic attention from Congress because through history man when threatened has reached for his rocks or his rifle, his bowie knife or his bombers.

But now we have a new weapon of economic cooperation and planning. The difficulty is that we have not thought of this enough as an offensive weapon in the cold war, but rather as a defensive tool to solve isolated problems. Gradually this concept is changing and it is in this framework that we would regard the biggest economic story in Europe these days, namely the earnest but agonizing preparations of the British to end their Commonwealth isolation and parenthetically, maybe in a sense, end the Commonwealth as an economic entity and become an integral part of the European community.

BEHIND THIS DEVELOPMENT, and tied to it, is a multitudinous bundle of other problems involving such things as Brazilian coffee, New Zealand's butter and the political stability of the emerging African countries. For the first time on such a large scale, the U.S. government is trying to look at these matters all as pieces in one mosaic—as fragments fitting into an overall problem.

Under-Sec. of State for Intl. Economic Affairs George Ball has been living in a suitcase for months with this problem, making the rounds of European capitals with his plans. He has had enough preliminary success so that a conference may be convened before the end of July on the subject of textiles. The trick is to secure expanding markets for the underdeveloped countries as they industrialize without grievously damaging the textile industries in developed countries—especially our own. One answer—planned and approved long-range production.

If and when the British join the Common Market, and they are moving inevitably if somewhat apprehensively into it, there will be much more to it than scrawling their signature on the Treaty of Rome which calls for common tariff and other policies among the original signatories which are France, Italy, West Germany, Belgium, Holland and Luxembourg.

Former French African colonies can already freely export their tropical products such as coffee, cocoa and lumber to these inner six countries. Canadian wheat, Australian wool and New Zealand butter would not enjoy such equal treatment if Britain, a vital preferential market to them now, joins the European Common Market. Moreover, Latin American exports like coffee already are hurting from Common Market protective tariffs. This weakens, not strengthens, the economy of the Western Hemisphere.

What the U.S. hopes to do, and it is a colossal job, is to help work out gradually a series of quota agreements and tariff compromises that will minimize the pain of adjustment. The goal —viable economies in Europe, Africa, Latin America and elsewhere whose own strength and stability will provide a resistance to Communism.

Washington Reports:

Distressed Areas Aid Agency Plans Initial Loans in 6 Weeks

FIRST LOANS BY the Area Redevelopment Administration may be made within the next six weeks, according to the administrator of the office set up in the Dept. of Commerce following the passage of the authorization act.

William Batt, Jr., the administrator, also said in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 460 radio stations, that the ARA plans to move carefully rather than with haste.

"This is a long-term program," he asserted. "The problems in these coal and railroad towns were long in developing and they are not going to be solved overnight."

Seymour Wolfbein, deputy assistant Secretary of Labor and head of the new Office of Automation & Manpower, said on the same program that the office—with the cooperation of government, labor, management and the schools—hopes to "minimize and even prevent the displacement that takes place when automation occurs."

Batt pointed out that in administering the Area Redevelopment Act "we don't want industries running from an area to take advantage of a labor surplus and lower wages in another."

"We want soundly conceived, locally-based industry or branch plants of expanding national industries to locate in these areas," he added.

WOLFBEIN GAVE examples of industries in which labor and management worked together to train workers for new jobs so that the installation of automated equipment would not result in job losses. He cited a contract between the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and a company producing machinery to automate radio stations.

"The company agreed that for every piece of automated machinery sold, it would put 5 percent of the gross sales price into a fund to help workers displaced at the radio station," he said.

Wolfbein emphasized the department request to Congress for funds "for the training and retraining of workers and helping them relocate to jobs and areas of economic opportunity."

He said the bill was intended particularly to aid workers over 45, "the group hit hardest by automation." Wolfbein added that the department is seeking "to beef up our employment service activities to make studies of areas of job opportunities so we can advise, counsel with and guide people who get training," so they won't be trained for non-existent jobs."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE NEW CHAIRMAN of the Republican National Committee, Rep. William E. Miller of New York, is one of the Young Turks who led a revolt in 1959 against the long-time GOP leadership of former Speaker Joseph Martin and installed Rep. Charles A. Halleck of Indiana as House Republican floor leader. Martin seemed to many observers as both partisan and conservative, but clearly he wasn't aggressive enough about it to suit many GOP members, and he got along somewhat too reasonably with his old friend, Democratic Speaker Sam Rayburn, and Miller helped throw him out.

An oddity is that Martin himself used to be Republican National Committee chairman and he was generally accounted to be shrewd and pragmatic. "Pragmatic" is also the word for Miller, if the record can be trusted.

Miller and Halleck did not move to oust Martin from the party leadership until they were sure they had the votes. And the word is that Miller as National Committee chairman, although a strong supporter of Vice Pres. Nixon in the GOP nominating convention of 1960, is now totally neutral as between Nixon, Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York and Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona for 1964.

He says he thinks that Rockefeller and Goldwater, in fact, are not so totally opposed in political philosophy as to preclude the possibility of a Republican ticket for the presidency and vice presidency in 1964 that would include both of them.

WHATEVER THE INTERESTING speculations raised by this bit of conjuring, it seems perfectly possible that Miller will have the good fortune to preside over the committee during an election in which the Republican Party may pick up a few more House seats to add to the 21 they gained, net, in 1960.

The 1962 election is an offyear contest, and the party out of power nationally has nearly always been able to capitalize on accumulated dissatisfactions with the Administration to score some gains. Only one time in this century, indeed, has the party that held the White House won more House and Senate seats in an offyear election than it had in the presidential year—and this was in 1934, after the first two years of the New Deal.

A failure of the Republicans to gain marginal House seats next year would have to be put down as something of an upset. The situation is pleasant for Miller to contemplate, however much it may seem to the Kennedy Administration to jeopardize its already thin margins in the House for domestic and foreign programs that should have been passed years ago.

AN EVEN MORE interesting fact is that the GOP's political command has been demonstrating since the election that it is vigorous, aggressive and more imaginative than for many years.

It has done a highly skillful job at spreading the insinuation that Democratic "bosses" in the "big cities" counted Nixon out last November. It hasn't explained how it happened that the suburban vote around many large cities—which presumably is not "boss" controlled—jumped sharply toward the Democratic ticket, nor how the Democratic city "bosses," if they are such experts at vote frauds, failed to carry their wards for Gov. Stevenson over Pres. Eisenhower in 1956, but the innuendo of fraud in 1960 has been planted.

Still, the old Guard Republicans are losing some votes from their once-solid ranks on Capitol Hill. Pres. Kennedy has succeeded in detaching a significant number of GOP members to vote for his minimum wage and depressed areas bills, and presumably will detach more in the House for the school bill.

Another factor Miller must deal with as chairman is the hard truth that from the GOP Leadership Conference in Congress the spokesmen are Halleck and Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois—the "Ev and Charlie" of a television show that sounds as Old Guardish as anything from 20 years ago. It somehow seems fitting that Ev and Charlie perform in the Old Supreme Court Chamber, where in 1850 an Old Guardish court handed down the Dred Scott decision upholding slavery throughout the nation.

JOBS FOR THE JOBLESS is the objective of the Area Redevelopment Administration, whose administrator is William Batt, Jr., left, and the Office of Automation & Manpower, whose head is Seymour Wolfbein, deputy assistant Secretary of Labor. These heads of new federal agencies were interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

How to Buy:

Gyp Food Freezer Promotions Now Aimed at Worker Families

By Sidney Margolius

THE PLAIN-SPEAKING new chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, Paul Rand Dixon, warns that freezer-plan promotions are springing up again, and on an alarming scale. These plans promise to supply a freezer and all your food at a price as tempting as it is false; for example, all the food for a family of four, including payments on the freezer itself, for less than $13 a week.

What's most dangerous is that this new resurgence of freezer plans seems to be aimed directly at working families. In Illinois, one promoter even advertised himself as the "working man's friend."

The "working man's friend" proved to be a treacherous chum indeed. A group of families snared by this promotion appealed to the AFL-CIO to warn others. Here's how they were fooled:

- The "plan" advertised that the families would get their food at 51 cents a pound. But the packages were delivered with no weights marked. The families never did know how much food was delivered.
- The salesmen explained the freezer would cost only about 95 cents a month to operate. But the families say the electricity cost proved to be closer to $3 a month.
- The families were told they would save enough on their food over two years to pay for the freezer. They were told they would be charged "wholesale" prices. "But as nearly as we can figure it," they reported, "we were paying retail prices."

The irony of this new development is that the public was warned repeatedly against exaggerated claims several years ago when the food plans first sprang up. At that time the FTC and state law-enforcement agencies finally stopped exaggerated claims of savings, although not until much financial harm had been done to a lot of families who could least afford it.

ONE OF THE EXTRA COSTS the freezer-plan promoters tend to hide is the finance charge, one investigation found. Often the buyer is asked to sign separate contracts—one for the freezer and the other for food supplies. The promoter generally turns over the contract for the freezer to a bank or finance company. The finance charges are then added to the cost. If the plan folds up, or you yourself decide it is not worthwhile, you must continue to pay the installments to the bank or finance company.

Freezers available from regular retailers without any food-plan tie-up are cheaper this year; in fact, some models are running $15-20 below last year's prices. But can even a freezer bought at a reasonable price without any misrepresentation save you money on food?

Generally the experience is that a freezer is more a convenience than a cost-cutter, although it can be a money-saver for a large family if the family really works at the economy possibilities.

For example, assume you buy a 600-pound freezer for $300 —a typical price this year. You also must pay a typical finance charge of about $48 on such a purchase on 24-month installments, a true interest rate of 15 percent a year. Here, then, are the annual costs of owning and using this freezer:

	Lbs. Stored a Year
	600	1,200
Depreciation (15-year life expectancy)	$23.20	$23.20
Interest on investment at 3% ..	9.00	9.00
Repairs, at 2% of cost	6.00	6.00
Power, at 2½c per kwh	20.00	21.25
Packaging, at 2c per lb.	12.00	24.00
Annual Cost	$70.20	$83.45
Cost per lb.	11.8c	.07c

These figures demonstrate that:

- If you use a freezer only occasionally or below its capacity, costs cancel the potential savings.
- A large family that can turn over the contents of a 600-pound freezer twice a year or more may be able to save money.

If a freezer does have money-saving possibilities for your family, a large one pyramids the savings at little extra cost.

Otherwise, a combination refrigerator-freezer (they're sale-priced in June and July) will give you some of the advantages of a freezer without the expense of a separate large appliance.

University Survey:

Studies Show Family Assets Often Scant

STUDIES OF THE PERSONAL WEALTH of American families, made by the University of Michigan Survey Center since 1946 show that one family in three (32 percent) has very limited financial assets.

These families have less than $1,000 in personal savings, government bonds, corporate stock, real estate, unincorporated businesses, or personal equity in their home or farm (market value less mortgage debt).

At the other extreme, one family in 10 has total assets worth more than $25,000. An additional one family in five owns assets worth $10,000 to $25,000.

Except for very high income families, the center reports, the total assets of most families approximately equal their annual income. In other words, a family earning approximately $7,000 income will have about that much accumulated in savings accounts, government bonds, equity in their home, and so forth. The data is summarized in a new center publication, "1960 Survey of Consumer Finances."

Diversification of assets is far from common, however. The majority of families with small or modest assets have their savings in only one or two types of assets.

Similarly, among wealthy families, investments tend to be concentrated in one or two types of assets, such as corporate stock, unincorporated businesses, real estate, or personal savings. However, most of these families also have a large equity in their homes.

ONLY ONE FAMILY in six among those with substantial assets (one family in 12 nationally) would "profit" from inflation. Their investments in stock and real estate substantially exceed savings in banks, government bonds, and other liquid assets.

There is some relationship between ownership of common stock and the expectation of price increases over the next few years, the center notes. But this relationship is not strong.

"It is not true that people who expect inflation distribute their investments in an inflation-proof way, while those who expect stable prices invest primarily in liquid assets," the report notes.

While most families do not invest in a wide range of assets, they also avoid putting all their financial eggs in one basket. Even those whose assets are most exposed to the threat of inflation are partly or entirely protected against it through continued investment in their homes, the SRC observes.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Katie Breaks into Print, Thanks To Her Flair for Letter-Writing

By Jane Goodsell

IF MY DAUGHTER KATIE ever becomes famous (Secretary of State, maybe, or the first woman to reach the moon) I know what I'm going to do. I shall publish a volume of her collected letters.

Katie has been writing notes to me since she was six (she's now 13) and I've tucked them away just in case Simon & Schuster might be interested at some later date. Even if this doesn't happen, I wouldn't part with those letters for a million—well, anyway, they beat bronzed baby shoes for putting a lump in my throat.

"Dear Mommy I luv you. Luv Katie."

"Dear Santa, Ive been a good girl and for Crismas I wuld like a bed for my doll and a bib and some shoes and pants for my doll and a little hat and some dipers that will stay up and some socks and a little dress for my doll and some skates for me and that is all exept for a kitty. Love, Katie."

"Dear Mommy, my tooth came out. Please tell the fairy. Tell her to leave the dime right by the tooth. Tell her not to take the tooth away because I want to take the tooth to school. Tell her to be sure to remember the dime. Love, Katie."

"Happy Valentine's Day to
Mommy who is happy and gay
And I would not say her temper
Was bad all day."

"HAPPY BIRTHDAY MOMMY! Don't feel bad because you are old. Lots of people are older than you are."

"Dear Mommy, I'm sorry I got mad. Don't say anything about this letter to anybody. Even me. Love, Katie."

"Dear Mommy, it is just neat at camp. I get to sleep in the top bunk till Wendesday and guess what? We go swimming twice a day. My concilor's name is Miss Limp and she is quite nice. I live in piglet. I forgot my toothbrush so I am using my finger which works fine. I miss you very much. Can I stay two more weeks? I am making you a beaded bookmark. Love, Katie.

"Dear Santa, I would like a party dress in case I get asked to a dance and a bra and some seamless nylons and some lacy slips and an electric hair dryer and a great big bottle of Indiscreet. Love, Katie."

'Briefing Session':

Farm Experts Clash On Kennedy Goals

Officials of two farm groups clashed sharply over the Kennedy Administration's omnibus farm program during "Briefing Session," the public affairs television program co-produced by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

According to Marvin L. McLain, assistant legislative director of the Farm Bureau Federation, the Kennedy program would lead to higher consumer prices and excessive government regulation. Wesley McCune, director of public relations for the National Farmers Union, called the Administration program a "constructive and comprehensive approach" that would reverse the trend of declining farm income.

The Kennedy plan proposes putting under federal quotas, market orders and price supports all crops that farmer committees decide need regulation. It also proposes easier credit for farm modernization and extension of the Food for Peace program. In operation, committees of farmers would consult with the Dept. of Agriculture and work out programs of control for particular crops. The programs would then be submitted to a referendum of all farmers and, if passed by a two-thirds majority, would go into effect barring a congressional veto.

McLain called this procedure "unconstitutional" and asserted that it bypassed Congress.

"A good Democratic senator told me," he said, "that if this bill passed they would just fold up and go home. What is the use of taxpayers paying their way in Washington if you are going to let somebody else write the ticket?"

"This senator is certainly badly mistaken about his function and should have read a civics book before he came to Washington," McCune retorted.

He said that the Secretary of Agriculture now has the authority to start price support programs on various crops without going to Congress.

"This program actually restricts him somewhat," he said. At present, only a few feed grains are under government supports.

McLain, former assistant secretary of agriculture in the Eisenhower Administration, blames government controls for much of the present agricultural problem.

"The government has messed up in many areas where guarantees were put in during the war and farmers, then, did things that they would not have done otherwise," he said. "The farmers are the goats of this deal."

McCune, an Agriculture Dept. official during the Truman Administration, again disagreed.

"They [the Republicans] took programs that were sound, which gave the farmer a device for adjusting his supply to his demand in return for a fair price and broke the price support level down," he maintained. "That merely induced larger production, larger surpluses, and lower farm prices."

Taking note of their differences and those of other farm organizations, the program moderator, Edward P. Morgan, asked McLain and McCune to explain the existence of the separate farm groups.

McLain said differences of opinion over the extent of government control of production account for the disunity. McCune answered by asking another question: "Why are there so many different religious denominations?"

U.S. Employe Unions Endorsed in Oregon

Salem, Ore.—The Oregon legislature has asked Congress to pass a union recognition bill for federal employes.

The joint memorial pointed out that federal workers lack the protection of labor laws and union contracts, including procedures for adjustment of grievances.

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) inserted the memorial in the Congressional Record.

Goldberg to Appear on Briefing Panel

Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg will be one of the guests on the next program in the series, "Briefing Session."

With him on the panel will be Edgar Kaiser, chairman of the board for Kaiser Industries Corp. The elder of Henry Kaiser's two sons, Edgar Kaiser directs a $1.8 billion world-wide industry.

Goldberg and Kaiser will discuss the problems and opportunities that automation has brought. The program's title is "Automation — Peril or Progress?"

Washington news analyst Edward P. Morgan is the moderator.

Rubber Union Settles with 3d Big Firm

New York—A three-year contract with wage increases and other benefits for 25,000 workers in 18 plants has been agreed to by negotiators for the Rubber Workers and the United States Rubber Co.

Subject to membership ratification, the new contract follows the outline of agreements recently reached with two other members of the industry's "Big Four" companies—Goodyear and Firestone. Negotiations for 14,000 workers at B. F. Goodrich plants are continuing.

The U.S. Rubber pact provides wage increases of 7.5 cents an hour effective June 5, 1961, and another 7 cents on June 1, 1962, for workers in tire plants at Detroit, Indianapolis, Los Angeles, Chicopee Falls, Mass., and Eau Claire, Wis.

Employes of 13 diversified products plants get 3.5 cents more this year and an additional 4 cents next year. Non-tire plants are in Philadelphia, Chicago, Mishawaka and Washington, Ind., North Bergen, N. J., Santa Ana, Calif., Providence, R. I., Passaic, N. J., Naugatuck, Conn. (3 plants), Woonsocket, R. I., and Painesville, O.

Besides more money, the new contract allows workers to draw improved supplemental unemployment benefits, calls for an eighth paid holiday per year, and has special provisions for job protection and grievance procedure.

Court Reopens Beck Tax Case

San Francisco—The 9th U.S. Court of Appeals has granted a Justice Dept. request to reopen arguments in the conviction of former Teamster Pres. Dave Beck on charges of income tax evasion.

Beck currently is appealing a five-year jail sentence and a $60,000 fine imposed for failure to pay taxes on funds allegedly embezzled from the union.

The government's request to reopen the case stemmed from a Supreme Court decision in the case of Eugene C. (Jimmie) James, former secretary-treasurer of the expelled Laundry Workers. The court ruled that embezzled funds were taxable, but said that a 15-year-old decision casting doubt on this issue prevented conviction in cases during the interim.

Hearings in the Beck case were set for June 15.

Peace Corps Tapes Available to Unions

Copies of two tape recordings featuring discussions of labor's role in the Peace Corps proposed by Pres. John F. Kennedy are available to local unions and central bodies for use in membership meetings.

The tape recordings—which run approximately 13 minutes each—feature Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., and Harry Pollak of the AFL-CIO Dept of Intl. Affairs.

Free copies may be obtained from Harry W. Flannery, AFL-CIO Radio, 815 Sixteenth St., N. W., Washington 6, D. C. Further information on labor participation in the corps is available through Pollak, who may be reached either at AFL-CIO headquarters or the Peace Corps.

Big Role for Unionists Seen in Peace Corps

Trade unionists can play a major role in the work of the Peace Corps in the newly emerging nations of Asia, Africa and Latin America, three AFL-CIO advisers to the corps and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), chief Senate sponsor of the Administration's Peace Corps legislation, have agreed.

The contribution in skills and maturity which unionists can make in this area was discussed on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, "As We See It," by Humphrey; AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers; Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept.; and Harry Pollak of the federation's Dept. of Intl. Affairs, labor's liaison with the corps.

In the two-part broadcast, Humphrey emphasized that while the Kennedy Administration wants "the pep, vitality, enthusiasm and imagination of young people," the Peace Corps "is not merely a youth project."

"We also need maturity; we need experience," he continued adding that unionists with "a vast amount of experience in union organization and the leadership of local unions . . . are equipped to be directors, group leaders or staff leaders for teams of Peace Corps personnel."

'Important' Role Wanted

Haggerty, who with Beirne serves on the National Advisory Council of the Peace Corps, emphasized that labor "wants to play an important role in this worldwide project." He expressed the hope that as programs begin to emerge "we will be able to have a greater part in the program, not just on the national but on the local levels as well."

Thousands of union members, the BCTD president said, "would love to be in the program . . . and make a contribution to it."

Beirne declared that in addition to college students, the Peace Corps needs "dedicated people" like "the retired worker who has spent a lifetime building his community, building his home, building his family and who knows the ideals which have brought America to the high pinnacle of success it has."

The CWA president pointed out that his union, in cooperation with the Postal, Telephone & Telegraph Intl., has worked for the past two years on a special project in Ecuador. This project, he said, made it clear that in order to aid the underdeveloped nations, Peace Corps members will be subjected to physical hardships and therefore "need the tough stuff of the early pioneers of America."

'Greater Appreciation'

Pollak, who was assigned by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on a two-day-a-week schedule at the Peace Corps, reported "a greater appreciation" among the leaders there of the role which labor can play.

Unionists, he said, "want the basic facts" about the programs which are contemplated. "They are not satisfied in getting a general request to go abroad," Pollak emphasized; "they want to know specifically" what they are expected to do.

Humphrey, a long-time supporter of an overseas program similar to the Peace Corps, pointed out that since labor understands organization "its personnel in the Peace Corps could play a part in the organization of voluntary groups in the host countries." While "voluntarism is a part of the American pattern of life," the senator said, "regrettably, it is not so much a part of many other areas of the world."

Over-Regimentation Deplored:

ILO Meet Stresses Basic Human Rights

Geneva, Switzerland—Worker, government and employer delegates of the 97-nation Intl. Labor Organization are meeting here in its 45th Intl. Labor Conference to promote better living standards the world over.

A 118-page report by David A. Morse, the ILO director general, on labor relations is the subject of the general discussion that will continue through the three-week session while committees hammer out new international standards on hours of work, housing and the other technical questions.

Shorter working hours, improved worker housing, and employment problems and policies are some of the wideranging items on the agenda.

Rudy Faupl of the Machinists is again the U.S. worker delegate, backed by a seven-member delegation from the AFL-CIO or its affiliated unions, serving as advisers.

"A satisfactory labor relations system is one which furthers respect for fundamental human rights," Morse, a former U.S. assistant secretary of labor, said in his report.

He listed these rights as: "The freedom of labor, freedom of assembly and association, free choice of work and satisfying conditions of work."

Cites Red China

Morse pointed an accusing finger at Communist China to illustrate how the forcing of workers into a collective way of life can backfire.

Red China has gone further with its "people's communes" in attempting to regiment the workers than any other Communist country, he said. But the Chinese leaders have had to admit that they have met resistance and even "sabotage," he added.

"However spectacular may appear the advantages from a system founded on coercion," the ILO official said, "the sense of responsibility and initiative of the individual will always be sapped, whereas these latter qualities are essential for a spirit of progress and the desire to strive for a better future and must be present if real and lasting progress is to be achieved."

Workers will no longer accept any economic policy unless "it satisfies or sets out to satisfy human needs and the desire for social advancement," Morse emphasized.

"Labor relations in the years to come will involve continuing problems of adjustment to changes in the technical and economic organization of production, and of equitable distribution of the fruits of economic progress," he warned.

Leadership Urged

"A new burst of creative energy and imagination is needed," he said in an appeal to the delegates to lead in working out "responsible patterns for future labor relations in a changing world society."

The conference was preceded by a two-day meeting of the ILO's Governing Body at which it was decided to appoint a committee to investigate a complaint by Ghana against Portugal.

Ghana asked the ILO to determine if Portugal has effectively abolished forced labor in its African territories as it pledged to do when it ratified the ILO Forced Labor Convention in 1957.

The complaint was the first filed by one ILO member against another since the organization was founded in 1919.

With 15 new African states attending for the first time, Africa will figure prominently in the conference's debate. Nigeria has filed a resolution calling for the withdrawal from the ILO of South Africa because its racial discrimination policies contradict "the principles, aims and purposes of the ILO."

Entertainment Unions Set Americas' Group

San Jose, Costa Rica—An Inter-American Federation of Entertainment Workers has been tentatively set up by 67 delegates from 17 Western Hemisphere countries after a week-long meeting here.

The delegates, returning home to seek approval of affiliation, planned another meeting, probably later this year, at which the organization will be formally established.

Stanley Ballard, secretary of the U.S. Musicians, was chosen coordinator of the conference, which was sponsored by the Musicians Union of Costa Rica and the National Musicians Federation of Mexico.

The delegates drew up a proposed constitution and by-laws which provide for an executive committee chosen on a geographical basis, and adopted a declaration of principles and a proposed program.

The federation unites unions in the musical, theater, variety, motion picture, television, radio, recording and similar fields and is intended to "foster, encourage and promote true and genuine cooperation."

It will seek to insure that the member-unions—and, in turn, their members—are properly protected in their professional relations, especially when artists perform in countries other than their own. It is expected that reciprocal arrangements will be worked out for exchanges of artists, that protections will be established in "runaway" areas and that royalty rights will be safeguarded.

In addition to Ballard, delegates from the United States included Pres. Richard F. Walsh of the Theatrical Stage Employes; Pres. Herman Kenin of the Musicians; Administrative Sec. Jackie Bright of the Variety Artists; Executive Sec. Daniel F. Conaway of the Television & Radio Artists; Pres. George Chandler and Pat Somerset of the Screen Actors; Robert Gilbert of the Screen Extras; Milton Weintraub of the Theatrical Press Agents & Managers; Al Hardy of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Pres. George W. Smith of the Broadcast Employes and Hy Faine of the Musical Artists.

Labor Asks Ending Of Tax Loopholes

mushroomed in recent years, the AFL-CIO spokesman said, the bulk of these investments has been in the industrialized nations of Western Europe, with few American firms setting up facilities in the "capital-starved" countries of Africa, Asia and Latin America.

As a result of the movement of American capital to the industrialized countries, he said, U.S. firms have been "exporting U.S. jobs . . . at a time of rising unemployment" in this country.

Accurate estimates of the employment impact of overseas migration of capital are not available, Ruttenberg said. He pointed out, however, that in 1957 some 3 million workers were employed by U.S. plants operating overseas. A "rough approximation," he said, would be that between 250,000 and 500,000 American jobs "may have been lost" as a result.

"The removal of tax deferral on income earned in developed countries," he said, "would therefore help retain some jobs in the United States, as well as create some more jobs by encouraging investment in the U.S. rather than in Western Europe."

'Overhaul' Endorsed

Ruttenberg urged the committee headed by Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) to support the Administration proposals to overhaul the present credit extended to corporations for tax payments to foreign countries.

At present, he pointed out, the tax paid by a foreign subsidiary to a foreign government is deducted twice—first from the profits and then from the actual tax bill paid the U.S. government. Under the Administration plan, these tax credits would continue as long as the total tax paid to the foreign government and the U.S. Treasury amounted to the current 52 percent corporation tax.

"Eliminating the leakage from this credit provision," Ruttenberg said, "may produce a revenue gain estimated by the Administration at $110 million a year."

He also called for support of the White House plan to end the exemption from taxes on the incomes of American citizens working and living abroad. At the same time, to give an incentive to Americans to work in the less-developed countries, he said, Congress should exempt the first $20,000 of income for those who remain in one of the emerging nations for 17 out of 18 months.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce assailed the Administration tax proposals as "costly and complex" and said they would force American "investments to shrink or withdraw."

Walter A. Slowinski, appearing for the chamber, accused the Administration of "pressuring industry to curtail its private foreign investment and reduce its competition with foreign competitors on foreign soil."

The CofC recommended that taxes on foreign income be "liberalized," and that a foreign tax credit "providing greater relief" be enacted.

SCHOOL TEACHERS PICKET New York Board of Education headquarters a day before the board, after months of delay, announced a referendum June 16-23 on the question: Do you favor collective bargaining for teachers? The United Federation of Teachers, backed with a telegram of support from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, is urging the school system's 40,000 teachers to vote yes. The picketing was part of its campaign for an election to pick one bargaining agent.

Gains Won in Sperry Rand 2-Day Strike

New York—Members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers returned to work after a two-day strike at 13 plants of the Sperry Rand Corp. with a new contract containing major improvements for 10,000 workers.

At the same time 10 IUE locals voted approval of a contract for 21,000 workers at plants of the Radio Corp. of America.

The Sperry Rand pact, negotiated in its final stages by top company and IUE officials, provides wage increases of 2.5 percent for each year of the three-year contract; broadened vacation and sick leave provisions; full costs of the major medical plan to be assumed by the company; improvements in recall rights and job security.

At the Sperry Gyroscope plant, management agreed to improve the existing pension plan and to set up a joint committee to study the subcontracting of work outside the plant.

Most significant in the settlement, the IUE said, was the action of all Sperry Rand locals in holding fast. Their unity won a contract providing wage increases every 12 months instead of every 18 months as the company had sought, and a common expiration date for all contracts. Another factor was the refusal of an engineers' union to cross IUE picket lines.

The RCA agreement also has a three-year term. It provides wage increases of 2.5 percent a year; a boost in the pension benefit rate and maximum years of service; increased monthly pension allowances; a free hospitalization and medical plan for workers retiring after 15 years of service; increases in sickness and accident benefits, and other improvements.

Potofsky to Receive Honorary Degree

New York—An honorary degree of doctor of humane letters will be awarded Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers at the graduation and ordination exercises June 18 of Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion.

John D. Rockefeller 3d and Howard Mumford Jones, Abbott Lawrence Lowell professor of the humanities at Harvard University, are among others to be awarded degrees.

Labor Backs IRS Numbers For Taxpayers

The AFL-CIO has endorsed an Administration request that all taxpayers be assigned account numbers to help simplify operations of the Internal Revenue Service.

The federation's position was spelled out by Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in a letter to Rep. Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee.

The assigning of account numbers, Biemiller wrote, will make it possible for the IRS "to bring together all the tax information pertaining to one particular taxpayer," and thus insure "more effective enforcement of the tax laws."

The AFL-CIO spokesman said the adoption of account numbers will pose few problems, since social security numbers which workers now have would serve this same purpose for the IRS system and "between 85 and 90 percent of all individual tax returns already indicate" social security numbers.

SAG Urges Break On Taxes for Actors

The Screen Actors Guild has urged Congress to enact legislation that would bring tax equity to entertainers and athletes who "enjoy a peak earning capacity for only a relatively short period of time."

In a statement filed with Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee, the Guild declared that taxing performers for earnings in peak years with no regard for years of low income constitutes "fundamental discrimination."

The SAG statement, filed by Assistant Executive Sec. Chester L. Migden on behalf of the union's board of directors, said that the productive careers of entertainers, athletes and other specially trained individuals "are necessarily short-lived and highly remunerative for only a brief period of years."

The entertainment union said that "on grounds of equity and economic incentive, there is a definite need for some form of averaging" income taxes over a period of years. Canada, it pointed out, has found such a system to be "notably workable and effective."

SAG also joined with the AFL-CIO in supporting Pres. John F. Kennedy's proposal that the total tax exemption granted on the earned income of American citizens residing abroad should be repealed.

Such a move, SAG said, would have some "braking effect" on the current trend by domestic film producers to make motion pictures abroad—a trend, it asserted, which "has served materially to curtail the earnings potential of the great majority of the Guild's membership" and has reduced the employment of American technicians, musicians and other film workers.

The actors' union, representing 15,000 motion picture performers, endorsed the Administration's plan that would allow Americans to avoid taxes on the first $20,000 in income earned in less-developed countries.

Honorary Degree Awarded Goldberg

Cincinnati—Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has been awarded an honorary doctor of humane letters degree by Hebrew Union College here at the 77th ordination service of the historic rabbinic school.

He was honored for his accomplishments "as a gifted lawyer, labor negotiator and dedicated public servant."

Meany Cites Israel's Example in Mideast

ions, through sundry voluntary organizations, the Israelis control their public and private economic institutions . . . they have control of the policies of their country at home and abroad. What is important and decisive here is that this control is contested in free elections."

In accepting the gold medallion of Histadrut, Meany pledged that American labor would "redouble its efforts" toward hastening the day of lasting peace, freedom and social justice "for all the peoples of the Middle East."

When peace comes to the Middle East—"as it must come one day"—Meany emphasized, "the experience of the workers and the people of Israel in applying modern economic methods and the methods of modern political democracy will be of the greatest help to the workers and the people of Iraq, Jordan, Syria, Egypt and other countries" in the area.

The 40th anniversary award to Meany won praise both for Histadrut and the federation president from Pres. Kennedy, former Pres. Truman, Israeli Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion and Histadrut Sec.-Gen. Aharon Becker in messages to the dinner.

Kennedy wrote that "we in America can be proud of men like George Meany who exhibit in their life and leadership a high regard for responsibility."

Kennedy's Message

"We can be confident in his representation of our trade union ideals, both before our own people and those of other lands," he added. "This is a well-deserved tribute."

Ben-Gurion, in a personal letter brought from Jerusalem by Isaiah Avrech, American representative of Histadrut, said the support for the Israeli labor movement by American labor is in the great tradition of backing "every movement for national liberty, every struggle for freedom, every battle for the dignity of man." The prime minister hailed Meany as "one of the outstanding labor leaders of today."

Tribute to the federation president was paid at the dinner by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, who hailed Meany's "life of devotion" to the cause of freedom and to "upholding the creed that free labor is a basic part of a free society." Meany, he added, is a "pillar of strength" to the free trade union movement because he is aware that "peace cannot be won by disengagement."

Others hailing Meany and Histadrut were Rabbi Jacob J. Weinstein, chairman of the National Committee for Labor Israel, sponsor of the dinner; former Israeli Ambassador Eliahu Elath, co-chairman of Histradut's Afro-Asian Institute for Labor Studies in Tel Aviv; Israeli Labor Attache Nathan Bar Yaccov, representing Israeli Ambassador Avraham Harmon; AFL-CIO Vice Pres. George M. Harrison, chairman of the dinner; Claude Jodoin, president of the Canadian Labor Congress; and AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther, David Dubinsky and Jacob S. Potofsky.

In the day-long conference preceding the dinner, sessions of the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut were devoted to the theme, "Histadrut in a Changing World."

Cooperation Cited

Elath said he considered the "cooperation established within the last few years between Israel and some of the newly created states in Africa and Asia as among the greatest achievements in the short history of our state and as giving expression to one of the basic tenets of the Jewish concept of universal brotherhood and peace."

Avrech stressed the key role that Histadrut played in the creation of Israel and declared that the need today was to preserve the "pioneering spirit and the constant sense of purpose and devotion" to strengthen Israel as a "bulwark of liberty and progress in the Middle East."

Leon H. Keyserling, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under former Pres. Truman, declared that Israel and Histadrut point the "middle way" between totalitarianism and laissez-faire economics, having substituted "social-mindedness for old-fashioned socialism." They embrace, said Keyserling, "collective efforts under freedom but reject collective forces under totalitarianism."

Noah Lucatz, member of Histadrut's Intl. Relations Dept., delivered an analysis of the experience of the kibbutz movement in Israel and its great contribution to the leadership of the country's democratic institutions.

Guild Leader Takes Minnesota State Job

St. Paul, Minn.—Richard Wanek, former president of the Newspaper Guild of the Twin Cities, has assumed the post of head of the Minnesota Conciliation Service. Wanek, statehouse reporter for the St. Paul Dispatch & Pioneer Press for 10 years, was a member of the Guild's local executive board at the time of his appointment by Minnesota's Gov. Elmer L. Andersen (R).

Labor-Industry Unit Backs Retraining are wiped out and "whose skills are made obsolete."

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Stanley H. Ruttenberg, testifying before a Senate Labor subcommittee headed by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), pointed out that joblessness has hovered just below the 7 percent level for more than six months.

The federation spokesman urged that action on the proposal be taken in the context of the federal government's responsibility, under the Employment Act of 1946, of "achieving full employment opportunities." As essential as training and retraining are, Ruttenberg said, they "won't result in getting people jobs if there are no job opportunities."

In this regard, he renewed labor's call for a $1 billion program of federal grants to stimulate a "vigorous" program of short-term, local public works projects — which could be launched within 90 days and completed within a year—to help pump new vigor into the economy.

The Clark-Holland bill would tackle the job displacement problem on three broad fronts—aiding the unemployed who need retraining before they can find new jobs; the jobless who must move to new areas where their skills are in demand; and the employed who need added training to meet changing industrial conditions.

The bill would provide:

- A minimum weekly federal allowance that would not exceed the average weekly unemployment compensation paid in the state. The allowance would cover a maximum of 52 weeks while the worker attends vocational school.
- An on-the-job training program under which trainees would receive federal benefits equal to 50 percent of a state's jobless benefits plus wages from the employer—with the total not to exceed $46 a week.
- Allowances covering 50 percent of the cost of moving to available job areas would be paid to workers completing vocational training under the bill, and workers idled for more than six months who have bona fide offers of long-term employment in other communities.
- A plan whereby employed workers needing to improve their skills to meet technological changes would be entitled to attend training school, with the government bearing half the training cost.

In expressing organized labor's support of the proposal, Ruttenberg urged that training be geared "to the skills needed for the 1960s and 1970s—not the skills that were needed in the 1930s and 1940s." He said the provision to establish a special research division in the Labor Dept. would help the government to "keep abreast of changes" and thus to "anticipate the skills that will be needed in the years ahead."

Because of the sharp differences between existing unemployment compensation programs in the several states, the AFL-CIO spokesman said, retraining allowances under the bill would range from a low of $20 or 28 percent of the average wage, in North Carolina; to $40, or 47 percent of the average state weekly wage, in Wyoming.

He urged an equalization formula that would set retraining allowances at the average unemployment compensation benefit the worker had been receiving, or the average unemployment compensation benefit in the state, or 40 percent of the average weekly wage in covered employment—whichever would be the largest.

Ruttenberg stressed the successful training programs developed over the years by labor-management cooperation and urged that they be utilized, along with vocational school facilities, under the new program.

Under the on-the-job training program, he cautioned that the use of U.S. funds might "tempt employers to reduce the amount of wages" paid trainees, and called for "special protections to avoid undermining wage levels." The federation spokesman urged that standards be established so that limits would be placed on the number of trainees, and that safeguards be set up "so trainees will not be engaged in actual production work."

Relocation Allowances

On relocation allowances, Ruttenberg declared that organized labor was a "strong and ardent supporter" of the recently passed Area Redevelopment Act which is geared to bring jobs to workers in stricken communities.

However, he said, there may be instances "where it will not be possible to attract new industries," and that "under these circumstances, allowances ought to be paid to help a worker move to a community where there are jobs."

Goldberg told Holland's subcommittee that there is the "utmost urgency" for enacting the program to give the Administration "tools with which to assist workers who lack adequate training or whose skills have been made obsolete . . . to become fully productive."

Emphasizing the need for retraining, he said that "at the same time that old jobs are being wiped out, new ones are being created."

"Today's unemployed are faced with want ads calling for persons engaged in transistorized circuitry, inertial guidance, ferret reconnaisance, human factor science, gyrodynamics, microminiaturization, and data telemetry—job titles all but unknown a half dozen years ago," he said.

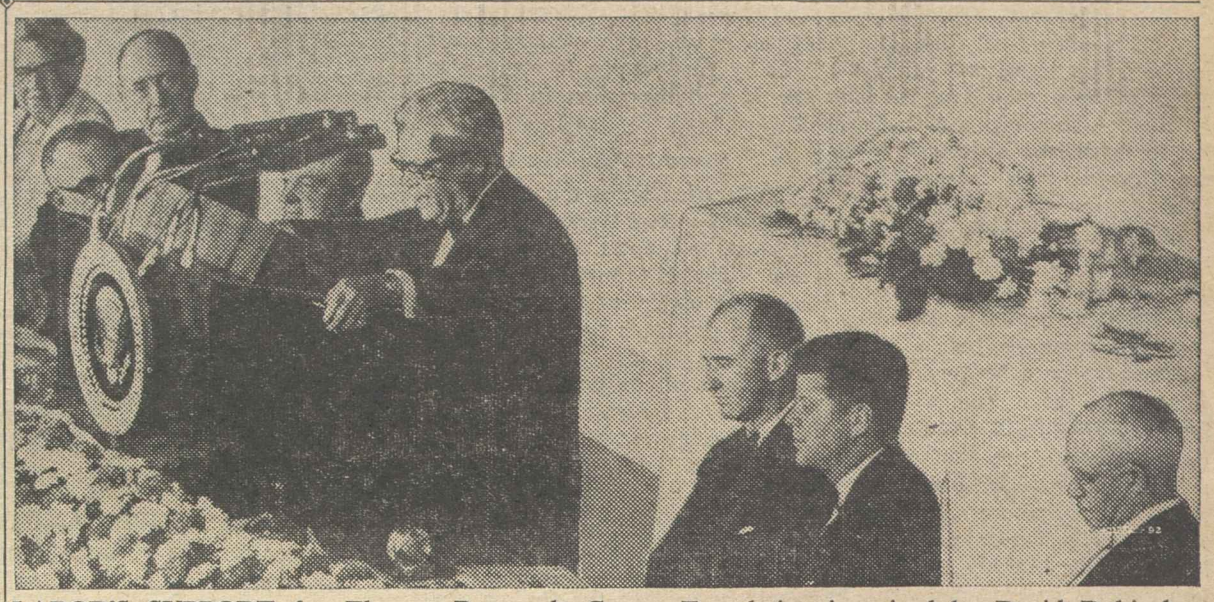
The support for the program from the labor-management advisory committee came during a meeting devoted to the study of methods for achieving recovery from the recession, full employment and a satisfactory rate of economic growth.

The unanimous action came in the wake of an earlier policy recommendation from the tripartite panel for a joint assault by government, industry and labor on the automation impact, which included a call for "broad new retraining programs" by both government and private facilities to help workers displaced by technology and newcomers to the work force to acquire new skills.

Stage Employes' C. G. Cooper Dies

Los Angeles—Vice Pres. Carl G. Cooper of the Theatrical Stage Employes, business agent of Stage Employes Local 33 since 1934, died suddenly of a heart attack at his home here.

Born on a midwest farm, he first went to work at the age of 13 for a theater in Indianola, Ia. He moved to San Diego, Calif., in 1907 and joined Local 122 there in 1910. He also was a member of Hollywood Grips Local 80. In 1941 he was named an international representative of the union and was elected an international vice president the following year.



LABOR'S SUPPORT for Eleanor Roosevelt Cancer Foundation is voiced by David Dubinsky, president of Ladies' Garment Workers and a vice president of the AFL-CIO, at fund-raising dinner in New York honoring Gen. Omar N. Bradley, chairman of the foundation's board of trustees. The foundation also presented Humanitarian Service Awards to Dubinsky and Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther. Pres. Kennedy was among the notables who addressed the 1,500 guests who contributed more than $600,000 to the fund drive. Left to right are: Mrs. Roosevelt, Adlai E. Stevenson, Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, Bob Hope, Frank Pace, Jr., dinner chairman, Kennedy and Bradley.

Farm Labor Ban During Strike Upheld

Sacramento—The California Supreme Court has overturned judicial rulings which forced state authorities to send strikebreakers through farm worker picket lines at huge corporate vegetable and fruit ranches.

The 5-to-1 decision was welcomed by the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee and organized labor generally as a key factor in coming harvests.

The state Dept. of Employment several months ago had refused to refer farm workers to ranches and orchards struck by the AWOC.

In one instance, Superior Judge Warren Steel of Yuba County ordered the department to send workers to the pear orchards of the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp. In another dispute, Superior Judge A. B. Ware of Butte County ordered workers referred to a Tom Bowers peach operation.

The state agency appealed, and its right to refuse to refer workers to farms where a dispute is in progress has been upheld. The state agency operates under federal regulations governing the state-federal employment service which protect workers on strike or locked out from being replaced by strikebreakers furnished by the state agency.

Carey, ILG Endorse Tighter Disclosure Act

The Ladies' Garment Workers, which administers more than 140 welfare and pension plans, has strongly endorsed Administration proposals to tighten the reporting and enforcement provisions of the 1958 disclosure law—and has suggested additional "teeth" which could be added to the act.

The ILGWU testimony before a House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) contrasted sharply with the position taken by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. A CofC spokesman said the proposed amendments are "unwarranted" and would "unduly burden" administrators of welfare funds.

Wilbur Daniels, assistant to ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky, said the union backs provisions for more detailed reporting by administrators "since we have nothing to hide."

Daniels said the disclosure provision of the law should be broadened to cover "possible conflicts of interest which are now hidden from public view." He cited cases where relatives of interested parties have received salaries, fees or commissions from welfare plans.

Earlier Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers warmly endorsed giving "far stronger powers of investigation and enforcement to the Secretary of Labor."

Carey, who testified on behalf of both the IUE and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., charged that some companies have received substantial dividends from pension and insurance programs and have concealed this fact from the employes. He cited one company which charged its employes 75 cents per month per $1,000 for life insurance when its actual cost over a five-year period ranged between 30 and 35 cents. Analysis of the reports filed with the Labor Dept. did not show this overcharge, he said.

Administration proposals to tighten the Welfare & Pension Plan Disclosure law are based on the original AFL-CIO-backed bill introduced by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) in 1958. The Douglas bill was passed by the Senate but drastically watered down by the House.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the Roosevelt subcommittee at the opening of hearings that the 1958 law "failed to include essential provisions for adequate enforcement."

chance to choose representation by the United Federation of Teachers, an affiliate of the AFL-CIO American Federation of Teachers.

He pointed out that the board's committee—consisting of George W. Taylor, David L. Cole, Walter Gellhorn, Mrs. Clara Tead and George Kraut—had recommended a straight-out vote to select a bargaining representative and said the committee, representing "the highest degree of competence and dedication to the public interest," deserved commendation for seeking to provide "a sensible method by which teachers can freely choose their own representative."

The school board's rejection of this proposal, the federation president declared, was an act of "irresponsibility which would be expected from an anti-union employer in private industry, not a public body in the nation's largest city."

The decision, he said, was an attempt by the board to "place a roadblock in the achievement of collective bargaining for teachers."

He pointed out, however, that the roadblock can be overcome if the teachers "in overwhelming numbers" vote in the affirmative on the referendum the school board set up, and can demonstrate that "they want their own representatives to bargain for them in achieving higher salaries and better conditions."

Meany in a telegram to the UFT said, "I salute the . . . federation in its efforts to achieve this goal. With your spirit and the support of millions of organized workers throughout our country, I am confident you will lead the teachers to ultimate victory. The nation is watching you. . . and I pledge my support."

Office Employes Win Vote at Blue Cross

New York—The Office Employes in an election conducted by the State Labor Relations Board, have won bargaining rights for some 100 enrollment and sales representatives of New York City's Blue Cross plan.

OEIU Local 153 reports that its next step will be a drive to organize 2,000 Blue Cross and Blue Shield office and clerical employes in the city.

Kennedy Urges Overhaul Of Jobless Benefit Program

Major Rise Proposed in Payments

By Gene Zack

Pres. John F. Kennedy has proposed to Congress permanent overhaul of the federal-state unemployment compensation system in a move designed to "alleviate the suffering" of unemployed workers and their families and to "help stabilize the economy" by boosting the purchasing power of the jobless.

The program would establish federal standards, below which the states could not fall, on the amount of jobless benefits; would provide federal aid for all long-term unemployed who have a substantial attachment to the labor force; would provide a standby temporary extension of the program for automatic use in recession periods; would cover 3 million additional workers; and would raise the tax base from its present level of $3,000 in earnings to $4,800.

The bill, however, contains no standard for the states on the duration of benefits, although for several years the labor and public members of the Federal Advisory Council on Employment Security have recommended that benefits be paid for a flat 26 weeks.

In messages to Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and House Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.), Kennedy said the measure carries out a pledge, made in his first State of the Union Message, to recommend a program of "permanent improvements" in the jobless pay program.

"Although the bottom of the recession has been passed," the President wrote, "there are still 4.8 million Americans out of work and 900,000 of them have been unemployed for more than six months."

Kennedy said that the Adminis-

Meany Asks Strengthened Bill:

U.S. Training Plan Termed 'Essential'

A federal program to retrain and relocate workers whose skills have been made obsolete by automation, and to upgrade other workers to meet industrial change, is "essential" to economic recovery and full employment, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has declared.

Testifying before a House Labor subcommittee, Meany said the federation "heartily" endorsed the principle of the Kennedy Administration's proposed four-year, $700 million program to achieve this goal, but urged that several of its key provisions be materially strengthened.

The AFL-CIO president called specifically for safeguards against abuses which would result in "recruitment of labor at sweatshop wages," protection against the substitution of trainees for regular production workers, a more generous formula for calculating trainees' allowances, greater priority for older workers, and a "general strengthening and revamping" of the U.S. Employment Service.

At the same time, he called for addition of a section which would clearly bar any type of bias in the training, retraining and relocation programs.

Discrimination Cited

Noting that the Employment Service will have an important role in administering portions of the program, Meany said "we are aware that some local offices . . . practice discrimination."

He also acknowledged that "there is some discrimination in apprenticeship training," and added:

"We know that much must be done in joint employer-union apprenticeship training to assure fair

Housing Bill Wins 64-25 In Senate

The battle over housing and urban renewal legislation has shifted to the House in the wake of Senate passage, virtually intact, of Pres. John F. Kennedy's broad program aimed at clearing slums, rebuilding the nation's cities and stimulating the lagging housing market.

Before final passage, by a lopsided 64-25 margin, Administration forces scored a major victory by restoring most of a key provision—knocked out in earlier debate—to permit long-term mortgages for middle-income families.

The section—which Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.), floor manager for the bill, termed the "heart" of the measure—was put back in by a 47-42 vote. Favoring restoration of all but the section's original no-down-payment provision were 42 Democrats and four Republicans; opposed were 15 Democrats and 27 Republicans.

In its final form, the bill makes it possible for a family in the $4,-

RETRAINING AND RELOCATION of workers made jobless by automation and industrial change is essential to U.S. economy, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified before a House Labor subcommittee. Meany is shown talking to Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), the subcommittee chairman, left.

Seen Ending Delays:

Labor Backs NLRB Reorganization Plan

A Kennedy Administration proposal for reorganizing National Labor Relations Board procedures would help end "unnecessary delays" which "usually work against the union or individual employe, and in favor of the employer," the AFL-CIO has declared.

Testifying before the House Government Operations Committee, Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris said the federation is in accord with the general purposes of the plan, under which the board would delegate to trial examiners the authority to make decisions in most unfair labor practice cases.

Harris said that while the labor law is designed to bar unfair labor practices by both unions and employers, it provides for mandatory injunction procedures against such acts by unions without setting up similar proceedings against management, "no matter what irreparable injury" may be done to employes.

This is "discriminatory treatment," the AFL-CIO spokesman said, and is "highly unfair" to workers and their unions.

Spokesmen for both the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers sharply criticized the Administration proposal on delegation of authority.

Eugene A. Keeney, speaking for the CofC, said the plan would endanger the right of labor and management to full legal process and would give examiners "vast decision-making power." He urged that the board either be limited to hearing cases of national importance or that it be abolished and replaced by administrative courts.

The NAM's spokesman, Harvey Crowe, also called on Congress to seriously consider limiting the labor board to the functions of conducting representation elections and prosecuting unfair labor practice cases in federal district courts.

Harris cited statistics showing that in the first six months of 1951, the average time for pro-

Immigrant Construction Strikers Win Ontario Labor Act Change

Toronto, Ont. — A massive work stoppage that virtually halted work on $250 million worth of houses and apartments has forced the Ontario provincial government to make sweeping changes in its Labor Act.

The government has conceded that the act does not work in the construction field and has agreed to set up special tribunals to enforce union-management agreements in the industry.

The government action came after a two-week demonstration sparked by 10,000 immigrant construction workers banded together under the banner of 12 international building trade unions.

90 Percent Closed Down

Five unions made up of recent immigrants shut down 90 percent of the apartment and housing projects here to force contractors to honor agreements previously reached and to sign union contracts for another 5,000 workers.

The government action came after Premier Leslie Frost admitted that the "newcomers have a case" and that he would step in to give these workers "a square deal."

The government action means there will be strict supervision of wages, hours and working conditions of immigrant labor in the residential construction field.

It also scraps some of the onerous clauses of the previous labor act that had plagued the organizing drives of established local unions.

Charles W. Irvine, international vice president of the Plasterers, hailed the government reform as "a milestone in North American labor relations."

The immigrants, most of them Italians in Canada less than three years, had produced evidence of more than 1,100 contract violations by their employers. The violations included cheating on wages and hours of work, fraudulent pay checks, unsafe working conditions and failure to pay mandatory vacation wages.

Injunction Voided on Switchmen

Buffalo—Switchmen's Union Pres. Neil P. Speirs had hailed a U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision reversing a federal court injunction barring a switchmen's strike on 17 railroads as "a good, strong decision in support of the democratic right of union members to participate in their union's affairs."

Speirs commented at SUNA headquarters here after the 2d Court of Appeals in New York unanimously upheld the union's right to strike the railroads over a wage inequity between the hourly paid switchmen and other operatopportunity to all. We in the AFL-CIO have a clear policy against discrimination and have made great strides toward stamping it out in our own ranks. Yet we have always acknowledged the need for public support in this effort."

To improve the bill, Meany said, and to bring it "in line with national policy" enunciated by the Administration, the measure should contain a provision "that the selection of trainees and workers being relocated shall at no time be influenced by race, color, creed or national origin."

Speaking against the backdrop of 6.9 percent joblessness in May—"a slightly higher unemployment level than at the worst point of the recession last year"—the AFL-CIO president said the "first and most pressing requirement is a sharp increase in the total number of job opportunities."

Without a "vigorous government program to reduce unemployment," he said, "any retraining program will face an unanswerable question—retraining for what? Unless there are enough job opportunities, a retraining program in itself can be of only limited value."

Meany said that the bill's language which "reaffirms the preeminent importance of achieving maximum employment, production and purchasing power in accord with the national commitment. . . of the Employment Act of 1946" clearly links the retraining program to an overall national effort to put America back to work.

The Administration bill—sponsored in the Senate by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and in the House by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), chairman of the subcommittee before which Meany appeared — calls for a multi-pronged attack on the job displacement problem. It provides:

- A minimum weekly federal allowance, not to exceed a state's average weekly unemployment compensation, payable for a maximum of 52 weeks while workers attend vocational school.
- An on-the-job training program under which trainees would receive a maximum of $46 a week —made up of wages from the employer plus federal benefits equal to 50 percent of a state's jobless benefits.
- Allowances covering 50 percent of the cost of moving qualified workers to available job areas.
- A plan whereby employed workers needing to improve their skills to meet technological changes would be entitled to attend training school, with the government bearing 50 percent of the cost.

Benefits Vary

Meany, declaring that federal retraining allowances are "vital" to the program, said the bill "falls short" in linking these payments to average unemployment compensation benefits in each state, since benefits range from $20 a week in North Carolina to $40 in Wyoming.

"It would be questionable practice," he said, "for federal payments to be based on such inconsistent state standards." He urged an alternative formula that would set up payments not to exceed the highest of the following:

- The last weekly unemployment compensation benefit received by the trainee before entering the program.
- The average weekly unemployment compensation benefit in the state.
- Forty percent of the average weekly wage in covered employment in the state.

At the same time he urged revision of the on-the-job payment provision to insure that the program is not "used to undermine existing wage levels." Meany urged that the program be set up in this fashion:

If the trainee is doing actual production and maintenance work, he should receive the regular rate for such work. If he is a learner, he should receive at least the learner's hourly rate, as established by the Wage-Hour Administration. For the remaining hours spent in occupational training classes, he should receive a pro-rata share of the federal retraining allowance.

Meany objected to language in the bill designed to separate the retraining benefits from unemployment compensation, declaring that the way the section is drawn up, "the effect might be to encourage states to strike people from the unemployment compensation rolls."

He urged that new language be inserted that would prevent the states from disqualifying trainees from receiving jobless payments.

'New Program' Urged

The AFL-CIO president said that the "much-needed retraining effort must be a new program," and added that "merely to do more of what we are already doing in vocational training would be a mistake." He continued:

"The vocational schools in most parts of the country have not been able to respond to the needs of the 1960s. All too often, these schools are still teaching the skills of the 1940s. The vital new skills of this age of automation are frequently ignored."

He hailed the "flexibility" of the Administration program, under which, he said, public vocational training institutions will be enlisted where they can be "used effectively," but that "where they fall short of the required standards" they would be "bypassed" in favor of such private facilities as labor-management apprenticeship training programs.

Retraining Support Cited by Meany

Elation that "a distinguished voice of management and the American labor movement are united" in a conviction that highly skilled workers are needed in the age of automation was expressed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in his testimony before a House Labor subcommittee in support of the Kennedy Administration's worker retraining program.

He read into the record an excerpt from the management-oriented Babson's Business Service which said:

"Corporations, business groups, unions and the government must accept the deep responsibility of creating training regimens, both public and private, that will bring forth the type of worker that will be needed as automation swirls ahead."

Surveys Analyzed:

Drop in Unemployed Seen Long Delayed

By David L. Perlman

Labor Dept. experts, taking a closer look at employment-unemployment statistics for May, found numerous classic signs of an economic upturn but held out little hope there will be any significant drop in the high level of unemployment before fall.

The mixed economic picture developed from an analysis of the latest surveys showed:

- A sharp increase of nearly 150,000 jobs in heavy manufacturing, largely auto and steel. But one out of every eight steel and auto workers was still unemployed—a higher proportion than a year ago.
- No change in the figure of 900,000 workers who have been jobless for more than six months, despite a seasonal drop in the number jobless 15 weeks or longer to 1.9 million. The latter figure is a postwar high for May and more than double the total for the same month in 1960.
- The number of jobless workers receiving benefits under regular state unemployment insurance programs dropped by 450,000 in May to 2.4 million. But more than half the drop—250,000—resulted from workers exhausting their regular benefits.

The number of jobless workers receiving benefits under the Temporary Extended Unemployment Compensation program, after having used up their regular benefits, rose from 415,000 in mid-April to 700,000 in mid-May. By the end of May, the number had increased to 725,000.

- A more than seasonal increase in the factory workweek to 39.6 hours, up from 39.3 hours. The longer workweek, accompanied by an average 1-cent increase in hourly pay rates, boosted average weekly factory earnings to $92.66. This was $1.09 above April and more than $2 higher than in January.

The workweek has risen gradually since January, although it still is below the 39.9-hour figure of May 1960. Government statisticians attach importance to shifts in hours of work, since the pattern has been for an increase in hours of workers presently employed before laid-off workers are recalled or new workers hired.

Ray Larson, a Labor Dept. manpower expert, told a news conference that the unemployment rate tends to remain "sticky"—at a continued high level—for several months after the beginning of an economic upturn. He said the turning point of the 1958 recession came in May, but there was no reduction in unemployment until September.

Apart from heavy industry, there was little change in the employment picture other than usual seasonal trends.

As reported in the preliminary job summary released May 31 by the Labor Dept., unemployment dropped by 200,000 to 4.8 million in May, but the key seasonally adjusted unemployment rate edged up to 6.9 percent from April's 6.8 percent. Total employment was up 1 million to 66.8 million, with half the increase in agriculture, but was still 400,000 below the 1960 level.

Among those counted as employed in May were 2.8 million non-farm workers on part-time work involuntarily—down 150,000 from the month before but still 500,000 more than a year earlier.

Manufacturing jobs were 665,000 below the level of a year ago. In non-manufacturing industries, transportation was down 140,000 from the May 1960 level, retail and wholesale trade employment dropped 120,000, construction was down 75,000 and mining 45,000.

The decline in retail and wholesale jobs, the Labor Dept. noted, "was in marked contrast to the sharp growth in jobs generally shown in trade during the postwar period."

The only significant areas of increased employment have been in state and local governments—up 310,000 over the year—and in finance and services, where there was a rise of 90,000 jobs.

Kennedy Administration Opposes Labor-Backed Works Program

The Kennedy Administration has registered opposition to a labor-supported $1 billion program of federal grants to stimulate short-term, local public works projects, although indicating less objection to "standby" authority for the program if discretion to activate it were placed solely in the President's hands.

The Administration's position on the emergency public works program—which the AFL-CIO supports as essential to reduce unemployment from its present "intolerable level" of 6.9 percent—was spelled out by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg in testimony before a Senate Labor subcommittee.

The Secretary said the bill—sponsored by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), subcommittee chairman, and Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.)—represented a "constructive approach to providing employment in a period of recession."

He added, however, that it was not "appropriate" to put such a program into effect at this time because the recession has been halted and recovery appears to be underway."

Goldberg forecast "a considerable lift in the months ahead" which, he said, "can be expected to increase employment opportunities, personal incomes and consumer expenditures, and to encourage business investment."

The Clark-Reuss bill would provide $500 million in federal grants —plus standby authorization for an additional $500 million—for short-range projects which states and municipalities could launch within 90 days and which would be completed in a year.

The program would be limited to projects that have already been planned but would not be undertaken without federal aid. Authorizations would halt automatically when unemployment fell to 4 percent, and could be reinstituted by presidential action if joblessness again exceeded that figure.

Goldberg said that if Congress wished to establish the program on a standby basis, it should merely give the President power to initiate action, without an automatic trigger of unemployment in excess of 4 percent.

"If recovery from the recession should be halted," he said, "and the economy again take a serious downward trend with unemployment soaring, I am assured that the Administration will take immediate action to do something about it."

He added that at such a time, the public works plan "would undoubtedly hold promise of valuable results."

The AFL-CIO's strong support of the Clark-Reuss bill was recorded earlier by Pres. George Meany, leadoff witness before the Clark subcommittee. At that time, Meany said the beginning of the business upturn held no immediate hopes for canceling out of high unemployment.

Without the public works program to give the economy an immediate shot in the arm, Meany declared, "the best we can expect . . . is that by running very hard we may be able to stand still."

The AFL-CIO president called the emergency plan a "necessary supplement" to Administration proposals on housing, school construction and the like, which he said will be "effective economic stimulants," but which will not have a serious impact on the economy until "next year, perhaps, or the year after."

Conventions Cancelled:.

Continent-wide Boycott Aids Strike at Big Toronto Hotel

Toronto, Ont.—Embattled members of Hotel Workers Local 299 on strike at the Royal York Hotel have been bolstered by a continent-wide labor boycott of the hotel, largest in the British Commonwealth, in their fight for a decent wage.

The 1,200 employes, who walked off the job seven weeks ago when the Canadian Pacific Railway, owner of the hotel, refused to give more than a 2.5-cent-an-hour wage increase, are relying on the boycott—and their own dignity as workers—to force the hotel to grant a new contract.

The Royal York, the only Toronto hotel that can handle large conventions, has lost 15 of them, including the annual meeting of the Oil Workers, which has been switched to Chicago because of the strike.

Included in the lost business was the convention of the Catholic Women's League, a Canada-wide parish organization, and the dinner honoring consecration of the Most Rev. Philip Pocock as coadjutator archbishop of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto.

The Toronto Labor Council angrily cancelled its scheduled Labor Day dinner and warned Mayor Nathan Phillips he was not welcome at the Labor Day parade or dinner because he had crossed the picket lines three times.

The hotel has shrugged off offers of mediation from the Mayor as well as Ontario Premier Leslie Frost. The striking union had offered to "place its fate" in the hands of the Premier.

The hotel, which hired 800 unemployed persons as strikebreakers in the first two days of the walkout, claims that service is back to normal. About 200 of the original strikers have returned to work.

However, the Royal York has been hit hard by the refusal of traveling musicians to play or stay there unless they have contracts that cannot be voided.

One group that checked out of the big hotel was the 100-piece New York Philharmonic Orchestra, in town for a concert. Other traveling musicians are observing the strikers' picket lines.

The Toronto Musicians Association and the American Federation of Musicans have advised members to fulfill their contract obligations but not to sign new contracts until the strike is settled. By the end of June, the hotel will be cut off almost completely from any live music.

The strikers have also been buoyed by a nationwide appeal for funds sparked by the Canadian wing of the Steelworkers and by substantial contributions from Toronto local unions and the Labor Council. Intl. Sec.-Treas. Jack Weinberger pledged the "all-out financial and moral support" of the entire union.

The union's general executive board, meeting in international headquarters in Cincinnati, has launched an information campaign in the U.S. and Canada to tell organizations planning conventions in Canada that the hotel is unfair to labor and asking all travelers to give it a "wide berth."

Pickets have also been set up at Toronto airport and on main entrances to the city to alert visitors to the strike.

Unions Urged to Hire Visiting African Students

Summertime employment of hundreds of visiting students from Africa has been strongly urged on national and international unions and central labor bodies by AFL-CIO Pres. George. Meany.

In a letter to presidents of all affiliated unions, Meany asked that they consider the employment of African students during summer months. If necessary, he said, the AFL-CIO will pay up to half the cost of such employment.

Meany said he had previously appealed to central bodies in such states as New York, California, Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Missouri to assist the African students but large numbers remain unplaced.

Meany reported that many of the hundreds of African students may be forced to return to their native land without completing their education if they cannot find summer work. Most will lose visitors' status if they are not students and can be deported.

Noting that the visitors are likely to be leaders of their nations and perhaps of unions in the near future, Meany said labor's concern for the survival of a free society "compels us to give urgent consideration" to their needs.

"I can think of no better way to demonstrate to these men our respect for their sacrifice than by welcoming them to employment in our work force," he asserted.

Work in union offices would give the students direct association with the "principles, practices and methods of operation" of the American labor movement, he said.

Mrs. Maida Springer of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs is coordinating the employment plan.

In his letter to central bodies, the AFL-CIO president stressed the federation's "historic and consistent" support for peoples emerging from colonialism.

At United Nations, N. Y., a spokesman for Africa Service Institute described the situation of many students as "desperate" and said they will go home bitter against the United States unless they are helped to find work.

Four Honored for Help To Aging Citizens

New York — Four prominent Americans have been honored for outstanding service on behalf of the aging by retired members of Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Dist. 65.

Presented with "Senior 65ers' Awards" for 1961 at a ceremony in local headquarters were Mayor Robert Wagner; Rep. John E. Fogarty (D.-R. I.); Dr. Basil C. MacLean, former National Blue Cross president, and Sidney Spector, director of the Division of Housing for the Elderly in the Federal Housing & Home Finance Agency.

Steelworkers Marking 25 Years of Progress

Pittsburgh—"Twenty-five years of human progress" is being marked this month by the Steelworkers as the union celebrates the silver anniversary of its founding here in June 1936.

A special 32-page edition of Steel Labor, the union's official publication, gives a brief history of the USWA and contains many reminiscences of veteran officers and members. A comparison notes that before the union the labor rate in basic steel was 47 cents an hour without fringe benefits, with an average of 66 cents, and that on Oct. 1 the labor rate will rise to $2.10 with fringes in addition, plus at least 17 cents under an escalator clause, with average actual earnings of about $2.30 an hour.

In an anniversary statement, Pres. David J. McDonald pledged that the USWA will continue to "reach for the stars."

"In the past," he said, "our union, through the solid support of its membership, has made break-throughs in all areas of human need, social as well as economic, as witnessed by our championing of civil rights, fair employment and better housing programs.

"We pledge that we will continue to do so in the future. It won't be easy. It never was. But the important thing is: We face the future together—strong, united, determined."

Supreme Court Upholds AEC on Atomic Safety

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that the Atomic Energy Commission may allow private utilities to construct atomic-powered generating plants near metropolitan areas and delay a definitive safety test until the plant is ready to go into operation.

The 7 to 2 decision giving the AEC the right to determine public safety in connection with atomic reactors overturned a circuit court of appeals decision that delaying safety determination until after construction would be unrealistic. The lower court ruled also that the AEC must have "compelling reasons" for locating an experimental reactor near a sizeable city.

The case involved the Power Reactor Development Co. and its permit from the AEC to build a power-generating plant at Lagoona Beach, Mich., about 35 miles from Detroit and 30 miles from Toledo, O. The Auto Workers, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the Paperworkers challenged the permit on grounds that there were no assurances of the safety of the reactor operation in view especially of its location near large population centers.

The unions urged that the safety check be made before actual construction began. To hold up final safety determination until after the plant was completed, the unions argued, would be to apply tremendous pressures on the AEC in light of millions of dollars expended on construction.

The high court upheld the AEC position and its commitment that an operating license would not be issued until it was absolutely certain that no risk was involved. Justices William O. Douglas and Hugo Black dissented, declaring that the investment of millions in construction would place the "momentum on the side of the applicant, not on the side of the public."

A day after the court decision, AEC Commissioner Robert E. Wilson told the Joint Congressional Atomic Committee that explosion of an experimental power reactor at Idaho Falls, Ida., in January 1961 was an "accident that could and should have been prevented."

Wilson listed numerous failures in inspection and reporting, said there should have been a safety operator on the job and declared that the reactor contained a design flaw.

A month after the Arco explosion, Fred MacGowan, a member of the AFL-CIO Atomic Energy Committee, reported to the federation that the accident emphasized the acute need for reexamination of the safety provisions of the design, construction and location of certain types of reactors.

Building Strike Forces Changes in Labor Law

The strike spilled over into the commercial construction field as 1,300 workers on the city's $200 million subway project walked off the job to join the immigrants' picket lines. Many of these workers were Irish and Italian newcomers.

The immigrants, first organized last year by Irvine and Bruno Zanini of the Hod Carriers, voted to put their organizing drive under the banner of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Strong Backing

The drive has received the financial and moral support of the international construction unions.

The immigrants organized last year were plasterers, cement finishers, bricklayers, laborers, carpenters, and painters. The drive this year seeks to add organization and union recognition of craftsmen in all other trades.

"We voted to go out in an all-for-one-and-one-for-all drive," said Irvine. "We will not return until every residential construction project in Toronto is 100 percent union.

The immigrants' campaign last year, when 5,000 were involved, was termed the biggest organizing drive in Canada since 1937. Irvine said the government peace machinery would insure a return to work if contractors sign quickly.

Rubber Union Contract Set At Goodrich

Akron—The Rubber Workers and the B. F. Goodrich Co. have agreed on a new contract with wage increases, vacation and holiday improvements, and supplemental unemployment benefit increases for 11,500 workers in eight plants.

The agreement, providing more than 50 contract changes, was signed in Columbus, O., and will take effect on ratification by a majority of locals representing a majority of members in Goodrich plants and approval by the URW executive board.

The pact was the last to be signed this year with a "Big Four" rubber company. Settlements along similar lines had been reached earlier with Goodyear, Firestone and U.S. Rubber.

Goodrich workers at plants in Akron, Los Angeles, Oaks, Pa., Tuscaloosa, Ala., and Miami, Okla., will get wage boosts of 7.5 cents an hour retroactive to June 5 and another 7 cents next June 11. Workers in plants at Riverside, N. J., Marion, O., and Clarksville, Tenn., will get 3.5 cents an hour more as of June 5, and another 4 cents June 11, 1962.

The new contract also provides four weeks' vacation for 22 years of service and three weeks after 10 years; an eighth paid holiday, to be determined locally; a maximum weekly increase of $5 in SUB benefits and extension of the benefit period from a maximum of 26 weeks to a maximum of 39 weeks; optional separation awards in a lump sum for workers with five or more years of service who have been laid off more than two years.

C.S.Golden, 72, Long USWA Leader, Dies

Clinton S. Golden, one of the founders of the Steelworkers and one of the intellectual leaders of the labor movement, died in a Philadelphia nursing home after suffering a stroke while addressing a USWA meeting in Beaver Falls, Pa., six weeks earlier. He was 72.

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. lauded Golden as "truly an elder statesman," whose "lasting achievements will stand as an important contribution to the ideals of a free society."

Born in Pottsville, Pa., the son of a minister, he went to work as driver of a mule team in a New York State iron ore mine at the age of 11, when his father died. By the time he was 21 he was active in leadership of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen and later was a staff member for both the Machinists and Clothing Workers.

He helped set up the Steel Workers Organizing Committee, was elected assistant to the president of the union at the 1942 convention, and became vice president in 1946. The same year he resigned.

Served With NLRB

He also had been National Labor Relations Board regional director in Pittsburgh and prepared the government's case against Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. in which the Supreme Court upheld the consititutionality of the original Wagner Labor Relations Act in 1937.

He was a vice chairman of the War Production Board and War Manpower Commission during World War II, served as a labor adviser to the Marshall Plan and with Harold Ruttenberg edited "The Dynamics of Industrial Democracy," a standard volume in labor-management relations.

After leaving the USWA Golden went to Harvard University as a lecturer, helped set up its trade union program and was active in the National Planning Association. He was offered the post of Secretay of Labor by former Pres. Eisenhower when Sec. Martin Durkin resigned, but declined.

Upon his retirement from Harvard at the age of 70, he returned to the USWA as adviser on pensions of elderly union members.

Jersey Retail Clerks Plan Political Work

Newark, N. J.—Sec.-Treas. George Meisler of Retail Clerks Local 21, made up of department store employes, has been elected chairman of the New Jersey State Active Ballot Club.

cessing an unfair labor practice case — from the filing of the charge to a decision by the board —was 399 days. By the last half of 1951, this had risen to 406 days. In 1960, he continued, it took 426 days to complete action on unfair labor practice cases.

Under the proposed reorganization plan—which will go into effect automatically on July 24 unless either the House or Senate votes against the plan—decisions of trial examiners in unfair labor practice cases would be subject to review by the full labor board only on one or more of the following grounds:

- If a substantial question of "law or policy" is raised because of either the absence of or departure from officially reported board precedent.
- If the examiner's decision on a substantial factual issue is "clearly erroneous," and if such error prejudices the rights of any party.
- If the conduct of the hearing or any ruling has resulted in a prejudicial error.
- If there are "compelling reasons" for reconsideration of an important board rule or policy.

The plan is patterned after procedures recently put into effect by the NLRB delegating authority to regional directors, subject to discretionary review by the board, to make decisions in representation proceedings.

In urging Congress not to disapprove the reorganization plan, Harris reported that more than 50 percent of the time involved in processing of unfair labor practice cases was devoted to the preparation of the trial examiner's report to the NLRB and its subsequent review by the board itself.

The federation spokesman pointed out that this constituted, in effect, a duplication of function and added that, since the law already provides for court review of decisions, this would prove a "sufficient safeguard" of the dependability of the trial examiner's decision.

Unions Thanked For Contract Aid

New York—The workers in five Macy's department stores in the Greater New York area, members of Local 1-S, Department Store Workers Union, said "thanks" recently to the labor movement for the help they got in winning their recent contract.

Pres. Sam Kovenetsky, other officers and members of the negotiating committee were hosts at a luncheon for leaders of the city's labor unions, who rallied their members to a mass demonstration in support of Macy's workers when their negotiations were stalled and a strike seemed imminent. As a result the company moved off its "no compromise" stand and a two-year contract was arrived at.

The mass picket line, in which more than 50 local unions participated, surrounded Macy's Herald Square store, largest in the chain. It was rated by observers as the greatest outpouring of New York City labor in many years, other than the 1959 and 1960 Labor Day parades.

'The Cairo Shooting':

NLRB Case Ended After 3 Long Years

The case of maritime unions involved in an organizing drive on the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers — in which handling of an unfair labor practice case consumed three years and four months —has been cited by the AFL-CIO to highlight the often tortuous process of National Labor Relations Board and federal court proceedings.

Details of the case were read into the record at House Government Operations Committee hearings by AFL-CIO Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris in testimony supporting the general purpose of Administration proposals to reorganize the NLRB to speed its handling of such cases.

Harris reported that in November 1954, while the maritime unions were organizing employes of towboats and barges on the inland waterways, a fight took place aboard a tugboat docked in Cairo, Ill. The altercation — between Capt. Burt Banta, owner of the tug, and a union organizer — culminated in the shooting of the organizer in the arm.

Each side, the federation spokesman said, filed charges both with the NLRB and with local police, with the stories of witnesses conflicting sharply as to how the dispute began.

The general counsel of the labor board took six months to conduct a "preliminary" investigation of the shooting before he accepted the employer's version and issued a complaint against the unions.

By contrast, Harris continued, the district attorney in Cairo believed the unions' version and a grand jury there indicted Banta.

"However," he added, "the captain with his tugboat and barges had gone back down the river to his home base in Louisiana, and the U.S. commissioner there refused to execute a federal fugitive-from-justice warrant."

In October and November, 1955, hearings were held before an NLRB trial examiner. In June 1956 the examiner issued a detailed report concluding that the complaint should have been issued against the employer rather than the unions.

The general counsel and the employer appealed to the board, which in December 1956 handed down a decision disagreeing with the trial examiner's findings and holding that the unions were at fault.

The NLRB later petitioned the 7th Court of Appeals for enforcement of a "cease-and-desist" order against the unions, and in March 1958—three years and four months after it all started—the court overruled the board and declared that the trial examiner "properly found that the employer instigated the violence."

Knit Goods Local Gives 5 Scholarships

Philadelphia—The Knit Goods Workers' Union, Local 190 of the Ladies' Garment Workers, has awarded $2,400 college scholarships to five children of knit goods workers in this area. The money will be paid from funds provided by a 10-cent monthly deduction from the dues of the local's 8,000 members, and by one employer.

Scholarship winners are Marie Ann Kuligowski, graduate of Haddon Heights, N. J., High School; John Razulis of St. Francis Seminary, Cincinnati; Ronald Rothenbach of Frankford High School; Phyllis Walsh of St. Hubert's High School; Elizabeth Heim of St. Joseph's High School, Hammonton, N. J.

Flint Glass Convention Elects New President, Maps Organizing Drive

New York—An intensive drive to organize the unorganized strictly within its jurisdiction was planned here by the Flint Glass Workers as the union ended the first half of a two-week biennial convention.

Announcement of the organizing effort by the union, which was chartered in 1878, followed the election of a new president.

He is George M. Parker of Toledo, O., who was elected by a 2-to-1 majority vote of 350 delegates representing some 220 locals, after former Pres. Charles M. Scheff disclosed his intention to retire. Parker previously was first vice president of the union and editor of its official publication, "American Flint."

In announcing plans for what he hopes will prove "a period of growth and new stability," Parker said he felt emphasis should be placed on bringing about improved labor-management relations.

"Our organization needs to keep more abreast with the times," he said. "In every area affecting the livelihood and welfare of our members—job security, loss of employment and foreign competition—more effective relations with employers are needed if we hope to bring new gains for organized workers."

He indicated that the union, which now numbers some 33,000 members, would step up its organizational efforts while keeping within its jurisdiction. The union has contracts with about 60 factories that fabricate iron molds for glass bottles, and with shops that make glass tableware of all sorts, as well as glass for television bulbs and scientific and electronic purposes. Most of the membership is in New York, West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Ohio.

"I want to make it very clear that we consider it vitally important to keep within our jurisdiction when it comes to organizing new plants," Parker declared. "We feel it is our responsibility as part of the AFL-CIO family to respect the interests of our sister glass unions, no less than it is their responsibility to respect ours."

He indicated that while there have been no "concrete efforts" to bring about a merger with other glass unions, this is still a possibility for the future.

A native of Ohio, Parker entered the industry in 1938 as a production worker and became a machine operator in 1940. He served in the Air Force during the war. At the union's 1952 convention he was elected second vice president, becoming first vice president in 1954.

The convention here elevated Albert Vottero from second to first vice president and re-elected James W. Mitchell secretary-treasurer.

Scheff will continue to serve the union as a consultant.

The convention also took the following actions:

- Defeated a move to reverse the present arrangement by which the international union receives 55 percent and the locals 45 percent of the dues dollar.
- Adopted a resolution urging consumers to buy American products bearing the union label.
- Approved a communication to Pres. Kennedy appealing for his assistance in helping to curb the effects of foreign imports.

Before adjournment delegates were to elect an international executive board of 100 members and act on other measures.

Northwest Airlines Pact Raises Pay

Two thousand office, clerical and passenger service employes of Northwest Airlines will receive a 5 percent raise retroactive to Aug. 31, 1960, under a new contract negotiated by the Railway Clerks.

Other increases in the two-year contract will become effective in September 1961 and September 1962, and bring total raises to between 26 and 45 cents an hour.

Members of 11 lodges of the Railway Clerks, representing Northwest employes throughout the nation, voted 94 percent to ratify the agreement, the union reported.

The retroactive portion of the increase will include adjustments on overtime pay as well as basic wages.

Unions Open Testimony:

Modern Pay System Goal of Rail Labor

Railroad operating unions want working conditions for their members brought "up to date with other organized labor in the United States," and their proposals to the Presidential Study Commission on rail work rules are intended to bring that about, Eli Oliver, economic adviser to the Railway Labor Executives' Association, said on a nationally broadcast news conference.

Oliver appeared on the AFL-CIO public affairs program, Labor News Conference, as the tripartite presidential commission prepared to hear the union side of the work rules dispute. The first four months of the year-long study were given over largely to management presentation of its demands for abolition of jobs and a free hand in making work assignments.

Declaring that the nation's railroads do not constitute the "sick or vanishing industry" sometimes portrayed by the "public wailing" of its spokesmen, Oliver said:

"For 40 years I have attended many funerals of the railway industry and after the funerals are over and all the sympathy has been expressed, the corpse always gets up and dances a jig."

He said the railroads could well afford to meet union demands for:

- Paid holidays. Operating employes "have none now, nor are they paid extra for working on holidays."
- A shift differential for working at night.
- Reduction in the workweek. Train crews now "may be required to work at straight time for 90 hours a week and sometimes do."
- Reimbursement for meals and other expenses when a railroad worker is required to lay over in another city. "They do not now receive any reimbursement whatever for such expenses."

Brotherhoods Testify

The second phase of the presidential commission study—testimony by the five operating brotherhoods—began with a rebuttal of management claims that the "fireman's" job is unnecessary. Witnesses were the presidents of the two unions whose members work side-by-side in the cabs of locomotives.

Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen and R. E. Davidson, head of the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers, jointly defended firemen-helpers as "indispensable" to safe operation of both freight and passenger trains.

Gilbert warned that "increased speeds along with increased train lengths and weights have substantially increased the time and space necessary to bring a train to a stop."

Declaring that there has been in recent years "an overall increase in loss of life, personal injury and property damage," Gilbert warned that "those who would trifle with the railroads' present method of operation are inviting even greater hazards."

He announced that the union will call as expert witnesses veteran railroad workers "who will tell you about their experiences in road and yard services."

Davidson told the commission that the fireman-helper "performs functions in the operation of the locomotive and train which the engineer cannot alone perform."

Helper's Work Cited

In addition to the key safety lookout, the helper's job includes "inspection and repair work in the diesel engine room while the train is in motion," he said.

The engineers' spokesman declared "we cannot afford to shear ourselves of these highly trained and skilled employes."

Scheduled to testify also were representatives of the Railroad Trainmen, Switchmen, and Railway Conductors & Brakemen.

In a joint newsletter, the unions charged the effect of the management proposals outlined before the presidential commission would be to destroy many of the gains labor has made, increase work burdens and add to dangers on the job.

The unions said the industry proposals would substitute "management prerogative" for collective bargaining.

OPENING SESSION of a three-day conference on problems of working women is addressed in Washington, D. C., by Walter P. Reuther, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., which sponsored the meeting. Other speakers included Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), Mrs. Agnes Meyer, and IUD Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey.

NLRB Bars Boycott at Missile Site

The National Labor Relations Board has ordered an Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers local to halt opposition to the use of prefabricated cables on a missile project at Cape Canaveral, Fla.

The board held that refusal to handle the cables constituted an illegal secondary boycott of the Martin Co., manufacturer of the cables, and was intended to force the Gable Electric Service, contractor at the missile site, to "cease handling these products."

According to testimony before an NLRB trial examiner, officials of IBEW Local 756 contended that the cables should have been fabricated on the site as part of the construction work.

The Martin cables were supplied to Gable at the time Pershing missiles were sent to Cape Canaveral.

The board ruled that members of the local failed to report to work when the prefabricated cables were scheduled for installation and were discharged, and that replacement workers were not furnished by the local on request despite a contract with the Gable company.

This constituted unfair labor practices and an illegal secondary boycott under the Landrum-Griffin amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, the board ruled.

Women Unionists Hear Reuther at IUD Parley

Working women can find a solution to their problems only to the extent that they help find answers to problems facing all workers, Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. told an IUD-sponsored conference on the Problems of Working Women, held in Washington.

Saying that women cannot solve their problems in a vacuum, Reuther urged delegates from some 25 affiliated unions to overcome complacency and help make Americans aware of the fact that the threats we face today are as urgent as the problems the nation faced after Pearl Harbor.

The greatest unsolved problem, he said, is finding a way to bring about full employment in an economy where more and more workers are being driven out of the labor market permanently by automation.

Other speakers discussed the role of women in fields dominated largely by men. One of the speakers was Mrs. Agnes Meyer, who said women workers can meet the challenge of automation with a vigorous program of union organization, by insisting on equal pay for equal work, and by persuading men that there must be equality of opportunity for women and other minority groups to get jobs and to be retained for jobs.

Mrs. Aryness Joy Wickens, economic adviser to Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, said the department will insist that women be given equal opportunities with men for job retraining.

AFL-CIO, Musicians Back Arts Council Bill

The AFL-CIO and the Musicians have expressed strong support of bills which would create a Federal Advisory Council on the Arts and provide matching funds up to $100,000 a year for any state operating a cultural program.

The bills, sponsored by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N. J.), would not repair "the tottering foundations of our great American musical heritage," AFM Pres. Herman Kenin testified, "but they do provide a start."

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter to the House Education subcommittee which held hearings under Thompson's chairmanship, pointed out that trade unionists are producers as well as enjoyers of the arts.

Endorsing the bills, Biemiller added that many AFL-CIO members are performing artists in music and drama, while others participate in union-sponsored programs in the arts and crafts.

He said the impact of automation and the shorter workweek won through collective bargaining will increase the amount of leisure for cultural activities.

Kenin said the assumed first task of the proposed council—to assess the nation's cultural needs—would, like sputnik, "rattle every window in the nation."

He pointed to a Library of Congress survey which showed that, in 47 states responding, a total of only $202,825 was appropriated for music.

The data developed by the AFM on the difficulties of symphony orchestras is "distressingly gloomy," Kenin said.

A provision in the Thompson bills for a maximum annual grant of $100,000 to any one state is "totally inadequate" for music, let alone other performing arts, Kenin said, but the availability of such funds might stimulate action by state and local communities.

Labor Backs Federal Aid For Airports

The AFL-CIO has strongly endorsed Administration proposals for a step-up in federal aid for airport construction and improvement.

Legislative Rep. George D. Riley told a Senate subcommittee that inadequate airport facilities have slowed down the jet age and may have been a factor in plane crashes in recent years. He pointed out that the airport aid program voted by Congress two years ago had first been trimmed down "to discourage a veto of the legislation" by then-Pres. Eisenhower.

Pres. Kennedy has asked for a $75 million-a-year program of federal aid for a five-year period. The present program, which expires June 30, authorizes $63 million a year in matching funds.

Subcommittee Chairman A. S. Mike Monroney (D-Okla.) opened the hearing with emphasis on the importance of the Administration's request for contract authority over a five-year period for airport improvements instead of the present year-by-year appropriations by Congress.

Appeals Court Cancels Injunction Barring Rail Strike by Switchmen

ing personnel, who are paid on a dual basis of hours and miles.

Key issue in the case, heard by U.S. District Judge John O. Henderson in Buffalo last September, was the carriers' contention that a provision of the Switchmen's constitution — requiring membership ratification of proposed contract terms—violated the Railway Labor Act, which requires the parties to negotiate in good faith.

Reversal of the injunction also was a defeat for the National Mediation Board, which supported the carriers' contention.

'Frustration' Alleged

Judge Henderson, in granting the railroads a temporary injunction barring the threatened strike, ruled that the ratification requirement "frustrates the intent of the act to facilitate the expeditious settlement of labor-management disputes."

In reversing this ruling by the lower court, the three-judge appeals court held:

"We find nothing in this history to show the union simply went through the motions of bargaining. The controversy was that most intractable of all types of labor disputes—a question of principle.

"From the carriers' standpoint the union's refusal to accept the pattern established with other operating rail brotherhoods was indeed arbitrary, involving not only larger increases to the Switchmen than to other crafts but the possibility of a chain reaction.

"Yet, from the union's standpoint, acceptance of the 'pattern' would continue the very inequity of which they were complaining, sincerely so far as the record shows, whether justifiably or not."

The court set forth as the basis for the reversal Sec. 4 of the Norris-La Guardia Act. The opinion said:

"That section uses the most emphatic words possible—'No court of the United States shall have the jurisdiction to issue any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction' against a peaceful strike.

"To overcome that bar, plaintiffs had the burden of showing, as a matter of law, that the broad command of Sec. 4 is subject to an exception when a union has violated its duties under the Railway Labor Act and, as a matter of fact, that the defendant here had done that."

Judges Henry J. Friendly, J. Joseph Smith and Henry Watkins participated in the appeals court decision, which mandates the district court to remove the injunction by June 27 unless the carriers seek a stay pending rehearing or an effort to appeal to the Supreme Court.

Speirs said the appeals court decision clears the way for the union to resume negotiations with the carriers.

"We intend to make every reasonable effort to bring about settlement of the wage inequity," he declared.

The lengthy legal battle has delayed negotiation of wage increases for about 20,000 switchmen on 17 railroads, which operate primarily in the central and western states, since last summer. Other operating rail unions have received the pattern wage increases of 2 percent last July 1 and another 2 percent Mar. 1.

Creative Foreign Aid

THE EMERGING congressional debate on foreign aid will generate more heat than any other program the Kennedy Administration has sent to the Hill. But while the debate may center on "backdoor financing" and congressional control—as well as the perennial attacks on "rat-hole spending" and "waste"—the essential issue will be America's role as the leader of the free world.

The foreign aid programs, going back to the Marshall Plan, have flowed from the positive concept that human dignity and freedom, economic security and political democracy are the responsibility of the most powerful and prosperous democratic nation in the world.

The totalitarian Communist threat to freedom and liberty, and its expansionist drives, tend to give an anti-Communist tone to the foreign aid programs. And in years past the programs have secured congressional approval as stop-communism programs.

The Kennedy Administration has gone back to the original concept and asked for a positive foreign aid program on the basis that this is something we as a nation must do to help the millions in the newly emerging nations throw off the shackles of poverty, disease, hunger and illiteracy.

The AFL-CIO has long supported the Development Loan Fund approach that would provide continuity in the foreign aid program by creating a long-term authorization that would allow meaningful planning in expenditure and use of aid funds. In the past years the loan fund approach has been approved but the amount of money and the length of the authorization have been seriously cut back.

IN THE LAST SESSION of Congress, with then Pres. Eisenhower on their side, opponents of long-term loans served a warning that they would carry the fight to a bitter end in the House, even to the extent of jeopardizing the whole authorization. The advocates of the program felt compelled to drop the fight temporarily.

This will be one of the major issues in the foreign aid debate. It will be assailed as a move to impair congressional control of aid funds and freeze out congressional review of aid programs.

Both of these arguments are fallacious and essentially reactionary in origin. Congress has wide powers to stop programs and cut off funds at any time. The precedure of having a government agency use Treasury financing for a program approved by Congress is an old and established one. There is nothing "backdoor" about it, and only Congress can authorize programs and this method of financing.

A long-term foriegn aid program can be more efficiently and effectively operated, eliminating wasteful expenditures and the essentially uninformed knifing of funds in the annual appropriations struggle.

The question before the country today is no longer how much but what kind of foreign aid program is needed in terms of the nation's leadership of the free world.

The struggle for bread and freedom is never-ending. It will go on as long as totalitarian forces stalk the world and as long as men are degraded and exploited. In this struggle America cannot take a temporary role or use a bookeeper's approach.

Prosperity Is Good, BUT—:

A Labor Editor Looks Back And Muses About His Work

The following editorial, "Ten Short Years," is reprinted from the June 2, 1961, issue of the Oregon Labor Press, edited by James W. Goodsell, marking his tenth year as editor:

I WAS STARTLED THIS WEEK by the realization that I've been the editor of the Oregon Labor Press since June 1, 1951. Ten years is a long time.

It means I've edited 520 issues of this newspaper, not counting occasional vacations, illnesses and a three-month period in 1960 when the Labor Press tried a noble (but unsuccessful) experiment in twice-a-month publication.

Some of those nearly 520 issues I look back upon with some satisfaction—and many I'd gladly forget.

An editor is less likely to be satisfied with a newspaper than his readers, because the editor alone knows how much better it might have been. The reader sees eight pages of type and pictures, and finds them interesting or dull, attractive or stodgy, informative or infuriating. But he's inclined to accept them as they are.

The editor, however, is haunted by afterthoughts when the last page-proof has been okayed. This story is ponderous and badly written. That headline is dull. This week's front page looks too much like last week's, and it needs a good picture to brighten it up. The editorial page is full of tapioca pudding. With a little more time and effort and imagination, the paper could have been so much better. . . .

Well, we'll keep trying and experimenting. I think we've come quite a distance since 1951. Circulation has almost doubled. We've won a dozen awards (including a "Little Pulitzer Prize") in the annual competitions of the Intl. Labor Press Association. And we've done our best to serve the best interests of the labor movement in Oregon.

From a technical viewpoint, we have operated on the theory that the typography and make-up of a labor newspaper should be a showcase for the skilled printing trades unions that produce it. We'll continue the pursuit of elusive perfection in that sphere.

One nagging question we've never solved: Is a labor newspaper primarily a union house organ or a newspaper? It tries to be both—and that's impossible.

Or is it? Perhaps the labor movement is more mature than the men and women who edit its publications. If the Wall Street Journal and Fortune magazine pull no punches in reporting the sins and stupidities of the business world, why can't the labor press be equally forthright in reporting both bad and good in unions?

I think it would be healthy to abandon the house organ viewpoint—healthy for labor and the labor press.

IT IS NOT TRUE, as some have said, that labor always moves at the speed of a glacier. Labor has moved fast and far in the past 10 years. AFL and CIO have merged. The problem of corruption in a few unions has largely been solved. We've come to grips with the problems of automation and the emergence of the white collar worker as the dominant member of the labor force. The evil of Jim Crowism still exists in a few unions, but it is rapidly being wiped out.

American labor must solve these problems or face gradual extinction as a vital force in our society. I believe we will solve them.

There's another problem, a more subtle one, that must be solved too. You might call it the problem of militancy, or ideology, or solidarity. It's the problem of the passive card-carrier. Or you could put it this way: Is the labor movement really a movement these days, or is it merely a bunch of unions?

Prosperity is good, and so is the union shop, and so is the American classless society. But these three factors have created a vast number of union members who have no feeling of unity or identity or idealism as members of a labor movement. Many of them (and their wives) believe the word "labor" is degrading.

What do we do about that? How do we rekindle the old fire, or light a new one? Since I don't know the answer, maybe I shouldn't have raised the question. But the problem is crucial to our future.

Let me end this rambling anniversary essay by saying thanks. No editor was ever so lucky in his choice of readers and bosses!

Morgan Says:

Washington Is Humid, Storms Forecast on Diplomatic Front

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

SULTRY SUMMER WEATHER has already descended on Washington but this may be real cool, man, compared with the forecasts on the diplomatic storm front. There the going promises to be very sticky, indeed.

In the face of these political squalls and hurricanes and in the wake of the President's heavily-laden European trip, the capital is taking stock, measuring pressures, plotting courses. Here are some reasonably authoritative readings on the top trouble spots and the major explosive situations:

Morgan

BERLIN: The barometer is falling. Khrushchev is almost certain to blow up a crisis here before the end of the year or early in 1962.

SOUTHEAST ASIA: The barometer has already fallen about as low as it can in Laos, as far as we are concerned. The most we are hoping for is that the Communists can be restrained from cutting such a deep political and military swath from the top of the kingdom to the bottom that they can convert it fully to their control.

Laos seemed to be far down the list of Khrushchev's priorities at Vienna and if we can prevent an outright take-over, there is some belief, but not much, that local problems such as food shortages and bickering between the pro-Communist Pathet Lao and Kong Le forces may eventually work to the advantage of the non-Communists.

TEST BAN TALKS and general disarmament: So little brightness is seen on this brooding horizon that, with pressures building up to resume U.S. testing, the President may feel obliged within six weeks or so to proclaim our right to resume, unless there is tangible progress at the Geneva conference.

The Kennedy regime is going ahead with preparations for new disarmament talks in mid-summer and is even preparing to give the disarmament administration new stature, status and importance by declaring it a quasi-independent operation, but there is not much zest to the gesture because Khrushchev remains so solidly stubborn on doing it all his way. There is some feeling, nevertheless, that if he has any give anywhere it may be in the field of disarmament.

Pres. Kennedy, Prime Minister Macmillan and Pres. de Gaulle have agreed, in something more than principle, to hold a western summit meeting this fall. The time may depend somewhat on when and how much Khrushchev chooses to turn the screw in Berlin but the place seems likely to be either Paris or London—largely because de Gaulle, apparently, doesn't feel he can move a..y distance from home unless and until the Algerian problem, with all its bitter and explosive ramifications in French politics, is farther on the road to solution.

The Big Three have their work cut out for them. They must decide how to respond if Khrushchev signs a separate peace treaty with East Germany. Pres. Kennedy is reliably described as not being inflexibly opposed to talking to the Russians about the conditions of the occupation of Berlin but only if the Allies can be assured in advance of their continued access to the city.

His position is roughly in the middle between the French and the British. The British think a new status for Berlin should be negotiated and the French, while they agree that the present status is both "stupid and impossible," feel that any new agreement could only be worse.

As for putting Moscow on notice that our stand in Berlin is firm and not a bluff, the President is said to favor the idea of dispatching NATO forces to their defensive battle positions in full mobilization as if for war if Khrushchev threatens Berlin. NATO military headquarters in Paris feel this would be a much more authoritative way of impressing Khrushchev than by a token display of strength with a couple of divisions along the autobahn to Berlin.

ALL THIS SOUNDS dark and sinister and it is. But as we fasten our seatbelts for the turbulence ahead, we may take some comfort in the fact that the Kremlin is not enjoying clear flying weather either.

By refusing to discuss the "Chinese problem" at Vienna, Khrushchev invited the inference that it is heavier than he admits. Possible added proof of this is Moscow's current tiff with Albania. This might be a tempest in a Soviet bloc teapot except for the fact that Albania has been getting along almost A-OK with the Chinese Communists. And now Khrushchev is scrapping with Col. Nasser, who has cracked down on local Communists in Cairo. Furthermore, the Soviet premier reportedly told Pres. Kennedy that Cuba's Castro was not a reliable, satisfactory revolutionary.

These hard luck stores are almost enough to bring a tear to the eye. Almost but not quite.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

AS USUAL, THE ANNUAL MEETING of the U.S. Conference of Mayors here brought a refreshing approach toward the things that must be done by the federal government to meet the problems confronting the cities in which the great majority of American people now live.

A whole series of resolutions was passed urging billions in federal funds for aiding the cities in meeting great areas of municipal concern—housing and urban renewal, air and water pollution control, improved public health facilities, highways and traffic control.

Generally speaking, the contrast in philosophy between meetings of the Conference of Mayors and the right-wing coalitionists of the House of Representatives would suggest that members of the two groups live in different worlds. In order to get through a school-aid bill or a housing bill in the House, the full force of a sympathetic Administration must be brought to bear.

In the House, there are solemn warnings that "spending" programs are wasteful boondoggling, that they promote inflation, that they eat away the moral fiber of the people.

Yet the mayors—the public officials in closest contact with the great majority of the American people—cheerfully endorse programs that tend to horrify the rural or small-town Old Guardsmen who still come close to dominating the House.

There were a few speeches in the Conference of Mayors this year that echoed the Old Guard line—from mayors of San Antonio and Westminster, Calif., for example—but the overwhelming majority simply swept aside such protests and passed the resolutions.

THIS IS BECAUSE the mayors, as local public officials, know how severely the cities are cramped for tax resources and revenues to finance their own rehabilitation. It is because they know that they have quadrupled their public debts since the end of World War II, yet are still falling further behind in an effort to meet the demands for urban services.

It is because they know that the federal tax system is more orderly and more efficient than local and state tax systems, that it has greater resources, that it is capable of greater expansion.

As Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) put it in a speech a year or two ago, it may be true that a public program financed in Pennsylvania by federal taxes will cost "the people" of the state just as much in taxes as the same program financed by the state—but that the taxes are not paid by the same group of people.

The state-financed program is paid for by low-income and middle-income families that can least afford it. The same program federally financed is paid for substantially through the graduated federal income tax, with more of the burden going to upper-income families better equipped to afford it.

So the Conference of Mayors passed its resolutions asking federal interest and assistance in meeting the problems of the cities—and it is likely to go on asking until the programs have been set wholly in motion.

THE STRENGTH of rural and small-town Old Guardsmen in the House reflects the distortion of congressional districts giving lesser weight to voters living in cities and disproportionately heavy weight to the minority in the hinterlands. No clear and practical way has been found by city residents to attack this system.

The congressional districts are defined by state legislatures that are themselves heavily weighted to give a disproportionate voice to the hinterland.

The Supreme Court has accepted for review an attack by Tennessee citizens on the gerrymandered districts of the state legislature. If it should strike down the districts, as clearly in violation of the state constitution, the judicial precedent would be set that federal courts can offer a remedy. But the high court has passed the case over to its next term, beginning in October, and has ordered a second round of arguments on the issues involved.

Washington Reports:

Passage Predicted for Bill To Spur Medical Education

THE NATION HAS only half as many doctors and dentists today as are needed yet the number of young men and women in medical schools is decreasing, Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N. J.) declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 460 radio stations.

"There are fewer applications for entrance into medical schools than there were eight years ago despite the increasing need of doctors and dentists," Williams asserted. "Eight years ago there were 19,000 annual applications; today there are 6,000 to 8,000."

The Medical Professions Educational Assistance bill introduced in the Senate will assist needy young men and women through medical schools and also help build needed medical school facilities, Williams and Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N. J.) declared in an interview on the radio program.

Case said the measure has about "as close to bipartisan support as any bill that is likely to come before us in this session." He said he sponsored a similar bill four years ago, and predicted passage of the measure in the current session of Congress.

The measure would provide $75 million annually for 10 years—$45 million each year for teaching facilities for physicians and public health personnel, $15 million for teaching facilities for dental students and $15 million for renovation or replacement of existing facilities. In addition it has a scholarship section that would enable qualified needy young people to pay the high cost of a medical education.

CASE EXPLAINED that the scholarship money would go to the colleges, with an additional matching sum, since tuition does not cover the cost of educating young men and women.

"Viewed from any point of view, the bill is urgently needed," Williams declared. "We all know the high cost of medical care and this relates to the inadequate facilities for treating medical cases."

If there were adequate medical facilities and physicians, 40,000 preventable cancer deaths every year could be averted, Case said. This is true also of rheumatic fever, heart disease, diabetes and many other diseases, he said.

Williams said that because of the shortage of physicians, "a fourth of the staff positions in hospitals go unfilled."

"WE NEED MORE DOCTORS," Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N. J.), left, and Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N. J.) agreed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. They also concurred that the way to meet the need is to pass the pending Medical Professions Educational Assistance bill.

Kefauver Subcommittee Report On Drugs 'Three Alarm Shocker'

By Sidney Margolius

THE FORTHCOMING REPORT by the Senate Antitrust subcommittee on the high price of drugs will be a three-alarm shocker. It will show how difficult it is for the public to get lower drug prices under the present patent monopoly.

You can get a copy of this report by writing to Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.), chairman of the Senate Antitrust subcommittee, Senate Office Building, Washington 25, D. C. Its revelations are important to your family. For one thing, the report will show how and why you are compelled to pay 40-50 cents apiece for tetracycline capsules—the widest-selling broad-range antibiotic—although they cost only 2.5 cents to manufacture.

The committee will start holding new hearings late in June on the Kefauver-Celler bill proposed to correct some of the high-pricing practices. Already the drug industry is mustering opposition to beat the bill.

The Kefauver-Celler bill is one end of a double-barreled attempt by consumer-minded congressmen and community organizations to break the drug industry's price grip on life-saving medicines. While the Kefauver-Celler bill seeks to crack the patent monopoly, labor unions, co-ops, retired-persons' associations, settlement houses and other civic groups are trying to find lower-cost ways of providing vital drugs.

In a number of areas, unions and other groups are arranging with independent pharmacists for discounts, or filling prescriptions through their own health clinics at low prices. Various union locals have made such arrangements in a number of cities, including San Francisco, New York, Portland, Ore., Detroit, Cleveland, others. In New York, 13 unions are organizing Medstore, a proposed chain of drug stores which will operate on a nonprofit basis and also assist independent pharmacies in supplying drugs at reduced prices.

For the information of readers who have asked this department if they can buy from Medstore, it's still in the development stage and not yet operating.

One of the most important provisions of the Kefauver-Celler bill would require drug manufacturers to state the generic name on each package of medicine in the same size type as the brand name. As this department has pointed out, you can buy household medicines like aspirin, milk of magnesia, antihistamines, etc., under their generic names at a fraction of the brand-name price.

BUT WHEN IT COMES to prescription medicines, there are so many that doctors are unable to keep track of the generic names and so tend to prescribe by the brand name. Moreover, drug manufacturers have worked out a new wrinkle—no generic name at all on some recently-developed medicines.

Some drugs now even have more than one generic name. For example, sintcillin, a synthetic penicillin, now has one chemical name, three generic names and five different brand names, reports John Blair, chief economist of the Senate Antitrust subcommittee. The proposed law would require that every drug have a generic name and only one, and that generic names be simpler than the long ones now often used.

But the heart of the bill, and also the most controversial section, is its effort to crack the patent monopoly by providing that after three years, holders of drug patents must license other manufacturers.

Drug manufacturers have argued they need high prices to pay for new research. The fact is, the great bulk of important drugs has come from countries that do not grant patents on drugs at all, and also from university laboratories and such government agencies as the U.S. Agriculture Dept.'s Peoria laboratory, Blair pointed out.

Alexander Fleming, the British scientist who discovered penicillin, which in turn led to the modern antibiotics, refused to take out a patent on it. He left his discovery as a legacy to humanity, and that's why penicillin at least is inexpensive.

Van Arsdale Proposal:

Reunion Sought for Intellectuals, Labor

The following is excerpted from an article in the May 15 Electrical Union World, published by New York Local 3 IBEW, entitled "Labor and the Intelligentsia" by Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., business manager of the local and president of the New York City AFL-CIO.

DURING THE THIRTIES there existed what has been called the "labor-liberal alliance." Historically, this was a significant event in America. This alliance had enormous influence on public opinion and helped make possible the growth and acceptance of trade unionism in America. I am not suggesting that the labor-liberal alliance was fashioned in a wholly altruistic spirit. Nevertheless organized labor learned a great deal from its friends and supporters in the universities, the foundations, in government, the churches and synagogues.

By the end of the war, this alliance had crumbled. Today, with the exception of those intellectuals who specialize in labor-management relations, the intellectual force in America feels as alienated from the labor movement as the labor movement feels alienated from the intellectuals. However, I think the time has come to see if the breach between us can be repaired, not in the name of some doctrinaire philosophy or vague ethic but because this isolation, this sulking in our split-level tents, is a luxury we can no longer afford.

Organized labor needs closer relationships with the American intelligentsia—not because we in labor are wholly without ideas or without some sense of what the world is about. We need this closer relationship because the intellectual's existence is necessarily a commitment by definition to the pursuit of truth. Where this existence is committed to something else than the pursuit of truth, the intellectual has betrayed his vocation.

There is a great concern about the impact of mass culture in our society. Obviously, if mass culture means the lowering of intellectual standards and the cheap driving out the good, then the critics have reason for concern. But we are in an age of mass education and we live by a belief that a man's aspiration to a higher and more useful cultural existence should not be denied him in the name of safeguarding the sacred tabernacles from mass contact.

I RAISE THIS QUESTION because culture, as an entity in American life, is not something with which trade unionism has had any particularly close relationship. Our greatest efforts in the last century were devoted to establishing a system of free public school education. Today we are trying to establish a more democratically available system of higher education.

It is in the field of culture that we need guidance, not friendly disdain. I do not envision the creation of intellectuals en masse among the 16 million trade unionists, since we shall need hewers of wood and drawers of water for some time to come until automation replaces everybody. But still we must take a greater role in an area of life which we have perhaps all too willingly shunned.

In our struggle to maintain and extend the frontiers of freedom, I try to remember that the cause of trade unionism in its real sense is not only to raise wages to new highs every two years. The vocation of a trade union leader also means the pursuit of truth—the truth of freedom in a cold war-torn world. It means giving people a reason and an incentive to resist the invader and to build stronger and more democratic societies.

Labor and the intelligentsia have more in common than we suspect, because we both live by common assumptions. If somehow we can come together, as we were once, if this mood of nostalgia can be transformed into the fact of a new alliance, if our monologues can become a dialogue, if discourse is still possible between us, I suggest that we shall be able to do something about strengthening the democratic way of life, establishing new goals in a threatened society and, even, give purpose anew to so many young people who are today rebels without a cause.

From Soup to Nonsense:

A Pink Plastic Charge Account Tries to File a Straw Complaint

By Jane Goodsell

"GOOD MORNING. J. B. Pringle & Co. department store!"

"I wish to register a complaint, please."

"What is the nature of your complaint, madam?"

"Well, last week you advertised a straw purse at $8.95 and I ordered one by phone, but instead you sent me a pink plastic bag which—"

"Just a moment, madam. I'll connect you with the handbag department."

"Handbags. Miss Mason speaking."

"Hello, I wish to register a complaint. A few days ago you ran an ad for a straw bag at $8.95 and—"

"Yes indeed, madam. May I send you one?"

"No no, you already sent me one. I mean I called up and asked you to send me one but instead you sent me a pink plastic bag and—"

"Do you wish to register a complaint, madam?"

"I most certainly do!"

"I'll connect you with the complaint department. Hold on a moment, please, while I transfer the call."

"Ladies' lingerie, Miss Northrup speaking. May I help you?"

"What department is this?"

"This is ladies' lingerie, madam. May I help you?"

"I want the complaint department."

"I'm sorry, madam. We have no complaint department. I'll connect you with customer's adjustment."

"Adjustment department, Miss Martin speaking. May I help you?"

"YOU CERTAINLY MAY! Last week I called your store and ordered a straw handbag which you had advertised, and instead you sent me a pink plastic bag and—"

"Was it a charge-and-send or a COD, madam?"

"It was charged. In fact, it was overcharged because the pink plastic bag was $10.95 and—"

"Just a moment, madam. I'll connect you with charge accounts."

"Charge accounts, Miss Henderson speaking. May I help you?"

"For crying out loud, I hope so! Last week I ordered a paw strurse—I mean a straw purse—and instead you sent me a pink plastic—"

"I'll connect you with our handbag department, madam. Hold on a minute, please."

"Handbags, Miss Golby speaking. May I help you?"

"Do you have a pink plastic handbag at $10.95?"

"Yes, we do, madam. We have just one left, and I'll be happy to send it to you. What is your name, please?"

"My name is—no no! I already have a pink plastic bag! I don't want it! It's not what I ordered. What I ordered was a straw purse—"

"I'm sorry, madam. I'll connect you with—"

Democracy at Stake:

10 Years to Decide Path of New Nations

An estimated 1.25 billion people—nearly half the world's population—live in 100 underdeveloped non-Communist countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

Their average per capita income is approximately $100 a year — less than 5 percent of the U.S. level.

The problems in these areas are compounded, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research has pointed out, by "an explosive rise in population" which makes economic development and growth "both harder to achieve and more crucially needed."

Labor's Economic Review, published by the department, devotes its entire current issue to exploring the problem of aid to less developed nations and declares that:

"The next 10 years may well determine whether the hundreds of millions of people in the newly developing nations can achieve real gains in an atmosphere of freedom or whether they will decide that only a despotic political system can produce economic growth."

While U.S. foreign aid programs have made "a significant contribution to the growth of the developing countries," the Dept. of Research points out that the program has been handicapped by inability of the U.S. to make long-term financial commitments.

"Economic development is a long-term process," Labor's Economic Review emphasizes. "It cannot be achieved overnight. Therefore it needs to be planned long in advance with assurance that necessary funds will be forthcoming when needed."

'Fresh Approach'

Pres. Kennedy's foreign aid program, the Dept. of Research declares, represents "a fresh approach" which is "thoroughly consistent with the policies in this field the AFL-CIO has long advocated."

Under the new approach, the previous emphasis on assistance for specified individual "projects" would be shifted to national development programs.

The Dept. of Research points out that "many less developed countries are not yet ready for rapid industrialization nor will they ever be unless their people can obtain education, vocational training, housing, medical care and other services needed for betterment of human welfare and efficiency."

In addition, roads, ports, water, power and communications facilities are a necessary prelude to industrial development.

When these conditions are met, the research publication points out, "the most important financial tool in the Kennedy program will be long-term development loans at low or no rates of interest."

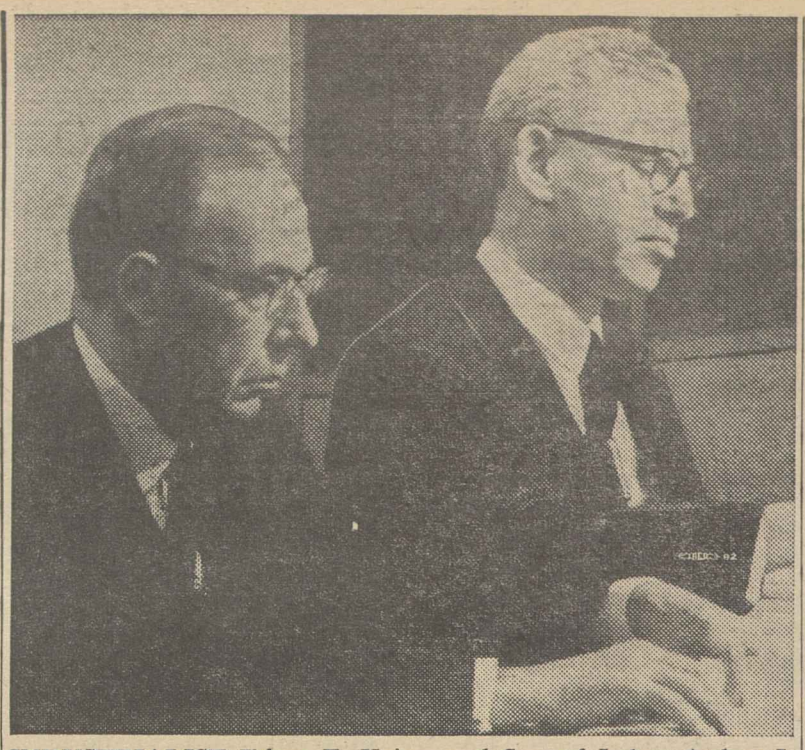
The "right kind" of private investment can also "contribute importantly to the economic growth of the less developed countries," the publication notes.

"What is especially needed is a recast of our tax policy to remove special incentives for foreign investment in industrialized areas and encourage it instead in the less developed countries," it explains.

AFL-CIO Proposals

Pointing out that the emerging nations will have to increase exports as part of their development programs, the publication cites policies advocated by the AFL-CIO "for expanding trade without undue injury to American firms and workers." These include:

- A policy to prevent "market disruption" resulting from "sudden large-scale influxes of imports from low-wage areas." Consideration of this problem is scheduled by GATT —the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade—to which the U.S. and 37 other countries belong.
- Acceptance of the principle of fair labor standards in international trade "to assure that wages and working conditions in the exporting industries of various countries fully reflect the productivity and technological advance of the particular industry and the national economy."
- Establishment of a trade adjustment program to provide help for workers, industries and communities adversely affected by imports.



INDUSTRIALIST Edgar F. Kaiser and Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg discuss on "Briefing Session" the economic prospects and problems raised by automation.

'Briefing Session' Airs Automation Challenge

Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg and industrialist Edgar F. Kaiser, appearing as guest panelists on "Briefing Session," the public affairs television series co-produced by the AFL-CIO & the National Education Television & Radio Center, agreed that automation can be a blessing to human beings if its potential displacement of workers is met vigorously by labor, management and the government.

"We need vigorous government programs," Goldberg said. "We need cooperation between labor and management; we have got to restore our labor force to the mobility that it once had; we have got to take other measures that will accelerate economic growth and create truly new frontiers for our country and for the world."

Kaiser's prescription for meeting the potential loss of jobs was to emphasize economic expansion and the retraining of workers. The standard of living of the world must be improved, he said, adding that if it is to improve "we must do those things which will build products cheaper."

The national work force has been growing at the average rate of 800,000 per year. Nearly a million manufacturing jobs disappeared during last year alone because of automation. Economists estimate that 25,000 jobs a week will have to be created just to take care of the labor force expansion, and that with automation continuing to increase the productivity of workers, 50,000 jobs per week will have to be created to achieve full employment.

What should government's role be in dealing with technological unemployment? Goldberg said that "while we do not want to exclude the role of labor and management we cannot exclude the role of government when the problem is of such large dimension."

"I think in government's role of either moving the people or assisting them or educating you have to be very careful that you do not establish something that destroys the incentive of the individual."

"Briefing Session's" moderator, Edward P. Morgan, asked Goldberg, "Is the feeling general that automation will decrease the bargaining power of responsible labor?"

The Labor Secretary's answer: "I do not believe so. We have a population outburst. Our population is growing at an enormous rate. Now, if we increase our production, if we increase our economic growth, we create more jobs."

In the present situation much of the answer to technological unemployment is training, Kaiser declared.

"As we automate we have less use for unskilled labor, and therefore, we must give greater attention to the education of the unskilled man," he said.

On this aspect of the problem Goldberg commented:

"It deals with the educational system of our country. Unfortunately too many young people are dropping out of school."

In the automated industries, he said, "fewer men may be required but those required are people who have more skills."

Liens to Hit Withholding Tax Stallers

An Internal Revenue Service announcement of a crackdown on employers who don't turn over to the government the taxes they withhold from their workers' pay has been praised as "a welcome step in the right direction" by Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.)

At latest count, 268,396 "sticky-fingered" employers owed the government more than $236 million in withholding taxes.

Each year, for the past seven years, Williams has asked the IRS to furnish him a report on "delinquent" employers who illegally hold on to the government's tax money—often to use it as operating capital for their businesses.

'No Excuse' for Diversion

The Delaware senator has inserted these reports in the Congressional Record and denounced such employers, declaring "there can be no excuse for the diversion of these funds to the employer's personal use."

The new Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mortimer M. Caplin, agreed that the government has been unduly lax in seeing that employers don't misappropriate their workers' taxes.

He announced a "new streamlined procedure" under which the IRS will be able to slap a quick tax lien on employers who don't hand over the tax money when due.

Caplin expressed alarm at the "increasing tendency . . . of some employers to defer as long as possible paying the government the taxes withheld" and declared:

"To permit the continuance of these abuses places an unfair burden on law-abiding employers and the tax-paying public generally."

N. Y. Court Clarifies Jobless Aid in Strike

Albany—The New York Court of Appeals—the state's highest judicial body—has ruled that workers laid off because of a strike against their employer at another location are eligible for immediate unemployment compensation benefits.

The decision, hailed by State AFL-CIO Pres. Harold C. Hanover as "a major victory for labor," reversed a ruling by State Industrial Commissioner Martin P. Catherwood, who had rejected claims for unemployment compensation in the three cases which were decided simultaneously by the court.

Under New York law, a person unemployed "because of a strike, lockout or other industrial controversy in the establishment in which he was employed" must wait seven weeks before being eligible for jobless benefits.

In a 5-to-2 decision, the court ruled that the term "establishment" applied to a geographical location—a single plant or office —and not to all operations under a common management.

Therefore, the court held, a strike limited to workers in one location could not be used to deny benefits to laid-off workers at another plant of the company, even if they were members of the same union.

The State AFL-CIO carried the legal fight in one of the test cases involving a group of employes of the F. L. Heughes Co. of Rochester, which operates a steel fabricating plant and also is engaged in erecting steel structures at other locations.

The structural workers, members of Iron Workers Local 33, struck in June 1958 but did not set up picket lines at the fabricating plant where members of the union's Local 464 workers. About one-fourth of the plant employes were laid off at the fabricating plant, the employer attributing this to effects of the strike.

The applications of the laid-off workers for unemployment insurance were rejected by the industrial commissioner. On appeal, however, the workers' claims were successively upheld by a referee, by the Unemployment Insurance Appeals Board and by an intermediate appellate court before Catherwood took the case to the Court of Appeals, which also ruled against him.

The other cases decided by the Court of Appeals involved employes of National Airlines who were furloughed during an unrelated strike of ticket agents and a group of carpenters on a road construction project laid off after a Teamsters strike cut off supplies.

McNamara Asks Curb On Plant Piracy Bonds

Sen. Pat. McNamara (D-Mich.) has introduced legislation to end the tax-exempt status of municipal bonds issued to lure industry from one area to another.

Charging that "industrial piracy" in effect is being subsidized by the federal government and the taxpayers, McNamara said it is "no mere coincidence" that industrial development bonds are usually issued in areas where wage rates are sub-standard.

Congress, in passing the Area Redevelopment Act earlier this year, included a provision establishing the principle that the federal government should not give aid to industrial piracy. The act banned the use of federal funds for plant relocation or for establishment of a new branch of an existing firm unless it would "not substantially decrease employment" in the original location.

Some 15 states permit municipalities to issue tax-exempt bonds to build new plants to attract industry, McNamara said, and "the practice is growing."

"The luring of business from one location to another with unfair concessions is bad enough without having such practices underwritten by the taxpayers in the very area from which the industry was stolen," he added.

McNamara said there is "real tragedy" for the workers who are left behind when a plant moves out of a community.

"These workers will have a difficult time finding new employment," he asserted, "and the shattering effect on their lives and that of their families is the most insidious part of this industrial piracy."

Declaring "there is nothing wrong with healthy competition between the states," McNamara pointed out that many firms have moved to Michigan because of its skilled work force and its relation to markets, while others have moved out because another location best suited their needs. He added:

"No one is complaining of this kind of competition. What is at issue is the unfair competition, what might be called the 'loss leader' approach to lure industry, with taxpayers elsewhere in the nation footing the bill."

'Briefing' to Mull Democracy Next

"Is Democracy Obsolete?" is the title of the coming program in the "Briefing Session" series.

Guest panelists will be Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and historian Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.

Humphrey is the Senate majority whip and a member of the Foreign Relations, Government Operations and Appropriations committees.

Schlesinger is the author of many historical books, and an adviser and speech writer for Pres. Kennedy. He won the Pulitzer prize for history in 1945.

Labor Calendar Of Conventions

Herewith is a list of conventions scheduled for the rest of the year by the AFL-CIO and its departments, by national and international union affiliates and by state central bodies. Changes and additions will be reported.

House Votes to Seat Roush In Contested Indiana Election

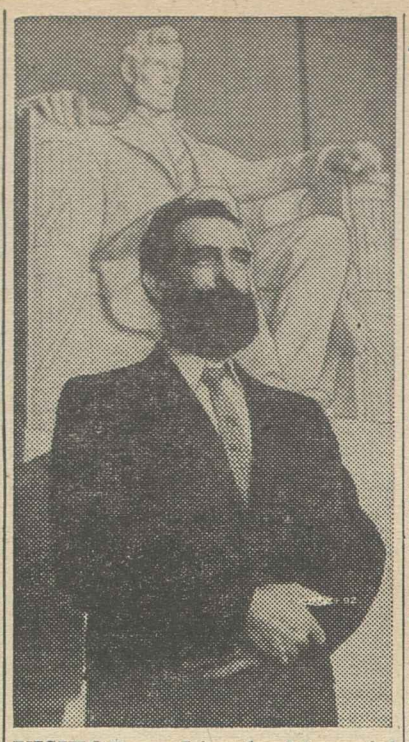
The House of Representatives has decided a contested Indiana election in favor of Democrat J. Edward Roush, who was promptly seated from the Fifth District.

A committee report holding that Roush had defeated his Republican opponent, George O. Chambers, by 99 votes in last November's election was adopted by voice vote. Chambers had held the seat pending the contest.

Republicans, although generally voting against the seating of Roush, did not challenge the integrity of the recount conducted by a House subcommittee under Rep. Robert T. Ashmore (D-S. C.).

Rousch was sworn in by Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.) to raise the Democratic strength in the House to 263. There are 174 Republicans.

Both Roush and Chambers will be paid salary and expenses retroactive to Jan. 3, when Congress convened.



VISITOR at Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D. C., is Robert Woodman, a delegate to the Rubber Workers' educational institute, who grew his beard to help observe the Kansas statehood centennial this year. Woodman is a member of Goodyear Local 307 at Topeka.

Meany Again Gives Backing To UNICEF

Organized labor's support of the United Nations Intl. Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF) was re-emphasized by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in an appeal that union members "tangibly support" it.

Meany's assurance of the continuing endorsement was expressed in a letter to Mrs. Guido Pantaleoni, Jr., president of the U.S. Committee for UNICEF. The organization has food distribution and welfare programs under way on four continents and is financed by voluntary contributions from governments, organizations and individuals.

"Your work in bringing food and medical care to children around the world helps meet an urgent humanitarian need and aids world peace and understanding," Meany wrote Mrs. Pantaleoni.

"The American labor movement has traditionally been concerned with child welfare both at home and abroad. We have supported and shall continue to support legislative measures aimed at assuring a decent life for children. One test of man's stewardship is the world his children inherit and we and UNICEF seek that better world."

'Tripartism' Remanded:

Bigger Role Sought By Red Bloc in ILO

Geneva, Switzerland—Delegates to the Intl. Labor Organization's 45th conference here were faced with an immediate Soviet bid for a bigger role for Iron Curtain countries in the 97-nation organization and in staff representation involving ILO activities.

The Communist proposal closely resembles the Soviet Union's "troika" plan to dilute the authority of the United Nations secretary-general through a three-man secretariat which would give the Red bloc a built-in veto over the UN's day-to-day operations.

The Soviet government delegate to the ILO, Ivan Goroshkin, charged that an "abnormal situation" now prevails in the ILO, one of the UN's specialized agencies. At the opening of general debate, he sounded a demand for "tripartism," apparently involving parallel representation for the Communist bloc, the free world and the so-called uncommitted nations.

Reds Try To Rule Staffing

A key Soviet bloc resolution, submitted by Poland and the Ukraine, demands a halt in recruitment of ILO staff employes from the western democracies and a step-up in recruitment from the Communist countries and "from countries which have attained independence." The latter part of the resolution was regarded here as an effort to enlist the support of the newly independent African nations.

The Soviet campaign for greater representation follows a setback in the ILO Governing Body earlier this year, when a proposal for an appropriation for a new top-level administrative post for a Soviet representative was rejected.

Worker delegates dealt an opening setback to the Soviet drive by freezing out of the key resolutions committee the government-controlled "worker" delegates from the Iron Curtain countries.

Among the 15 worker spokesmen named to the committee were Bert Seidman, AFL-CIO economist, and Kalmen Kaplansky of the Canadian Labor Congress. Soviet bloc delegates were limited to deputy memberships, with voices but without voting rights.

While working to bottle up Communist political moves, the representatives of free unions will also seek to advance the cause of older workers through a proposal submitted by Rudy Faupl, U.S. worker delegate, and Stanley H. Knowles, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress.

The proposal asks the conference to call on governments and on worker and employer organizations to give special attention to the needs of older workers both while they are still employed and in retirement. It also provides for increased activity by the ILO in this field.

Nearly 90 countries were represented by more than 800 worker, government and employer delegates and their advisers when the conference unanimously elected M. A. Raschid, Burma's Minister for Industry, Mines & Labor, as president of the three-week session.

Raschid immediately called on the ILO "to shoulder increasing responsibilities in Asia and Africa."

"Lack of progress in Asia is a potential danger to the whole world," he added. The peace for which the people of the world yearn "cannot be achieved unless economic and social standards are raised fast," he said, adding:

"The ILO has even a bigger part in the task in this respect in the future than it had in the past. It will have to help in preparing the men who will be the backbone for such development."

The conference was formally opened by George C. Lodge, retiring U.S. assistant secretary of labor, in his capacity as chairman of the Governing Body.

Weaver U.S. Leader

George L-P Weaver, Lodge's designated successor as assistant secretary, is leading the American government delegation to the conference.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Harry C. Bates is assigned to the committee dealing with workers' housing. Sitting on the committee on vocational training is Pres. James A. Brownlow of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.

James P. Griffin of the Steelworkers is on the committee preparing new international standards on hours of work, while Research Dir. Solomon Barkin of the Textile Workers Union of America is assigned to the committee dealing with employment problems.

Other members of the American workers' team are Toney Gallo, secretary-treasurer of the Cement Workers, who is on the social security committee, and Lester L. Zosel of the Railway Clerks, sitting on a committee on technical cooperation.

Michigan Governor Vetoes Bill To Restrict Unemployment Benefits

Lansing—Michigan's Gov. John B. Swainson (D) has vetoed an employer-backed unemployment compensation bill which would have given employers a $162 million "windfall" and denied jobless benefits to workers idled by labor disputes in other states.

The vetoed bill had been rammed through the Republican-controlled legislature over the vigorous protests of the state's labor movement. It would have:

- Overturned a Michigan Supreme Court decision—known as the Ford-Canton case—which held that Michigan workers laid off because of a strike at an out-of-state plant by another local of their union were eligible for unemployment compensation.

Swainson said this decision merely brought Michigan's unemployment compensation law "into conformity with 44 other states and the District of Columbia."

- Forgiven a $162 million debt to the state unemployment compensation fund which currently is owed by businesses with unstable employment records.
- Raised the unemployment compensation tax rate and tax base, but provided only token increases in benefits. In his veto message, Swainson said the higher benefits "would affect only a minority of workers already at the maximum rate" and the average increase would be only $1.40 a week.

Swainson said he vetoed the bill, after listening to arguments on both sides, because it failed to meet the "pressing need" for strengthening the unemployment compensation trust fund and would "disadvantage workers" through "highly objectionable amendments to the labor disputes section of the law."

He said the proposed amendments "would deprive a host of innocent people of the opportunity to establish eligibility for unemployment compensation."

Swainson urged that the next session of the legislature put "high on the agenda" action on legislation "to provide an equitable tax rate and base, and to provide for adequate adjustments in benefits."

The vetoed bill, he emphasized, "fails to do any of these things."

The Michigan State AFL-CIO praised Swainson for "courageously" using his veto power to disapprove various bills passed by the GOP legislature that the state federation branded "special interest" measures.

Meany Speaks to Musicians:

Business Seen Lacking 'Plan' To Rehire Jobless Workers

By Eugene A. Kelly

Atlantic City—A blunt warning that the Soviets will "win the cold war without firing a shot" unless America can make its economic system work was sounded by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the 64th annual convention of the Musicians here.

Charging that the American private enterprise system has "no plan" to provide jobs for the millions of unemployed, Meany told the delegates that it's up to the government to meet the challenge, and that labor "has the responsibility to demonstrate to the rest of the world that democracy really works."

The convention, largest in AFM history with 1,182 delegates representing the union's 269,000 members, reelected four top officers and five members of the international executive board, and adopted a legislative program designed to carry on the accomplishments of the last year.

Re-elected without opposition were Pres. Herman Kenin, New York; Vice Pres. William J. Harris, Dallas; Sec. Stanley Ballard and Treas. George V. Clancy, Newark, N. J.; Board Members Lee Repp, Cleveland; E. E. "Joe" Stokes, Houston; Alfred J. Manuti, New York; Charles H. Kennedy, San Francisco; and Walter M. Murdoch, Toronto.

Kenin urged the delegates to support these objectives:

- Complete the task, already half won, of convincing Congress it should eliminate the "job-destroying" cabaret tax.
- Work for passage of pending bills to provide a Federal Arts Council and grants-in-aid to states for music and other performing arts.
- Continue the fight on foreign-made music recordings, imported as substitutes for American-made music in American-made television films.
- Continue to insist that the broadcasting industry live up to its license obligations to the public and performers.

Meany Lauds Union

Kenin introduced Meany as "Mr. American Labor" and the "father of labor unity." The AFL-CIO president praised the union and its officers for the "practical results" they achieved in overcoming the fallacy that musicians really don't need to eat "because music is its own reward."

Everything labor does today must be viewed in the light of world problems, Meany said, noting that the United States is a nation at war —not a "shooting war at the moment, but just as much a war as any others—between slavery and freedom.

"The enemy has made his objectives crystal clear," he said—destruction of our way of life, the democratic way, and the substitution of a system where the state is supreme.

Asserting that the Soviets have made tremendous progress since World War II, and that at least 12 formerly free countries have gone into a state of slavery, Meany said the world outlook, and the status of Cuba and Laos, do not make a pretty picture.

"What shall be our attitude?" he asked the convention, asserting that "we are American citizens before we are trade unionists."

His answer was that it is labor's role to make every contribution possible to the maintenance and preservation of the free way of life —the "only way of life where people can gather freely to enhance their own welfare."

Employers Like 'Reservoir'

Meany said he has an impression that many businessmen "like the idea of a large percentatge of unemployed" workers and believes the business community has made "no plans for providing jobs for the millions who seek jobs," whose numbers are getting larger every year.

"We have failed to keep pace with our growing population—we are not prepared," he said.

"The government must meet this challenge. We need more technically trained people to meet the impact of automation. We are definitely falling behind in the field of education."

Labor's No. 1 job is to go back to the "simple philosophy" of the trade union movement, to raise standards through hard work, through organization and through bettering the lives of workers on the job and in the home.

In the international field, labor must help raise labor standards abroad because the underpaid worker is a threat to the well-organized and well-paid worker, Meany said. He praised labor's role in helping to strengthen the free trade unions of western Germany, Italy and France.

Labor can play a part also in bringing the message of democratic trade unionism to the emerging nations of the world, Meany asserted.

High School Students Visit Union Sessions

Detroit—High school students here are learning at first hand how unions operate under a program initiated by Budd Local 306 of the Auto Workers.

Groups of students are invited to sit in on the local's executive board meetings and to ask questions at any point on the agenda. At a recent session, students from Osborn High School heard the board discuss:

- A proposed change in the Blue Cross program.
- Seeking of strike authorization in a dispute over seniority violations and penalties to stewards.
- Voting rights for laid-off union members.
- A proposed Detroit income tax.
- Procedures for recall of workers.
- The local's blood bank drive. At the time the board met, some 1,000 union members had already volunteered to donate blood.
- The local's monthly financial report.
- Negotiations with Office Employes Local 42, with the UAW local in the capacity of the employer.

The unique program was developed by Tom Simon, education director of Local 306, who said it will give youngsters "the chance to see that labor unions are an important part of community life."

Local Pres. William Callison welcomed the students to the meeting, explained the procedures and introduced the board members.

After the meeting, one student summed up the group's reaction, declaring: "You can learn only so much from books . . . It was worth while."

A teacher who accompanied the students joined in praising the program and expressed the hope that employers would pick up the idea and invite students to sit in on boards of directors' meetings.

5 Unionists Selected As Area Aid Advisers

Five union officials and staff members have been appointed by Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges to the 25-member National Public Advisory Committee on Area Redevelopment.

The committee, which will make recommendations on programs to help the nation's depressed areas, is headed by LeRoy Collins, former governor of Florida and currently president of the National Association of Broadcasters.

Committee members, who will serve without compensation, include: Sol Barkin, research director of the Textile Workers Union of America; Frank Fernbach, economist with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research; Albin J. Gruhn, president of the California State AFL-CIO; Miles C. Stanley, president of West Virginia State AFL-CIO; Joseph Kennedy, assistant to the president of the unaffiliated Mine Workers.

Earlier, Area Redevelopment Administrator William L. Batt, Jr., made public a list of the first 114 labor market areas which have been designated as redevelopment areas, eligible for federal assistance. Additional communities are expected to be added as surveys show they meet the standards of "substantial and persistent unemployment" for an extended period of time.

The first group includes communities in 29 states and Puerto Rico. To receive aid, they are to submit overall economic development plans subject to approval by the Secretary of Commerce.

Areas in the first listing are:

ALABAMA—Gadsden, Jasper.

ALASKA—Anchorage.

CALIFORNIA — Modesto, Ukiah.

CONNECTICUT — Ansonia, Bristol, Danielson.

GEORGIA—Cedartown-Rockmart.

ILLINOIS — Cairo-Metropolis, Centralia, Harrisburg, Herrin-Murphysboro, West Frankfort, Litchfield, Mount Vernon.

INDIANA—Evansville, New Castle.

KANSAS—Pittsburg.

KENTUCKY—Corbin, Hazard, Hopkinsville, Madisonville, Middlesboro-Harlan, Morehead-Grayson, Paducah, Paintsville-Prestonsburg, Pikeville-Williamson.

MAINE—Biddeford-Sanford.

MARYLAND — Cambridge, Cumberland, Hagerstown.

MASSACHUSETTS—Fall River, Lowell, New Bedford, North Adams.

MICHIGAN—Adrian, Bay City, Detroit, Flint, Marquette, Monroe, Port Huron.

MINNESOTA — Brainerd-Grand Rapids, Hibbing-Virginia.

MISSOURI—Flat River, Washington.

MONTANA—Butte, Kalispell.

NEW JERSEY—Atlantic City. Bridgeton, Long Branch, Ocean City-Wildwood-Cape May.

NEW YORK—Amsterdam, Auburn, Gloversville, Jamestown-Dunkirk, Ogdensburg-Massena-Malone, Plattsburg.

NORTH CAROLINA—Fayetteville, Kinston, Lumberton, Wilson.

OHIO — Athens-Logan-Nelsonville, Batavia-Georgetown-West Union, Cambridge, Portsmouth-Chillicothe.

OKLAHOMA — McAlester, Muskogee.

PENNSYLVANIA — Altoona, Berwick-Bloomsburg, Butler, Clearfield-Dubois, Erie, Indiana, Johnstown, Kittanning-Ford City, Lewistown, Meadville, New Castle, Pittsburgh, Pottsville, St. Marys, Scranton, Sayre-Athens-Towanda, Sunbury - Shamokin - Mount Carmel, Uniontown-Connellsville, Wilkes-Barre and Hazleton.

PUERTO RICO—Mayaguez, Ponce, San Juan.

RHODE ISLAND—Providence-Pawtucket.

SOUTH CAROLINA—Conway.

TENNESSEE — LaFollette-Jellico-Tazewell.

TEXAS—Laredo.

VIRGINIA—Big Stone Gap, Appalachia.

WASHINGTON — Aberdeen, Anacortes, Centralia, Port Angeles, Yakima.

United Presbyterians Hit 'Right-To-Work'

Buffalo, N. Y.—The United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., one of the nation's principal Protestant denominations, has reaffirmed its opposition to so-called "right-to-work" laws, describing such legislation as imposing the "compulsory open shop."

The General Assembly, highest policy-making body of the church, at its recent meeting here rejected a proposal that the church reconsider its 1959 pronouncement on collective bargaining.

Quotes Earlier Statement

At that time, the General Assembly held that "union membership as a basis of continued employment should be neither required by law nor forbidden by law" and that the issue of a union shop or other forms of union security should be determined "by collective bargaining."

The 1961 session of the church body upheld a committee report recommending "no action" on a request by the Omaha Presbytery that the General Assembly "remove the present commitment against laws requiring or forbidding compulsory unionism."

The committee report declared in part:

"We feel that the 1959 pronouncement dealt clearly and fairly with the issue of collective bargaining . . . And we feel the General Assembly would be ill advised in taking an action which would be widely interpreted as recommending state legislation which makes the open shop compulsory.

"We feel that the terms 'right-to-work' and 'compulsory unionism' are not accurate . . . and that the term 'compulsory open shop' is a more exact description.

"Compulsory open shop legislation interposes the power of state government to produce in that state a compulsory open shop in all industries, regardless of their size or nature.

"The absence of compulsory open shop legislation permits management and union in each industry to bargain collectively and work out voluntarily the arrangement that is a workable compromise between their respective interests."

Youth Job Training Program Proposed by Administration

Unemployment among the nation's young people is running at a rate "more than twice the national average," the Kennedy Administration has told Congress in urging action on a three-pronged job training program for American youth.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, leadoff witness at hearings before a Senate Labor subcommittee headed by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), said enactment of the three-year, $275 million program for pilot projects in this area is needed to avert a problem which could assume "serious proportions."

In January of this year, Goldberg said, unemployment in the 16-to-20 age group was running at a rate of 16.8 percent—more than twice the true unemployment rate of 7.7 for the work force as a whole. The Secretary termed this "an appalling waste of the talents and incentives of our youth."

The Administration proposal — contained in bills sponsored in the Senate by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and in the House by Representatives Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) and John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.)—calls for:

● An on-the-job training program, supplemented by classroom instructions, to "improve the employability of young people and to enhance their chance of advancement" once they enter the labor force.

● A public-service, public-work employment and training program, operated in conjunction with state and local governments, to develop training experience with public agencies or publicly owned facilities, such as schools and hospitals, and on programs for improvement or expansion of conservation, recreational or other community facilities.

● A youth conservation corps, similar to the Civilian Conservation Corps of the New Deal era, that would involve a camp-oriented program of both federal and state conservation.

Would Use All Facilities

The Administration proposal for on-the-job training would direct the Labor Secretary to make "maximum use" of labor and industry training facilities, as well as those provided by other community groups, and would insure that wages of trainees are "comparable" to those paid learners performing similar work in the community.

In the public service employment program, the bill contains safeguards to make certain that trainees "would not displace regular workers," Goldberg said, and also provides that rates of pay must be comparable to those paid for similar work in the locality.

The measure would authorize federal financing, under certain conditions, of the cost of on-the-job training; and would permit the federal government to pay 50 percent of the cost of training on public-service projects, up to a maximum of $20 a week per trainee.

For the youth conservation corps, trainees would receive a base compensation of $70 a month, subsistence, necessary equipment, transportation and similar expenses.

'Staggering' Labor Force Rise

Goldberg told the subcommittee that the bill's primary purpose "is to acknowledge federal responsibility for finding some solutions to the urgent need of young people in this country for training and useful employment to equip them for productive lives in our modern and fast-changing society."

The magnitude of the youth employment problem, he said, is reflected in the fact that a "staggering" 26 million young people will enter the labor force in the next decade. He called the volume "unprecedented in our history."

Unless both training and jobs are made available to the nation's youth, the Cabinet officer said, "their future outlook is extremely dark."

Goldberg said the program for aiding young people dovetails with the Administration's proposal—endorsed unanimously by the labor, management and public members of the President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy—for a broad program of retraining and relocating adults made jobless by the impact of automation and industrial changes.

Jobless Aid Standards Urged by Kennedy

tration has proposed legislative measures aimed at reducing unemployment, but he conceded that joblessness will continue to plague the nation and that steps are needed to ease the impact of this continued idleness.

Accompanying the presidential proposal was a letter from Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg which declared the unemployment compensation system "is not today doing many of the things that it can and must do if we are to realize more fully its basic objectives" of easing the personal hardships of unemployment and of shoring up the economy.

The Administration bill would:

● Set up on a standby basis an emergency program of temporary extension of unemployment compensation, similar to the one now in effect, for use in recession periods.

● Broaden coverage to include firms with one or more employes, non-profit organizations, and agricultural processors.

● Require, beginning in 1964, state laws to provide benefits equal to 50 percent of the individual's normal wage, not to exceed 50 percent of each state's average weekly wage. This would rise to 60 percent of the state's average weekly wage in 1966, and to two-thirds in 1968.

In the letter from Goldberg which Kennedy transmitted to Congress, the Labor Secretary conceded that the changes "do not represent everything that might be done to effect improvements" in the jobless pay system. He added:

"They do, however, constitute a new and practical program which, if enacted, would greatly strengthen the structure and operation of the system, as well as provide a foundation for future improvements."

Senate Acts on Housing, Battle Shifts to House

000-to-$6,000 income class to obtain a 40-year mortgage on a $15,000 home by making a maximum down payment of $555. Earlier the Senate beat back Republican efforts to strip from the bill its provisions for long-term loans for rental housing for medium-income families.

The House is scheduled to take up a generally similar bill—one of Kennedy's "big five" legislative proposals for this session of Congress—during the week of June 19, and is tentatively due to follow with debates the week of June 26 on the Senate-passed federal school aid measure.

The Senate housing bill provides:

● $2.5 billion for urban renewal and slum clearance grants over the next four years. Of this, $50 million is earmarked for grants for demonstration projects on city mass-transit systems.

● $1.35 billion for college dormitory loans over the next five years.

● $1.2 billion for direct home loans for veterans in the next six years.

● $750 million for Federal National Mortgage Association financing of programs including aid to moderate-income families.

● $100 million in loans to help improve mass-transit facilities in major cities.

● $80 million for planning assistance grants under the urban renewal program.

● $50 million for direct loans for housing for the elderly.

● $50 million for loans to cities for public facilities.

In addition, the bill contains a new feature which broadens the home-loan improvement program, raising the ceiling for such loans from $3,500 to $10,000, and extending the repayment period from its present five-year maximum to 20 years.

The measure cleared by the House Banking Committee for floor action calls for somewhat smaller sums for urban renewal grants and college housing loans.

However, it would provide 10 times as much as the Senate measure for community facilities loans, and twice as much for loans for construction of housing for the elderly.

The House bill does not include the $1.2 billion for the veterans' direct-loan program, but a separate measure authorizing this addition to the GI program was passed by the House in April.

Ray Nixon Dies; URW Area Chief

Charlotte, N. C.—Ray C. Nixon, since 1941 southern district director of the Rubber Workers with headquarters in Atlanta, died here after a brief illness. He was 55.

A long-time member of Charlotte Typographical Union 338, he had worked for 18 years on the Charlotte Observer and served as a special representative of the international union. In 1937 he joined the staff of the then newly-formed Textile Workers Organizing Committee, out of which the Textile Workers Union of America grew, and served as Alabama director before his association with the URW.

Court Limits Political Use Of Dissenter's Union Dues

Housing Bill Under Fire By GOP

By Gene Zack

The House has opened debate on Pres. John F. Kennedy's multi-billion-dollar housing and urban renewal program, with Republican opponents sustaining an initial defeat in their attempt to scuttle all of the new programs contained in the omnibus measure.

The Administration measure survived its first crucial test when, by a teller vote of 197 to 164, the House turned back a substitute $1.1 billion bill offered by the GOP which would merely have refinanced existing programs for one year.

At the same time, the Administration's $2.5 billion federal aid-to-public-education bill ran into a major roadblock as the House Rules Committee refused immediate clearance pending action on other school legislation that would provide some type of federal aid to private as well as public schools.

The two bills, to which Kennedy has assigned "top priority" in this session of the 87th Congress, already have been passed by the Senate in substantially the form requested by the White House.

In a move designed to strengthen Administration forces, Rep. Albert Rains (D-Ala.), floor manager for the housing measure, offered to drop the controversial no-down-payment feature in a new section that would permit long-term mortgages on middle-income housing.

Kennedy had asked for 40-year, government-insured loans without down payments for families in the $4,000-to-$6,000 income bracket, pointing out that such families currently are priced out of the housing market.

The Rains compromise would reduce the term for such mortgages to 35 years. The Senate, before passing the Administration bill, had also dropped the no-down-payment provision but had retained the 40-year mortgage feature.

On school aid, the Rules Committee voted 9-6 to bottle up, for the present, not only federal grants for classroom construction and teachers' salaries, but also an Administration program for college scholarships.

Two liberal northern Democrats — Representatives Thomas P. O'Neill (Mass.) and James J. Delaney (N.Y.)—joined with the committee's conservative Republican-southern Democratic bloc against clearance of the two education measures.

What the Rules Committee is now waiting for is the bill which would extend the National Defense Education Act, one feature of which would make possible some low-interest, long-term loans for private schools.

75,000 Out In 3-Coast Ship Strike

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—Crews of American-owned deepwater ships are tieing up their vessels as they reach port on the Atlantic, Gulf and Pacific coasts and walking picket lines in a nationwide strike for better working conditions, with the "runaway flag fleet" one of the major issues.

Five AFL-CIO unions walked out when their contracts expired June 15 without counter-offers by major shippers. The unions—Maritime Union, Seafarers, Marine Engineers, Masters, Mates & Pilots, and the American Radio Association—are striking for improved contracts and the inclusion of ships registered under foreign flags by U.S. owners to escape American wages and taxes.

As some 75,000 unionists took turns at picket duty and port traffic came to a halt, federal mediators continued efforts to bring maritime management back to the bargaining table with labor representatives.

Meanwhile there were these developments:

- Three union presidents—Joseph Curran of thhe NMU, Charles P. Crooks of MMP and William Steinberg of ARA—reported after almost a week of the strike that shipowners were "beginning to negotiate" a settlement.
- SIU and MEBA reached agreement with 65 companies operating 262 ships on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts in dry cargo and passenger service. SIU Pres. Paul Hall and MEBA Pres. Edward Altman said the agreement recognized the right of the unions to organize "foreign flag" ships and the setting up of joint labor-management committees to draft a program for development and growth of the American merchant marine.
- Before the strike started, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg met with both sides in New York, reported in detail to Pres. John F.

NEW JOB OPPORTUNITIES for physically handicapped workers are opened in Office Employes' contract with the French Lines in New York. Under the agreement, the union will refer qualified handicapped workers and the company will employ them. Taking part in the signing on board the liner "Liberte" are, left to right, Guy de Berc of the company; Sec.-Treas. Ben J. Cohan of OEIU Local 153; Joseph F. Finnegan, chairman of the State Board of Conciliation & Mediation; Local 153 Business Rep. John Kelly; City Labor Commissioner Harold Felix; Orin J. Lehman, chairman of the New York State Employ the Physically Handicapped Committee, and Charles de Maria, a company negotiator.

Railroad Union Shop Pacts OK

By David L. Perlman

The Supreme Court has upheld enforcement of railroad union shop contracts but has ruled that individual members who disagree with their union's legislative or political activities may avoid having their dues used for such programs.

The court made it clear, however, that its decision did not relieve dissenting members of the obligation to pay their share of the collective bargaining costs and normal operating expenses of the unions which represent them.

Existence of a union shop contract, the court also declared, does not block a union from carrying on its legislative and political activities, even if a minority opposes these policies.

"The majority also has an interest in stating its views without being silenced by dissenters," the court said.

The high court overturned a Georgia court's injunction which barred enforcement of the union shop agreement on the Southern Railway System unless the unions abandoned political or legislative activity.

'Less Drastic' Formula

Holding in effect that such a sweeping ruling was unfair to the majority of workers, the Supreme Court instructed the state court to come up with a less drastic formula which would permit a dissenting union member to separate himself from financial support of political programs with which he disagrees.

The Supreme Court suggested two methods by which this could be accomplished:

- A dissenting member might

Armour Contract Study:

Automation Panel Cites Growth Need

Chicago—"Adequate economic growth"—sufficient to offset "currently excessive unemployment" and increasing productivity and to absorb both workers displaced by automation and newcomers to the labor force—is "essential . . . to orderly economic and social development," a unique tripartite panel on automation has agreed.

The committee, created in August 1959 under bargaining agreements between Armour & Co. and the Meat Cutters and the Packinghouse Workers, called for "coordinated" public and private actions to ease technology's impact since "collective bargaining, by itself, cannot fully solve these problems."

The report of the committee, representing both unions, management and the public, was cautious in proposed specific remedies for meeting the job displacement problem. It admitted the members had made only "modest progress" in two years of studies.

The UPWA and the Meat Cutters, in a strong separate statement, criticized the total report's failure to display a proper "sense of urgency" and called some of its tentative suggestions "too little and too late."

In particular, the unions strongly urged consideration of a shortened workweek with no loss of take-

AFL-CIO Supports Aid Program, Hails Long-Term Financing Plan

By Gervase N. Love

The AFL-CIO's long-standing endorsement of foreign aid was formally renewed by Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that gave particularly warm approval to Pres. Kennedy's plan for unified administration of the program and for making development loan funds available on a long-term basis.

"You may recall that we have advocated similar measures for many years," he reminded the committee. "Whether we like it or not, the U.S.—at least in our view—will be engaged in foreign aid activities for a long time to come. It is essential to proper planning on both the giving and receiving ends to have the assurance of continuity."

Biemiller, who also voiced AFL-CIO endorsement of the generally higher amounts sought in the Administration proposal, said long-range commitments would give a nation receiving aid "the same feeling of confidence" a union gets from a union security clause in a bargaining agreement.

The Administration is asking $2.5 billion in cash and loan funds for fiscal 1962 and authority to draw

Study Urges Flexible Tax, Credit Policy

By Saul Miller

The federal government has a primary duty to keep the nation in tip-top economic health and the President must have greater powers to counter the ups and downs of the business cycle—including authority to cut or increase income taxes and to dry public spending—and a greater voice in credit policy making.

That's the theme of the first intensive study of the nation's money and credit system in 50 years by a top-flight 20-man commission composed of leaders in banking, business, education and labor.

Durham, a union shop steward at the Brown & Williamson tobacco plant in Louisville, Ky., was honored for his years of community work with youth groups. In top photo, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany admires the medal which was presented earlier by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg. Looking on are Mrs. Durham and Tobacco Workers Pres. John O'Hare. Musicians Shift Policy On Record Bargaining

Atlantic City—Delegates to the 64th annual convention of the Musicians have given union officers the authority to change the historic policy of the AFM on bargaining for royalties from recordings and television film.

The convention, after vigorous debate, approved a recommendation by AFM officers that negotiators be authorized to "exchange any part of trust fund payments" for improved wage agreements the next time they bargain with the recording industry.

The action was necessary, AFM Pres. Herman Kenin told the 1,222 delegates, because of changed conditions in the industry, including a feeling on the part of some musicians whom Kenin described as being "less than enthusiastic" about the Music Recording Trust Fund first set up in 1947.

The convention decided to intensify its political education campaigns on the local, state and national levels in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education and with TEMPO—Task Force for Employment of Musicians Promotional Organization. Delegates also:

- Referred to the executive board a proposal to amend the Federal Copyright Act to establish performing and property rights for musicians like those now held by composers and authors.
- Voted to support the Kennedy Administration's education bill.
- Upheld committee action in rejecting a resolution instructing Kenin not to negotiate any agreements diverting income from the Music Performance Trust. Delegates from Chicago Local 10, headed by James C. Petrillo, who was AFM president when the trust fund was first set up, supported Kenin's position after conferring with Petrillo by telephone.
- Recommended that a forum dealing with symphony orchestra problems be sponsored by the AFT every year.

The action on collective bargaining policy followed a speech by Kenin praising Petrillo for his leadership in establishing the Music Performance Trust, which he described as an "historic achievement."

The board recommended, and the convention agreed, that negotiators with the recording industry should be left free to change the trust fund formula, if necessary. Under it, small royalties on the sale of recordings and television film have been put into a fund which pays out more than $5 million a year for an average of almost 35,000 "live" music performers at free concerts by AFM members.

Saying that the lessons of history call for "new imaginative solutions," the AFM president cited recent Hollywood contract negotiations in which it was agreed that all motion picture and television film produced in the United States and Canada will have music provided by U.S. and Canadian musicians.

The delegates agreed to continue the campaign to abolish the 10 percent cabaret tax.

The next convention cities will be Pittsburgh in 1962, Miami in 1963 and Santa Barbara, Calif., in 1964.

At Kansas City Convention:

CWA Urges Federal Action To Meet Automation Issue

By Willard Shelton

Kansas City—The problems of automation and the need to broaden worker organization in the communications industry were central themes as the 23rd annual convention of the Communications Workers met here.

A resolution on automation, pointing out that in five years the volume of business of Bell system companies had increased by 29.6 percent while employment dropped 6.2 percent, recommended a major program of federal government action that included:

- Expansion of the Labor Dept.'s new Office of Automation into a full-fledged permanent bureau.
- Federal assistance to retrain and move to new locations workers displaced by technological change.
- Creation of a "national security fund" to finance retraining programs and to provide "maintenance of a 40-hour pay level" for workers whose hours are sharply reduced because of automation.
- Strengthening of the U.S. Employment Service and provision of earlier voluntary retirement for displaced workers under the social security system.

In his keynote address, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne warned that the communications industry "stands in the vanguard of utilizing new devices."

Satellite Program

"Coast-to-coast telephone calls [already] have been routed through radio signals thrown into space and bounced off the Echo One satellite" hurling in orbit, Beirne said, and the Bell System is now seeking to put its own satellite into space "to bounce back not only voice communication but television, nonvoice, data processing and the Lord only knows what else."

"As citizens, we believe in it. We would not oppose it if we could," said the CWA president. "Our challenge is to make certain that we share the benefits to which our work and experience contribute so much.

"As citizens and voters, we have a responsibility to help establish a fair climate of economic growth. As trade unionists, we have a responsibility to demand that the solutions to the unemployment dilemma be worked out with us, in terms that make sense."

Accusing "a lot of liberals in this liberal [Kennedy] Administration" of being ready to accept a permanent jobless rate of 4 percent, Beirne declared, "We won't accept that tragic kind of makeshift economy, where one in 25 is coldly described as an 'unemployed employable' and placed on some form of permanent dole."

An emphasis on both internal and outside organization ran through the entire convention, with an unusual amount of time taken from formal business sessions for district and other study meetings on organizing efforts.

Working seminars for the CWA's 175 staff members, set up by Education Dir. Jules Pagano, heard ranking officials of the union and University of Chicago faculty experts discuss the problems and opportunities in seeking to expand organization of white collar workers.

The report of the executive board said that membership of the union was at its highest point in history. It emphasized that "internal organizing"—the recruitment as actual members of all workers represented in bargaining units—still has as its goal an overall membership total of 90 percent by March 1963.

Representatives of new locals organized after Bell System workers in downstate and upstate New York voted for CWA representation attended the convention as delegates for the first time. Beirne announced ratification by the members of a first contract covering 14,000 workers in the plant dept. for the entire state.

Beirne Re-elected

In business session Beirne was re-elected without opposition as president. Two vice presidents—John Crull and Ray Hackney—also were re-elected without opposition, as was Sec.-Treas. W. A. Smallwood.

Vice Pres. James M. Massey defeated James A. Sanders of Shreveport, La., by 154,000 to 69,000 votes in a contested election.

Labor attaches from embassies of other countries were invited guests of the convention and were presented also to local community and business leaders at a pre-convention reception. The attaches included H. F. B. Fane of the British Embassy, Thorbjorn Carlsson of the Swedish Embassy and Hermann W. Bremer of the embassy of the West German Republic.

Also an invited guest was an Army private, Tommey E. Davidson, a serviceman based in Paris who last Christmas Day made one of the CWA-sponsored "hi-mom" telephone calls to his home. He was brought home by the Defense Dept., in response to the invitation.

RLEA Elects G. E. Leighty To 3rd Term

G. E. Leighty, president of the Railroad Telegraphers, has been reelected to a new three-year term as chairman of the Railway Labor Executive's Association.

The RLEA also reelected Michael Fox as vice chairman. Fox is president of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept. At a previous meeting, RLEA Exec. Sec.-Treas. A. E. Lyon had been reelected.

The meeting approved affiliation of the Seafarers, which has more than 1,000 members employed in railroad marine service.

A new executive committee, created by a change in by-laws, was elected. Members are: H. C. Crotty, Maintenance of Way Employes; George M. Harrison, Railway Clerks; H. E. Gilbert, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen; A. J. Bernhardt, Railway Carmen; Joseph W. Ramsey, Machinists; R. E. Davidson, Locomotive Engineers; W. P. Kennedy, Trainmen, and Louis Wagner, Conductors & Brakemen.

Merger Action Facing Boot and Shoe Workers

Cincinnati—Talk of merger filled the air at initial sessions of the 23rd convention of the Boot & Shoe Workers here.

Pres. John E. Mara told the 250 delegates that he favored the move. The convention also heard George Fecteau, president of the United Shoe Workers, declare that merger is "the only existing hope for progress and strength among shoe workers, especially in this automatic age now enveloping us."

The Boot & Shoe Workers have a membership of approximately 40,000 while the United Shoe Workers have 50,000 members. Mara estimated another 35,000 to 40,000 workers are in small independent unions.

The merger resolution, along with 50 other resolutions covering major problems of the industry—ranging from increasing foreign imports to runaway factories—was to be considered later during the convention.

Jack Hurst, retiring president of the Cincinnati Labor Council, AFL-CIO, declared that a stepped-up education and publicity program is necessary for the labor movement to get its story across to the public.

"Big business is becoming more solidified every day," Hurst warned. "We must have big business, but there are individuals in it who want to dissolve the labor movement or at least weaken its strength.

"Unfortunately, we have in the labor movement too many people who don't care about it because they are in it by accident. They don't come to their local union meetings and they are susceptible to everything they read in the magazines and newspapers and hear over the radio and TV.

"There is only way to get the word to our people and that is through labor papers and labor magazines."

William Kircher, assistant director of Reg. IX, AFL-CIO, told the delegates that the economic growth of shoe workers is tied to the economic growth of all other workers.

"We can't," he said, "build a first-class economy on second and third-class wages."

Al Barkan, deputy director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, praised the Boot & Shoe Workers for their political activity. He also commented on the Supreme Court ruling upholding the union shop for rail unions, pointing out that the railroads had fought behind the scenes to wreck union security.

Better Health Goals Set by Glove Union

Effingham, Ill.—Strengthening of health and welfare provisions in negotiations with the glove industry has been called for by delegates to the biennial convention here of the Glove Workers.

In three days of sessions, delegates from locals in some 25 communities revised the union's constitution and bylaws to conform with the Landrum-Griffin Act; debated the effects of foreign imports on job opportunities in the industry; and voted to provide annuity retirement benefits for Pres. Joseph C. Goodfellow and his successors.

Returned to office without opposition were Sec.-Treas. James Van Der Wall, Marinette, Wis.; and Vice Presidents Jessie M. Reynolds of Tacoma, Wash., Chester Dombkowski of Michigan City, Ind., and Ernest Mohr of Metropolis, Ill. Reelected in contested races were Vice Presidents Hartley Wiseman of Metropolis, Ill., and Irene Knaak, Milwaukee.

Goodfellow's term has two more years to run.

75,000 Marine Workers Strike, Tie Up U.S. Deepwater Fleet

Kennedy at the White House, and held himself available to assist federal mediators and the negotiators in any way possible.

Chief stumbling-block to an agreement was the refusal of one group of employers to discuss the foreign flag or "runaway" ship issue at all. A management spokesman said he was not authorized to talk about foreign flag ships. NMU then filed a charge with the National Labor Relations Board against employers whom it accused of refusing to bargain in good faith.

● When dock and harbor workers attended a rally called by the Longshoremen here in support of striking seamen, the New York Shipping Asssociation accused ILA of a contract violation and asked the port labor arbiter to conduct a hearing.

NMU Talks Opened May 11

NMU opened negotiations May 11 on behalf of 37,000 members on 590 passenger, freight and tanker vessels operated by 74 companies. When vessel operators made no acceptable counter-offer Curran recessed negotiations.

Chief effort of union negotiators was to improve working conditions on American-owned ships and help provide more jobs for U.S. seamen faced with the threat of competition from non-union vessels registered under foreign flags.

When the contracts expired June 15 and unions carried out their traditional "no contract, no work" policy, the base wage for able-bodied seamen on NMU ships was $369 to $373 a month based on a 40-hour week. The last previous increase was 4.5 percent in January 1960 on a wage reopener in a three-year contract.

NMU had sought to get employers to bargain on the following proposed program:

● Reduce the basic workweek from 40 to 30 hours to provide additional jobs for seamen and give crewmen more time with their families. This could be done, the union said, by adding the time worked to vacation time due.

● An increase in wages and overtime rates based on the national industrial pattern. The overtime rate in expired NMU contracts was $2.88 an hour.

● Provide that all ships owned or operated by American companies shall come under union contract.

The union also asked amendment of other contract provisions to improve living and working conditions aboard ship.

The ARA met with employers May 12 and submitted proposals for a new contract. The principal issue involved the question of standby pay for union members while waiting for assignment. Wage scales for 1,000 ARA members on U.S.-flag ships ranged from $680 to $850 a month.

Members of the other unions began contract talks June 6 and 7. SIU and MEBA got some owners to agree to new terms but most ships remained in port because members respected the picket lines of the other unions.

To meet the problem of a declining U.S. merchant fleet, unions allied with SIU and MEBA originally made these proposals as a basis for contract renewal:

● That American-owned vessels flying foreign flags be covered by contracts with all maritime unions.

● That a Joint Committee for the Maritime Industry, consisting of labor and management representatives, be established to overhaul the "outmoded merchant marine subsidy" program; to put an end to government competition with privately-owned shipping; to assure cargoes for American ships through "effective enforcement of cargo preference laws" and expansion of the cargo preference principle to cover oil imports.

● That contracts be extended for one year without major changes other than those listed above.

● That certain contract inequitis be eliminated.

NMU Strikers Find Picket Line Works

New York—To longshoremen in this port a picket line is a picket line, and not to be crossed.

That fact of life caused the Maritime Union to call off pickets at Pier 3, downtown.

The pickets were on duty only to warn workers of a labor dispute with the United Fruit Co., which uses Pier 3. They carried signs to that effect, but longshoremen refused to cross the picket line enroute to their job of unloading the Johan, a Norwegian-flag freighter using the same dock.

NMU has no dispute with the Johan's owners, and removed the pickets so the longshoremen could go to work.

Aluminum Workers Face 'Trying Times'

Massena, N. Y.—Layoffs resulting from automation and two recessions in three years have brought the Aluminum Workers to "one of the most trying times in the history of our union," AWIU Pres. Eddie R. Stahl told the delegates to the union's fifth biennial convention here.

Declaring that "some locals have been hit as much as 50 percent," Stahl said it would take "a miracle" for the industry to get back to its pre-recession employment.

Charging that production workers have been forced to bear a disproportionate burden in cutbacks, Stahl cited a plant where one department had been reduced to 15 men, of whom 11 were foremen or technical directors.

"We expect to take our share of the burden, but management should also take its share," he said.

Taking note of the hardships on older workers who are laid off, the convention denounced discrimination in hiring because of age and called on Congress to reduce the retirement age under social security to 60.

Stahl was unanimously re-elected president. Henry Olsen, AWIU director of organization and acting secretary-treasurer since the death last year of William Crowley, was chosen assistant to the president. In a three-way contest, Pat Reilly of Richmond, Va., a vice president and organizer, was elected secretary-treasurer.

The convention also endorsed an expanded union education program and urged greater support for COPE activities.

George J. Richardson, AFL-CIO special representative, told the delegates that laws which damage the trade union movement "hurt the entire nation."

He said the labor movement, six years after merger, still has "many problems." But, he declared, "the unresolved problems of jurisdiction and merging of unions can be resolved better united than divided."

Other speakers included John Schrier of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization and Al Barkan of COPE.

Flint Glass Union Set To Boost U.S. Products

New York—The Flint Glass Workers concluded a two-week biennial convention here with a firm resolve to hold their present membership strength and add to their ranks through organizing techniques "appropriate for a changing industry."

Delegates approved plans for a two-pronged drive to offset the effects of glass imports by strengthening domestic production and by launching a campaign to create public demand for glass "with the American theme."

Since at least 8,000 members of the union are employed in plants that manufacture handmade glass products, delegates devoted considerable time to analyzing problems of moldmakers in the container industry.

They called for action to unionize workers in factories where glass is needed in increasing quantities as parts for scientific equipment or apparatus. Although a large proportion of the glass container industry is organized, Flint Glass union officers agreed there is a significant potential in this area, where production seems to be on the rise.

A slight dip in the union's membership was attributed to the effects of automation and to rising imports. These come mainly from Belgium, the leading European exporter, which accounts for about 40 percent of the world's glass exports.

The Belgian flat glass industry has undergone considerable concentration during the past 50 years. In 1910 it comprised 19 companies; today there are only three which account for about 90 percent of all exports. Foreign shipments of flat glass from Belgium reached a record high in 1960 of 288,485 metric tons.

The convention spent several days making plans for the opening of negotiations on new contracts to cover moldmakers which commence Aug. 8. These will be followed by industrywide conferences for contract demands covering workers employed in aluminating and allied glass products factories. In the early fall conferences looking towards negotiations will take place for workers employed in plants that make table and art glass, and glassware manufactured by automatic machines.

Earlier in the convention, George M. Parker of Toledo, was elected president of the union by a 2-1 majority, suceeding Charles M. Scheff, who retired.

Elected first, second and third vice presidents, respectively, were Albert Vottero of Jeannette, Pa., Robert Newell of Moundsville, W. Va., and Harold Gibbons of Toledo. Three new international representatives were elected—Ben Mangiopane of Bellaire, O., Debert Junkins of Clarksburg, W. Va., and Charles Herrholtz of Chicago. Fifty-one workers were elected miscellaneous members of the union's 100-man executive board.

The convention approved changes in the union constitution to make it conform with requirements of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

Teacher Vote On Bargaining Set in N. Y. C.

New York—Ballots will be counted June 29 in a referendum election among Greater New York's 47,000 school teachers on whether they want to bargain collectively with the Board of Education. Results will be announced the following day, when schools close for the summer, by the Honest Ballot Association.

The United Federation of Teachers—Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers—has asked all teachers to vote yes, and then to support the UFT in a bargaining election next semester.

Meanwhile five members of a commission appointed by the board to advise it on labor relations have announced their resignation. They said the board picked out one of their three recommendations and ignored the others.

Board members said they would not be bound by the referendum result but would ask teachers to decide later if they want one union to represent them or more than one. The UFT charged the board members were "insisting on the right to welsh" on any agreement.

In a special issue of the United Teacher, the union asked systemwide support of a program including base salaries of $5,000 to $10,000 a year; improvements in pensions and leaves of absence; relief from non-teaching chores for elementary teachers; class size of 30 or less in normal classes, 20 in difficult classes; and other improvements.

Al Bilik Named Head Of Cincinnati Council

Cincinnati, O.—Al Bilik, business agent of the State, County & Municilpal Employes District Council here, will take office July 1 as president of the Cincinnati AFL-CIO Labor Council. He succeeds John J. Hurst of the Carpenters, who leaves office after 26 years as president.

Unions in Los Angeles To Tackle Job Injuries

Los Angeles—A labor-sponsored safety education program to help cut California's on-the-job accident rate is now being planned by the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor's Safety & Industrial Accident Committee.

Announcement of the program was made by Executive Sec.-Treas. W. J. Bassett at a federation-sponsored Safety and Workmen's Compensation Conference held here with some 175 delegates.

Conference speakers pointed out that on-the-job accidents in California last year took 811 lives and caused 158,663 injuries, for which some $200 million was paid out in workmen's compensation benefits.

Underlying the accident problem, stressed two safety experts, was the fact that California has reached a "safety plateau" or "safety gap," where the downward curve has leveled off.

Arthur W. Motley, director of the U.S. Dept. of Labor's Bureau of Labor Standards, said that "none of us can rest until these injuries and deaths are brought down to an irreducible minimum." The safety techniques that have served well in the past "no longer produce the results they once did," he declared.

California safety chief Thomas N. Saunders, contrasting the 170 full-time safety inspectors in California, said safety nevertheless depends ultimately "on the man himself."

He urged labor unions to hire "safety consultants" just as they now hire attorneys, economists, actuaries and experts in various other fields.

Other speakers included Elton C. Lawless, chairman of the State Industrial Accident Commission, and William Kaplan, a presiding referee for the commission.

Both urged added emphasis on rehabilitation, with Kaplan appealing for workmen's compensation coverage for such "subtle injuries" as heart attacks, mental illness, etc., that he termed the last major gap in social insurance.

Delegates formed into panels and talked practical problems with "resource experts" recruited from organized labor, the State Div. of Industrial Safety, and the Industrial Accident Commission.

Dir. John F. Henning of the California Dept. of Industrial Relations summarized conference activities.

AFL-CIO PRES. George Meany greets Lewis Gompers, nephew of Samuel Gompers, prior to ground-breaking ceremonies for $9 million housing project, named for first president of AFL. Apartments will rise on spot on New York's Lower East Side where Gompers and his family lived when they came to U.S. in 1863.

Housing Project Pays Tribute to Gompers

New York—Among the noxious slums of New York's Lower East Side—where a young immigrant boy lived almost a century ago and from which he emerged to become founder of the American labor movement—ground has been broken for a modern low-cost housing project named after him.

Gompers Houses they will be called in tribute to Samuel Gompers, first president of the American Federation of Labor, who came to New York with his family in 1863 at the age of 13. Behind their four-room tenement flat was a brewery; across the street was a slaughterhouse. Water came from a common hydrant in the yard and had to be carried upstairs. The toilet was in the back yard.

To Shelter More Than 2,000

On the site where young Gompers and his family lived will be constructed two 20-story buildings providing 474 apartments for 2,000 persons at a cost of more than $9 million.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who was the major speaker with Mayor Robert F. Wagner at the ground-breaking ceremonies, said that Gompers' "personal experiences in the slums inspired him to fight against the degradations to which working people were subject in those days."

The AFL-CIO president charged that despite a commitment by Congress 12 years ago to a long-term program of slum clearance and low-cost home construction, "succeeding Congresses have welshed on the commitment [and] year after year they have eliminated entirely or pared down to the bone appropriations for slum replacement."

Moral and Practical Need

"Today it is incumbent upon our government," Meany said, to launch a broad new housing program not only for moral considerations but as a practical necessity."

The necessity arises from the fact that unemployment is still "at the shockingly high level of almost 7 percent," he said, and the prospects are that the unemployment picture may be even "worse next winter than it was last winter."

"Yet there is still too much hesitancy," he told the open-air East Side audience at the ceremonies, "on the part of our government about doing something effective to reduce unemployment. Even those who recognize that unemployment feeds upon itself, that it saps the basic strength of the nation and that it can bring about economic collapse, still seem to be relying upon a spontaneous cure rather than action.

"The trade union movement believes the unemployment situation has become too massive and too chronic to cure itself. We believe the government has got to take action. And the most effective action available, we are convinced, is a broad-scale housing program."

Recalling improvements in living and working conditions in the past century, Wagner said "to a great extent that progress is due to the pioneering efforts of Gompers and his contemporaries and to those who have built upon the foundations which they laid."

"I believe that no one would appreciate more than Samuel Gompers," he said, "why we are here today. Not because this housing development will bear his name, but because it will be a living symbol of the ideals of individual and social justice for which Samuel Gompers struggled all his life."

Woman Denied Explanation:

High Court Upholds Exclusion Of Cook as Navy 'Security Risk'

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that the government may exclude a worker employed by a private concern from a military base where she worked on the ground of "security requirements" without further explanation.

In a 5-to-4 decision the court held that the security officer at the naval gun factory in Washington was within his rights in withdrawing a security badge from Rachel Brawner, cook employed by a private concessionaire at the factory. Withdrawal of the badge made it impossible for Mrs. Brawner to continue her job at the factory.

Justice Potter Stewart held for the majority that the government has the right to control access to a military base and that due process did not require that Mrs. Brawner be given any sort of hearing.

Justice William J. Brennan for himself, Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices Hugo Black and William O. Douglas expressed "grave doubts" that the government had authority to withhold Mrs. Brawner's badge without a hearing.

Use as 'Blind' Seen

Further, he said, under the majority's decision a government official may employ "security requirements" as a "blind behind which to dismiss at will for the most discriminatory of causes."

The high court's decision upheld earlier verdicts for the government in lower courts. The suit contending that Mrs. Brawner had been denied her constitutional rights was filed by Local 473, Cafeteria & Restaurant Workers Union. A brief supporting the local was filed with the court by the AFL-CIO.

In other decisions the court:

- Refused to review a lower court decision upholding a Federal Aviation Agency order barring pilots over 60 years old on commercial airliners.
- Held in a 5-to-4 decision that the Constitution forbids the use of illegally-seized evidence in state criminal trials.
- Rejected 4 to 3 a motion by the DuPont Co., to modify a recent decision that the company divest itself of General Motors stock so that the divestiture would take more than 10 years.

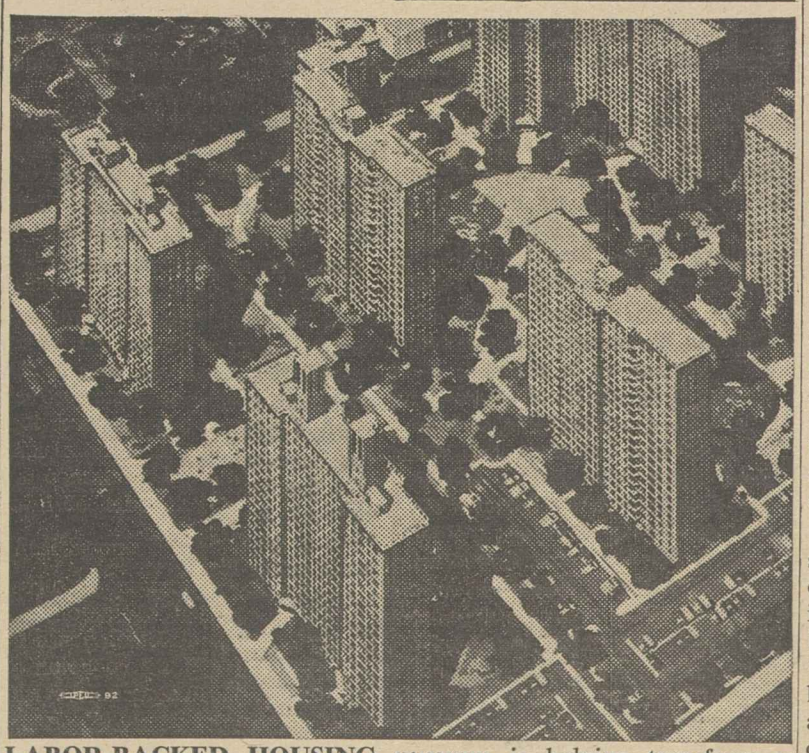
Street Railway Veteran Dies at 83

Springfield, Mass.—P. J. O'Brien, 83, a retired international vice president of the Street Railway Employes, died here recently.

O'Brien retired in 1957 after 44 years as a vice president of the union. From 1935 until his retirement he also served as a member of the union's general executive board.

As a motorman on the Springfield Street Railway Co., he helped organize Div. 448 here in 1907, becoming its first president.

Surviving are three sons, Charles, a bus driver and member of the union; Rt. Rev. Msgr. John O'Brien, superintendent of parochial schools in the diocese of Worcester, Mass., and Raymond.



LABOR-BACKED HOUSING program is helping transform a section of New York's lower East Side, where Samuel Gompers lived as a youth, into a modern, low-cost apartment project bearing his name. Ground was broken for the Samuel Gompers Houses, the two buildings in the foreground, at ceremonies addressed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. The other four buildings shown will comprise Columbia Houses, a non-profit cooperative now in the planning stage.

Court Restricts Use Of Dissenter's Dues

be given a dues rebate "in the same proportion that the expenditures for political purposes which he had advised the union he disapproved bore to the total union budget."

- Instead of a rebate, the union's expenditure for the protested activities could be proportionately reduced.

The court specified that a member would have to give the union formal notification of his objection to expenditures for political activity which he opposed in order to be entitled to a refund or reduction.

The decision was based on the Supreme Court's interpretation of congressional intent in a 1951 amendment to the Railway Labor Act authorizing union shop agreements on the railroads and repealing a previous prohibition against such agreements.

A 1956 Supreme Court decision—known as the Hanson case—upheld the constitutionality of railroad union shop agreements, even in states with so-called "right-to-work" laws. However, the court at the time said "a different problem would be presented" if union "assessments" were levied "for purposes not germane to collective bargaining."

Georgia courts subsequently held that political spending—including lobbying expenditures—by unions which collect dues under union shop agreements was unconstitutional.

Appealing from the decision, attorneys for 15 non-operating railroad unions and the AFL-CIO argued that legislative and political activity is as much a part of union representation of members as the actual mechanics of collective bargaining.

AFL-CIO Filed Brief

"Collective bargaining cannot function effectively or realistically without legislative or political activity," the AFL-CIO declared in a brief.

In all, seven of the justices reached the conclusion that a worker covered by a railroad union shop contract could not be requqired to help finance union political programs with which he disagreed. The justices differed sharply, however, on whether any constitutional issue was involved and on the remedy to be recommended.

Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., speaking for the majority of the court, held that no constitutional issue had to be met because the 1951 law was enacted "for the limited purpose of eliminating the problems created by the 'free rider'" and did not contemplate the use of dues for political purposes against the wish of a member.

Justice Felix Frankfurter, in a sharp dissent in which he was joined by Justice John M. Harlan, rejected "the restrictive interpretation" that Congress "meant to bar railway unions under a union shop agreement from expending their funds in their traditional manner."

If Congress so intended, Frankfurter commented, it certainly would have said so.

Tracing labor's struggles over the years, he said it would be "sheer mutilation" to try to write the history of the labor movement without references to its legislative and political battles.

Frankfurter said the union's activities were clearly constitutional and opposed any provision for excusing individuals from supporting an integral part of their union's function.

Justice Hugo L. Black, on the other hand, agreed with the Georgia courts that the constitutional rights of the dissenting workers had been violated and described the formula suggested by the Supreme Court majority as "parsimonious" and in practice meaningless. He said individuals who dissented from their union's political actions should be exempted from union shop requirements of membership.

Separate, qualified opinions were also filed by Justices William O. Douglas and Charles E. Whittaker.

The well-financed legal challenge to the union shop was brought in the names of six Southern Railway employes in a suit against the 15 rail unions. It has often been referred to as the "Looper case" after the name of one of the participants.

Actual implementation of the decision—and detailed interpretation of the intent of the Supreme Court—is in the hands of the Georgia court. However, if either party is dissatisfied with the state court's implementation, the issue could wind its way back to the Supreme Court.

In another case, which bore some parallels to the union shop issue, the Supreme Court held that an attorney could properly be compelled to join his state bar association even if he disagreed with its position on some issues. Twenty-six states presently require lawyers to be members of state bars.

A Wisconsin attorney protested that the requirement that he join the state bar and pay the $15 a year dues forced him to help finance legislative programs which he opposed.

His appeal was rejected by a 7-2 majority which, however, divided on the reasons for rejection.

Four justices held that no clear-cut issue of political spending had been raised and, apart from that issue, there was no constitutional objection to compelling lawyers to join the bar. They said the political spending would have to be raised in a more specific manner for the court to rule on it.

Justices Harlan, Frankfurter and Whittaker considered the constitutional issue of political spending by a bar association and held that it did not violate any constitutional rights.

Unions Call Workweek Cut Imperative

Slash Emphasized By Butchers, UPWA

Chicago—A shorter workweek, without loss of take-home pay, is an "economic imperative" if the nation is to achieve full employment, the Meat Cutters and the Packinghouse Workers have declared.

The two unions said such a move would "restore purchasing power and jobs to millions of unemployed" and would "offset the continuing attrition by automation of the national total of available jobs."

The views were contained in a separate statement filed in connection with a report by the tripartite automation committee established two years ago in contract agreements with Armour & Co., second largest of the nation's meat packing concerns.

Minimize Job Loss, Meat Unions Plead

Chicago—To meet the challenge of automation, America must take steps so that technological change can be "regulated, directed and harnessed" to minimize job displacement and personal hardship, two AFL-CIO unions have declared.

The Meat Cutters and the Packinghouse Workers, in their separate statement accompanying the report of the Armour Automation Committee, were critical of the growing attitude of concentrating "solely on the worker already ousted, accepting as a necessary evil the process which produces his ouster."

The unions said this is similar to "setting up a hospital and car repair shop at the site of a washed-out bridge to repair the broken bones and damaged vehicles in the steady flow of traffic going over the edge—without considering the possibility of regulating or rerouting the traffic and rebuilding the bridge."

The seperate views were presented, the union said, to highlight "certain basic areas of disagreement" that existed between union, company and public members on the "massive kinds of programs" the nation needs to counter the effects of technological change.

The UPWA and the Butcher Workmen said it was "unfortunate" that the committee's report did not reflect a strong "sense of urgency" about the problems resulting from automation, and declared that some of its suggestions "may well be too little and too late" unless they are supplemented "by an understanding of the depth of the problem."

The union representatives made it plain that while they disagreed with the full panel on some specifics, they were in accord with its purpose and work and felt that it "provides new channels" for labor-management relations, including studies in areas "not normally engaged in during the life of a bargaining contract."

Although they laid particular stress on the question of the shorter workweek, the union representatives also called for:

- A "massive increase" in the public investment for schools, homes, medical care, education, urban renewal "and a wide range of other national needs."
- Creation and expansion of private consumer purchasing power through earlier retirement with increased social security benefits; increases in the amount and duration of unemployment compensation; tax revision to reduce the burden on low-income families; and "immediate effective increases" in the minimum wage above the recently enacted $1.25 level coupled with coverage for millions of workers still excluded.
- "Arrangements to gear this nation's productive capacity more realistically to the grave needs of peoples in the other nations through foreign trade."

They also urged that within the framework of recently enacted depressed area legislation, government policy should be devised to deny tax writeoffs "on plants closed through calculated management decision in areas where such closing will add to already heavy burdens of unemployment."

Other Recommendations

They recommend effective federal, state and local action "to combat discrimination in employment;" an end to hiring practices "curtailing job opportunities for particular groups of workers;" and establishment of federal standards for unemployment compensation laws.

The UPWA and the Butcher Workmen said the opposition to the shorter workweek is based on the argument that increased output "is much preferable to increased leisure" for workers.

"Unfortunately," they declared, "the nation currently faces no such happy choice . . . The immediate goal to be achieved through a shortening of the workweek is not more leisure but substantially less enforced and unpaid leisure for those who now seek work."

Without action on spreading the work plus other measures to expand employment, they declared, "proposals dealing merely with the problems of the workers displaced in the course of technological change cannot achieve any purpose but that of redistributing unemployment."

"No added educational opportunity will serve to create anything but higher educational levels in an increasing army of the unemployed, unless new jobs come by the millions," they said.

Economic Growth Found Basic To Jobs in Study of Automation

home pay—a point both unions have indicated will be a major bargaining goal with the industry this fall. Reduction in the workweek, they declared, is "not merely desirable but an economic imperative."

The company officials flatly opposed the shorter week, arguing that meat packing is a "low-profit industry" and declaring that such a move "would require accelerated efforts to automate just to stay in business."

Production Cut Foreseen

The public members—Pres. Clark Kerr of the University of California and Prof. Robben W. Fleming of the University of Illinois—also opposed the shorter week on the ground that it would reduce productive capacity. They conceded, however, that unless full employment can be achieved via the economic growth route "the demand for the reduced workweek will become increasingly insistent."

Despite inability to agree on this issue, the committee members reached concurrence on a broad range of other points, including the need for adequate economic growth. They called for:

- A study of the nation's educational system to gear programs to future employment opportunities.
- Strengthening of "loosely coordinated" state employment services.
- Passage of pending federal legislation making available retraining and relocation allowances for displaced workers.
- Revision of unemployment compensation laws to allow a worker to continue training for a new job, and re-examination of the duration of jobless benefits.
- Possible integration of public and private pension systems so that workers will not be penalized, in their middle years, because technology forces them to change jobs.
- "Sympathetic" consideration of optional early retirement coupled with raising of the ceiling on the earnings of retired persons.

The committee also made specific bargaining recommendations to both labor and management that were not released for publication. They forecast that these would make possible contract agreements giving employes "a larger measure of job security."

It warned, however, that "the future will not be secure . . . until the nation sets its course in the direction of an annual economic growth which will provide full employment."

In its findings, the tripartite body pointed to studies it had made during the past two years which indicate automation hits hardest at unskilled and semi-skilled workers and members of minority groups.

The two-year study was agreed to in the 1959 bargaining talks because of what both sides agreed were "significant changes" in industry operations.

Start Inauspicious

The committee began its studies against the bleak backdrop of worsening unemployment at Armour, the nation's second largest meat packer. In the early summer of 1959, a scant few months before bargaining began, the company had announced the permanent closing of six production plants, including large establishments in Chicago and East St. Louis, Ill., permanently displacing 5,000 employes.

A year later, in July 1960, Armour closed its Oklahoma City plant, adding 420 more employes to the total terminated.

In these close-downs, the committee noted, Armour was "not unique in the packing industry," for each of the other three members of the industry's one-time "Big Four" had closed numbers of major packinghouses in recent years, idling some 30,000 workers.

Representing the Meat Cutters on the special automation committee were Vice Pres. Russell E. Dresser, director of the union's Packinghouse Div., and Research Dir. James H. Wishart. Representing the UPWA were Dir. Howard McDermott of the Wage Rate Dept. and Contract Administrator Jesse Prosten.

Serving for the company were Vice Pres. Harold E. Brooks, Vice Pres. Walter E. Clark in charge of labor relations, Counsel Frederick R. Livingston, and Gen. Manager William J. Ohl of the Food Engineering Div.

Prior Plant Closing Notice Suggested

Amherst, Mass.—Sen. Benjamin A. Smith (D-Mass.) has suggested that companies be required to give at least 90 days notice to employes and the public before closing a plant.

Addressing the annual institute of the State AFL-CIO, held at the University of Massachusetts here, Smith said he was having a study made to determine if this could best be accomplished through legislation or through a presidential directive, pointing out that companies planning mergers are required to give the government notice of their intention, he declared:

"If companies deciding to merge must give notice so that the impact of the merger can be tested, certainly a company that is going to close a plant should give notice so that the impact can be softened."

Pact Safeguards Jobs From Automation Effect

New York—The Communications Workers have won a solid guarantee against loss of jobs or wages through automation or mergers for 1,500 employes of the American Cable & Radio Corp.

The nationwide contract provides that no employe in the bargaining unit may be laid off or terminated because of the introduction of new or improved equipment.

It also guarantees the jobs and pay scales of workers in the event of any merger or consolidation with other firms. That provision is considered especially significant since there have been reports within the industry of a possible merger between American Cable and other compaines in the field.

The two-year agreement provides a $4 weekly increase retroactive to June 1, plus an additional $2 on Jan. 1, 1962, for employes who are at the top of their wage rate ranges. A wage reopener is authorized on June 1, 1962.

CWA Long Lines National Dir. Elaine T. Gleason praised the "foresight and socially desirable attitude" of management representatives in "squarely facing the impact of automation on human beings."

"Only by agreements such as this one can employes fully share in the benefits which automation or greater consolidation can bring," she said.

Under the new contract, the company agreed to assign any worker displaced by automation to a comparable job at the same rate of pay.

In case of a merger, an employe whose job is affected may voluntarily accept any special severance benefit which might be included as part of the merger agreement but would not be forced to do so. If he chose to remain on the job, a place would have to be found for him without any reduction in pay.

The contract overs radio and cable operators, printer multiplex operators and other traffic and marine service employes in the continental United States and Hawaii.

Goals and Critics

THE IMPORTANCE of the report of the Commission on Money and Credit to the nation's future economic policy can perhaps best be judged by the criticism leveled at it.

The Wall Street Journal in a despairing editorial says the report as a whole "reflects the philosophy of expanding statism," and it mourns that "so many minds are still mired in the statist errors of the past." The report, it adds, has a "big-government inflationary bias."

This ought logically to set off an intensive investigation of the "radicals" who agreed that adequate economic growth, low levels of unemployment and reasonable price stability are co-equal goals of the economy and that current statutes should be amended so that all federal agencies dealing with economic programs will be bound by these goals.

Among the wide-eyed businessmen who are "mired in statist errors" are Commission Chairman Frazar B. Wilde, chairman of the Connecticut General Life Insurance Co.; James B. Black, chairman of the board, Pacific Gas & Electric Co.; Fred Lazarus, Jr., chairman of the board, Federated Department Stores, Inc.; David Rockefeller, president, the Chase Manhattan Bank; and Theodore O. Yntema, chairman, finance committee, Ford Motor Co.

The labor and liberal members of the commission agreed with the business members in approving many of the major proposals of the report. But they filed vigorous dissents to various sections, especially to proposals that would underwrite higher interest rates in the economy.

In the present period of economic stress with its multiple problems of technological change, economic growth and balance of payments and many others, the federal government's responsibility to keep the nation in top economic health is no longer a matter for philosophical barbs. It is urgently necessary that the government—and specifically the President—have greater powers to counter the swings of the business cycle.

These are the realities of the 1960s based on an understanding of the necessity for an economically strong America in this decade of decisive challenge.

Help for the Cities

THE UNITED STATES is becoming an increasingly urban nation. In 1950 about two-thirds of all Americans lived in urban areas. By 1975 it is estimated that nearly three-quarters will live in urban communities.

The growth of urban areas has brought new and complex problems outstripping the ability of cities to meet them.

The federal government has stepped in with a series of programs to help the urban areas cope with the population explosion. But the technical know-how and the financial aid are scattered widely through the government. There is no one central place that the cities can come to for advice and assistance.

This is reflected in the nature of legislation before the current Congress. Proposals on education, housing, pollution, health are all designed to alleviate problems plaguing urban areas. Yet there is no one central federal agency with the status and scope to coordinate the handling of these problems and give them the necessary direction.

All of this adds up to proven need for the creation of a Dept. of Urban Affairs and Housing so that citizens in the urban areas, dealing with specifically urban problems, will be represented by an officer at the Cabinet level who will be in a position to coordinate efficiently federal activities in their interest.

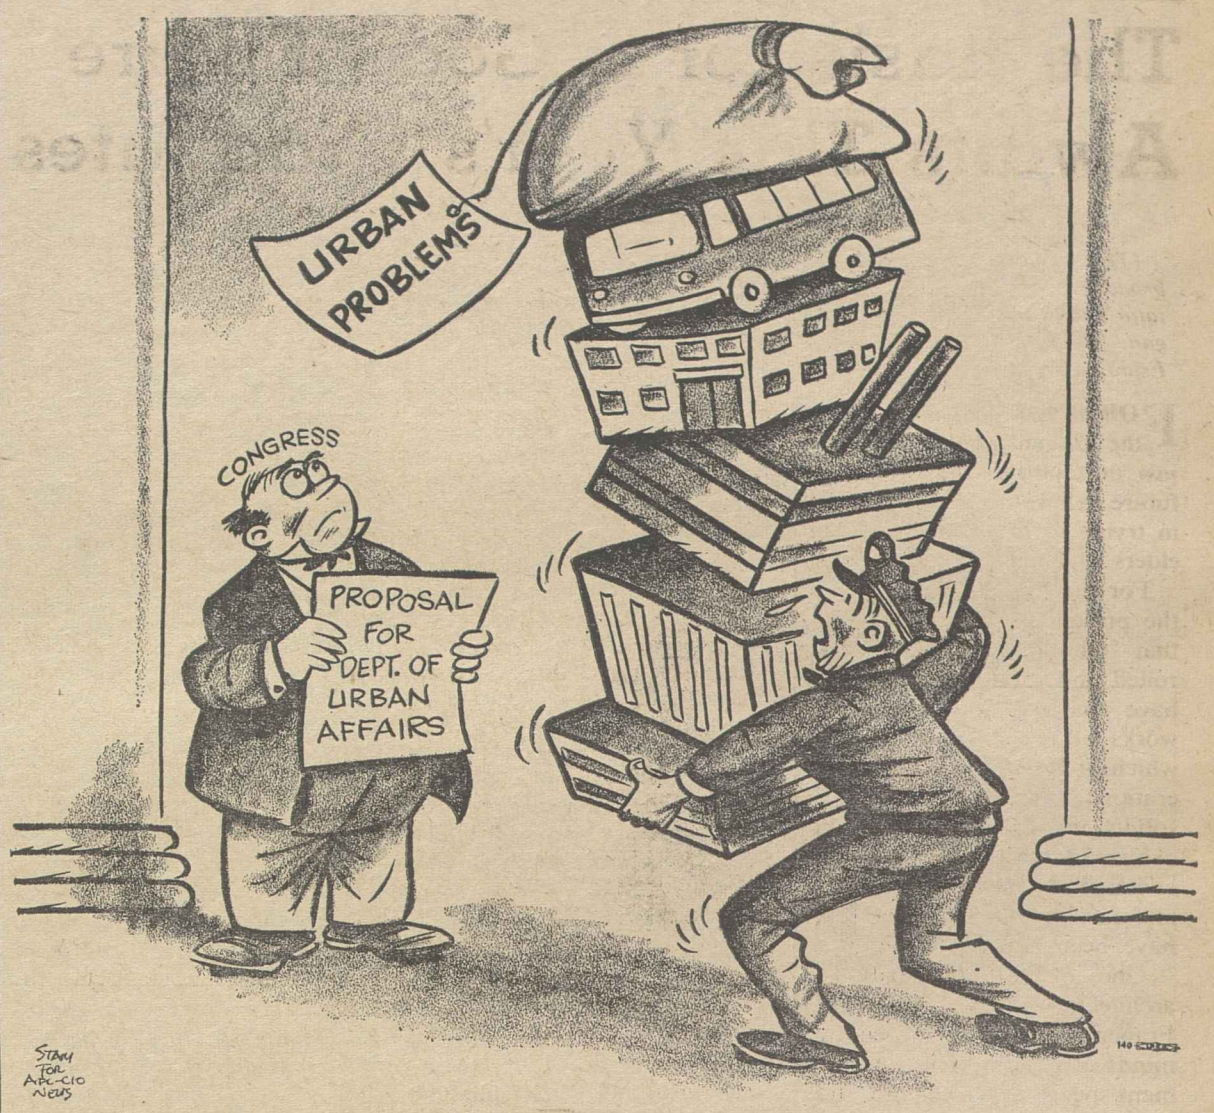
'Where Do I Put Them?'



Rural Voters in Control:

City Folks Must Howl Louder To Win Equal Representation

ELECTION STATISTICS show such startling facts as that it takes 3,558 votes in the largest election district in New Hampshire to obtain the same representation in the state legislature as just one vote in the smallest community; that it takes 423 votes in the largest community in Connecticut to have the same voting power as one in the smallest township; that similar disparities exist in most other states.

Yet somehow or other this mathematical proof of the political injustice that we have allowed to grow up in our American democracy never seems to register hard enough to result in any striking reform.

We know that over the years the unequal growth of population in city and rural areas of virtually every state in the union has resulted in gross distortions in representation in both national and state legislatures.

We know that every 10 years, after each census, these distortions are supposed to be corrected by the states so that all our people will be fairly and equally represented.

Yet we know, too, that decade after decade our "reapportionment" efforts are more than likely doomed to dismal failure.

One reason, of course, is that the beneficiaries of the unjust representation are not likely to vote themselves out of the very power that this unjust representation gives them.

But another reason is that those who are not adequately represented—city people, mostly—simply haven't put up enough of a howl to get things corrected because they don't realize the full impact of this misrepresentation.

Perhaps we need to start thinking about this misrepresentation not in terms of abstract mathematical formulae showing how many city-folk it takes to equal a rural resident of our state, but in the harsh picture of the kind of legislation we actually get as a result of it.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT in Michigan, for example, can give you some striking examples of how "misrepresentation" can hurt the majority and benefit the minority on the state level.

The Michigan legislature recently tried to give a juicy $162 million tax forgiveness to corporations while depriving thousands of unemployed workers of their meager jobless benefits.

It passed a bill that gave tax forgiveness to corporations whose unemployment tax payments failed to meet the jobless benefits drawn by their employes—an idea ardently supported by some of the biggest corporations in the state.

In the same bill, the legislature voted to deny jobless benefits to any union member laid off in Michigan as the result of a strike in some other area, thus penalizing innocent workers. The same legislature also refused to bring Michigan in line with the federal program giving the children of unemployed workers some $21 million in benefits. The votes were clearly beneficial to the state's businessmen and injurious to the state's workers.

This business-inspired bill also extended unemployment insurance benefits but was so viciously anti-labor in the conditions it laid down that Gov. John Swainson (D) vetoed it.

Michigan is a strong industrial state with a large union movement. Yet the fact is that this legislation, strongly opposed by labor, was enacted through the political power of conservative Republicans over their more liberal Democratic colleagues.

UNDER TODAY'S "representation" system in Michigan less than 30 percent of the voters can elect a Senate majority. On the basis of the 1958 election, the 12 Democrats elected to the Senate represented 3,193,417 votes, the 22 Republicans, who ran the roost, represented 3,178,349. The 55 Democrats elected to the House of Representatives were given 3,435,659 votes while the 55 Republicans who were returned represented only 2,936,107 votes.

In both Houses conservative Republicans represented voting minorities while holding as many or even more seats than the majority Democrats. They used their power to defeat the state's majority will.

Far from disappearing, this disparity in power is likely to increase. Rural areas that have been losing population without losing their representative strength in the legislature are expected to continue that population loss as farmers continue to leave agriculture. The heavily populated urban areas, including the poorly represented suburbs, are expected to continue gaining in population.

A statistical analysis of the Michigan voting situation shows that while the individual rural voter had a vote varying in strength from one to 15 in 1960, he will have a one to 26 ratio by 1970, depending on where he lives.

It is quite obvious that our system of representation is not working as it is supposed to work. Some Americans have built-in political advantages over other Americans which they use to their own benefit. A thorough overhauling of today's inequities is clearly in order. (Press Associates, Inc.)

Morgan Says:

The Basis for a Good Future Awaits This Year's Graduates

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

FOR ONCE THERE IS something more to tell the current crop of graduating seniors than just the apologetic cliche to the effect that "the future belongs to you and we wish you good luck in trying to clean up the desperate muddle your elders have made of the past."

Morgan

For the hopeful fact of the present is that out of that muddle, deep and roiled and turgid as it is, have emerged the frameworks of new institutions which, if these young generations build on them solidly, may house the precious furniture of our civilization more safety and durably than they ever have been housed before.

One of the principal architects of these new international institutions, France's Jean Monnet, surely one of the great minds of our time, has revealed, in a commencement speech at Dartmouth, the importance of this construction. It is, in a very real sense, more important than missiles because it provides the pattern not only for competing with the Communists but the basis—the only basis, really—on which to beat them.

The basis, of course, is the cooperation and collaboration of free men through the organisms and agencies of representative government. The concept is as old as the Greeks but Monnet adds authenticity to it by speaking as one of the men who have made it work more broadly than ever before. As a principal inventor of the European Coal & Steel Community, which combined two of the basic resources over which those historic antagonists France and Germany had been warring, Monnet has helped mold a larger unity toward which Europe, slowly, quarrelsomely but inevitably, is moving.

After the Coal & Steel Community have come Euratom, the Common Market and there will come full economic union and a common currency; already these changes have created the demand for a political union of western Europe. At Dartmouth Monnet spoke of the "enormous transforming power of common institutions."

"Human nature does not change," he said, "but when people accept the same rules and the same institutions to make sure that they are applied, their behavior towards each other changes. This is the process of civilization itself."

The key word here is the verb "accept" and the key condition is a question of how much time is there left. The Communists have institutions too which they are trying to force people into on the double. Khrushchev's objective of a Communist world can be made impossible, Monnet emphasizes, by a working partnership of Europe and America.

DESPITE THE IMPEDIMENTS of different languages and customs and other prejudices of history, Monnet sees a united European common market, which Britain and other countries must soon join, whose population and resources combined are comparable if not superior to those of either the U.S. or the Soviet Union. Linked, the European and American strengths would become decisive.

"As soon as it is clear that the West is determined to unite," he argues, "the world will react to the trend," Khrushchev will accept the fact that he cannot dominate the world, "the conditions will at last exist for turning so-called peaceful coexistence into genuine peace . . . (and then) real disarmament will become possible."

But there is no time to fool around. The danger in delay, Monnet says, "increases every day."

In all the western countries there are wise men —perhaps few so wise as Monnet—who are convinced, as he is, of the validity and necessity of these institutions and who are working, as he is, to make them durable.

As exciting and vital a venture as this is, the populations involved have not yet caught its urgency. Perhaps we might if we understood more clearly the importance Khrushchev attaches to the western alliance and the energies he is devoting to cracking it.

At SHAPE, the NATO military command near Paris, I asked a general what he thought impressed the Soviet leader most outside military strength. "The existence," the general replied instantly, "of the NATO alliance. The very fact of its being. The spectacle of 15 free highly civilized nations collaborating voluntarily in peacetime in common defense is the real bone in his throat."

Put that collaboration on a political and economic offensive, as Jean Monnet says we must, and we can make the Communists choke on the bone.

Washington Reports:

Long-Range Foreign Aid Plans Backed by Church and Aiken

LONG-TERM PLANNING and financing of foreign aid is more businesslike and would save money, Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.) asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public educational program heard on 460 radio stations.

Sen. George Aiken (R-Vt.), also a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, agreed that a long-term approach is needed but said he thought Congress would authorize "three years for foreign aid programs and then take another look" instead of giving the Administration the five-year program it has asked.

"It seems to me that where economic development is concerned, we waste a great deal by appropriating money every year for the program and then insisting that this money be spent by a given deadline," Church commented. "The result is that the money is frequently used for unfeasible and improper projects. If we operated on a more businesslike basis, we would save money and would be able to see to it that the money is applied to the more worthy projects."

Aiken recommended "more able and well-trained technicians and administrators," a point stressed by Pres. Kennedy in his talk on foreign aid to the National Conference on Intl. Economic & Social Development.

"We are going to borrow personnel from some of our most successful companies," Kennedy said at the time.

MILITARY AID should be given only to countries bordering on the Soviet Union and Red China, Church and Aiken declared.

Aiken was of the opinion that in providing mostly military aid to one of the border nations, Laos, "we guessed wrong."

"If we had put a small part of the $350 million we gave them on economic and technical assistance, we probably would have had better results there," he maintained.

Church said the United States should not be alarmed by "neutralism" in newly created nations.

"We have to understand that newly emerging countries are apt to adopt a neutralist foreign policy just as we did for 125 years following our independence," he declared. "Also, if they exercise an independent judgment at the United Nations and elsewhere, we will more often than not win their support."

Aiken expected the President's foreign-aid requests to be "cut somewhat."

"Congress will go over this request more carefully than any in recent years," he said. "They want to see that it is spent efficiently and honestly."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A PRIME READING item for sober-minded members of Congress, including members of the House and Senate tax-writing committees, is the front-page editorial in Barron's magazine for June 19, which carries a warning against the spreading system of municipal bond issues floated to finance new industrial plants or "runaway" employers.

This phraseology is not the language the financial weekly uses. The editorial does not speak about the moral and job issues involved in "runaway" operations but about the financial dangers in which communities and companies involve themselves when a bond is floated to tempt a business firm to come into the local scene.

As Barron's points out, no less respectable an organization than the Investment Bankers Association of America has "loosed a sharp blast" at what is termed the "growing popularity of municipal industrial bonds."

These are bond issues floated by municipalities to finance factories for privately-owned corporations. The taxpayers vote the money, under the "lure" of gaining industrial stature and job opportunities, and the companies "acquire factories on the cheap."

A company takes the factory on lease or rental, taxpayers pay off the bond issue across 20 or 30 years, and the people who buy the bonds enjoy the rich privilege of avoiding any federal income tax on their interest earnings. Municipal bonds are tax exempt so far as the federal government is concerned.

The pattern in the past has been for a northern firm to "run away" to a rural area, to run away to the South, leaving behind obsolete facilities that have been milked for dividends and a long-established group of employes with years of experience and seniority.

When Congress passed the depressed areas bill this year, the law spelled out a barrier to "runaways." No federal money is to be spent for factories for companies that are seeking to flee from job responsibilities elsewhere.

Congress can decrease the "lure" of community factory-building bonds by simply cancelling out federal tax exemption for municipals. Major investors would take another look before they bought. We might get rid of a tax-law incentive to industrial piracy.

BOTH BARRON'S and the investment bankers look with alarm on this system, from a strictly orthodox financial viewpoint. There are "risks," Barron's observes.

Most of the bond issue "lures" have been offered until recently by southern communities. Mississippi was the first state to authorize such projects, and Arkansas is up to its neck in them at present.

A company "dazzled at the prospect of getting something for nothing"—a "free" new factory—may overlook such details as labor and power costs, availability and materials and markets, Barron's says.

A company "may find itself heavily beholden to the city fathers," and, as in todays' racial strife in the South, "unhappily involved in their headaches."

The risks for the community, says Barron's, lie partly in the fact that the "lure of tax-free credit is strongest for marginal firms, which may prove a liability rather than an asset." In addition, the financial weekly comments, "municipal speculation poses a threat to the whole enterprise system," giving subsidized plants an advantage over unsubsidized competitors. The IBA bluntly commented that "it's poor policy to use public credit for private industrial facilities."

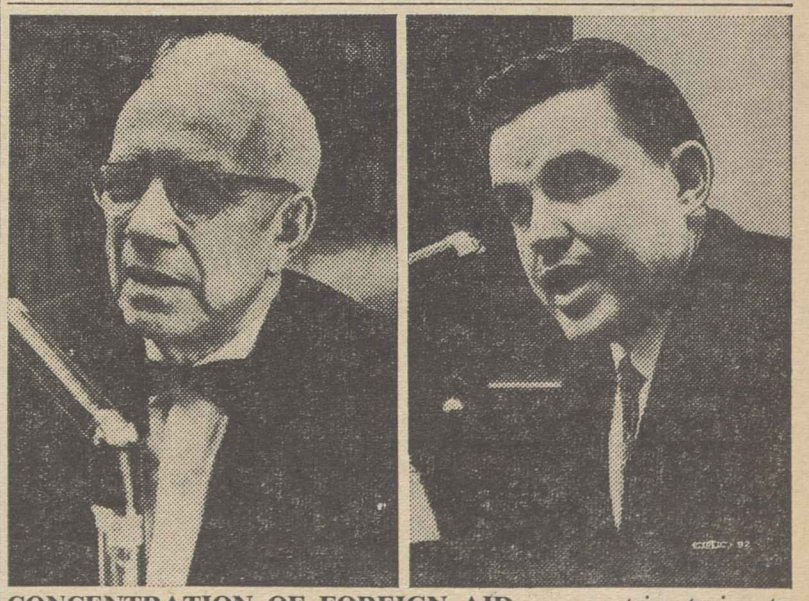
THE EDITORS of Barron's are not so naive as to think that the only corporations "lured" by the prospect of "factories on the cheap" are a few marginal firms. The magazine's editorial cites a list of municipal bond-issue facilities gladly accepted by "blue-chip concerns."

The voters of New York will be allowed a referendum next November on whether to authorize a state job development authority with $100 million in funds for "free" factories for anxious enterprizes.



CONCENTRATION OF FOREIGN AID on countries trying to help themselves was recommended by Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.), on right, as he was interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Sen. George D. Aiken (R-Vt.), left, favored more foreign aid concentration on economic assistance.

How To Buy:

Consumer Expert in Warning: The Cost of Living Is Going Up

By Sidney Margolius

AS THIS DEPARTMENT has been advising you, we're in a period of stable living costs with some exceptional recession-born buys available in appliances and clothing especially.

Now it's our duty to inform you that living costs are about to rise again. Already on the wholesale level, prices of some of the important raw materials like metals, and also of food are beginning to harden.

This means that July is a time to look for opportunities in things you are planning to buy if you have some cash to buy without taking on heavy finance charges.

Timing your shopping to anticipate your needs when prices are most favorable is one of the most important techniques of buying the most for your hard-earned dollars.

Another method of adjusting to the coming rise in prices is to switch your food buying from items about to take off to lower-cost equivalents. Meat, and especially beef and lamb, have been relatively reasonable. But we're moving into a summer of high meat prices.

July is an especially good month for finding price reductions. One of the most important July sales is the semi-annual shoe sales offering reductions of 10-20 per cent. Summer dresses and sportswear are cleared this month at sharp reductions. Men's shirts and other haberdashery are sale-priced, giving you an opportunity to fill in wardrobe needs. July hosiery sales give you a chance to save on the stockings you'll need this fall.

In household equipment, refrigerators and washing machines are sale-priced, even though they have been selling at reduced prices all year. In television sets, competition has been fierce, with some 19-inch models offered for as little as $110-$120.

Families in the market for cars should note that used-car prices take a drop after July 4.

Another money-saving opportunity is the discount offered by fuel dealers if you fill bins and tanks before the autumn rush.

Here are tips on other July buying opportunities:

AIR CONDITIONERS: Inventories are heavier than normal with distributors cutting prices. In comparing values, the BTU rating is the only fairly reliable guide to cooling capacity. The "horsepower" or "ton" rating is less reliable. A 1-h. p. air conditioner may provide anywhere from 9,000 to 12,000 BTU's, which is a large range. Air conditioners are advertised for as little as $179. These generally are smaller units of sometimes only 6,000 BTU capacity, and satisfactory only for a smaller room. The most popular and generally adequate room air conditioner is the 7.5-ampere, 115-volt with 9,000 BTU capacity. The retail price of this size is in the $260-$280 range, with some dealers offering it as low as $240-$250. This low-amperage model generally can be used in any outlet. The higher-BTU models required to cool large areas in especially-hot locations are generally higher-amperage, such as 12 amps, and will need 220-volt wiring.

MEN'S SUMMER SUITS: Look for sales after July 4. The three general types of men's summer suits and slacks are:

Lowest-price: Blends of polyester fiber (dacron or kodel) with rayon, or polyester, rayon and acrylic fiber (orlon or creslan) generally retail for $35-45. They are suitable for occasional wear. The higher the percentage of dacron or kodel in the blend, the more crease-resistant and harder-wearing is the fabric. For example, a good-quality blend is 65 percent dacron, 35 percent rayon.

Medium-price: Blends of polyester with wool worsted, such as a blend of approximately 50 percent dacron and 50 percent worsted, retail for $40-60. These generally give longer wear and keep their shape better than the polyester and rayon blends.

High-price: The finest summer suits are generally found in the all-wool worsted group. They often cost $60 up. Better-quality wool worsted trousers now often are available with a permanent crease. The chemicals used for this process are like those used in women's permanent-wave solutions.

The fiber content, of course, is only one clue to the satisfaction you'll get from a suit. The construction of the suit is at least as important. Among the less-obvious places to judge quality are the pockets, which should be of closely-woven material; the lapel, which should roll slightly and not lie flat; the quality of stitching around the pockets, armholes and other seams (there should be no signs of puckering); the trouser crotch (which should not be pieced). Note also how carefully the pattern or weave of the material is matched at the seams.

"LABOR'S STORY" between 1955 and 1960 as told by labor editors themselves is now available in book form. The volume includes work from some 85 labor publications and is edited by Gordon H. Cole, editor of the Machinist; Leon Stein, editor of the Ladies' Garment Workers' Justice; and Norman L. Sobol, editor of Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Local 1-S News.

From 85 Publications:

Labor's Story Is Told In Book by Editors

FOR THE FIRST TIME in the history of labor journalism, the country's leading trade union editors have joined to tell the facts, goals, problems and accomplishments of American labor.

Their collective effort has resulted in a new book titled Labor's Story. Its editors are Gordon H. Cole, editor of the Machinist, publication of the Machinists; Leon Stein, editor of the Ladies' Garment Workers' Justice, and Norman L. Sobol, editor of Local 1-S News, organ of the local of the Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Workers.

Some 85 labor publications are represented in the 348-page book. It includes some 305 articles, news stories, editorials and features, plus 26 labor cartoons, published between 1955 and 1960.

Included are chapters on collective bargaining, "justice on the job," organizing, apprenticeship, technology, safety and unemployment. Labor's activities outside the plant gate are reported in chapters on community and consumer service, health, retirement, education and housing.

In the area of public affairs, chapters on legislation and civil liberties are supplemented by a lengthy section on current controversies. These range from the significance of strikes and the causes of inflation to "right-to-work" and repressive legislation. Final chapters provide a detailed survey of labor in world affairs, and a view of labor's goals in the years ahead.

The volume also includes special sections on runaway plants, the changing South and a chapter-long case study of the historic 1959 steel strike.

From the diverse accounts by trade union editors, a picture of the dynamics of American unionism emerges.

Labor's Story was prepared with several different kinds of people in mind, according to the book's editors.

"First, for the active unionist, officer and shop steward," they explained. "Secondly, for the high school and college student who is about to enter the workforce and should understand what unionism is. Thirdly, for the general reader who knows little about labor except as he reads about it in the daily newspaper.

"We felt that a selection from the contemporary labor press would better tell the real labor story than any other editorial approach."

The Intl. Labor Press Association, AFL-CIO, seconded this view. In a letter to the publishers, Richard C. Howard and Bernard Mullady, ILPA president and secretary-treasurer respectively, said:

"Labor's Story should be read by every American trade unionist concerned about the problems he faces . . . on the job, in the community and nation, in the world.

"Not least, we recommend this book to teachers and clergymen, journalists and political leaders—to serious-minded citizens of all interests. . . ."

Copies of Labor's Story may be purchased from Community Publishers, Glen Cove, N. Y. The clothbound edition costs $5.50, the paperbound edition $2.50, both postpaid. Quantity rates are available to unions.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Lessons Learned the Hard Way Unite the Essential and Trivial

By Jane Goodsell

LESSONS I'VE LEARNED THE HARD WAY:

That I cannot figure out the cost of six pairs of stockings at two pairs for $1.59 without paper and pencil.

That I cannot improve a long-distance connection by jiggling the telephone.

That when people tell me, "I want you to be absolutely frank," I'd better not be.

That if I combine 2 cups of well-flavored cream sauce with a cup of noodles, the remainder of last night's roast, half a cup of chopped broccoli, ½-cup of whole kernel corn, ¼-cup of pimentos and 3 tablespoons of catsup and top the whole thing with buttered crumbs, I will have a nutritious one-dish meal that nobody will eat.

That Newton's Law (what goes up must come down) does not apply to department store elevators.

That I cannot construct a Christmas wreath out of wire coat hangers, pine cones, cedar branches, satin ribbon and glue.

That I cannot construct a Christmas wreath out of holly branches either.

That a kitten is not necessarily a male because it's named Charlie.

That plugging a three-way socket into another three-way socket is not a very good idea.

That the only way to keep a sharpened pencil by the telephone is to put the children up for adoption.

That May is too soon to put the winter woolens away in mothballs.

That I'd better not wear mascara to a wedding.

That little sandwiches cut into diamond and heart shapes almost always taste like library paste.

That I can't depend on the theory that a gas tank gauge says "empty" before it's really empty.

That anybody who makes a suggestion at a club meetings ends up heading a committee.

At Geneva Conference:

New Nations Affiliate with ILO, 40-Hour Goal Wins Support

Geneva—Delegates of oil-rich Kuwait on the Persian Gulf and the new African nation of Sierre Leone raised the total attendance at the 45th session of the Intl. Labor Organization to more than 1,000 government, worker and employer representatives.

The two countries were welcomed into the ILO by unanimous votes and loud applause shortly after the start of the conference's three-week session. Their admittance increased to 99 the number of ILO member nations.

The welcoming ceremony only briefly interrupted the technical work in committees where the conference is hammering out new international labor standards to serve "as guide posts for the entire world," in the words of James P. Griffin of the Steelworkers.

Griffin, director of USWA Dist. 26, was elected chairman of the committee of workers, employers and government delegates which is putting into final shape a new ILO recommendation on hours of work.

"The worker members scored their first victory when they succeeded in retaining the 40-hour week in the draft recommendation as a universal goal to be attained as quickly as possible everywhere," Griffin reported.

"The employers sought to knock it out of the text that the ILO had prepared as a draft for the committee," Griffin said. "When the workers would not stand for it, the employers then tried to get us to agree to have the 40-hour week referred to only in the preamble. But with the help of some government delegates we were able to retain the 40-hour principle in the body of the text where it belongs.

"I am fairly certain that the committee will report out a recommendation that will be at least as strong as the draft with which we started," Griffin assured. "It will fix a 48-hour week as the maximum anywhere and the 40-hour week as the goal to be attained with all possible speed."

Japan, Sweden and Nigeria informed the conference that they are making cash contributions to the fund for the ILO's newly established International Institute for Labor Studies. Japan is giving $200,000, Sweden $100,000 and Nigeria $14,000.

$1 Million in Fund

Just over $1 million has now been put into the fund, and another $148,000 pledged, although the institute was only inaugurated at a ceremony held after the start of the current conference.

Established on a property adjoining the ILO headquarters that was made available by the Geneva authorities, the institute was created with the strong backing of the AFL-CIO to assist in the development of responsible and independent trade union movements.

The credentials of the Hungarian worker, government and employer delegates to the conference were again challenged. The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Intl. Federation of Christian Trade Unions jointly asked that the Hungarian worker representative not be seated, while the "Free Employers" group called for similar action against the Hungarian government and employers delegate.

As in past years the challenges were based on the ground that the Hungarian delegates were nominated by a government imposed on the Hungarian people in a bath of blood by Soviet arms.

The three-man credentials committee ruled indirectly against the Hungarians by deciding that no decision should be taken one way or the other on the validity of their appointment in conformity with the practice in the United Nations on the same issue.

But at the same time the committee made clear its endorsement of the condemnation expressed both in the United Nations and in the ILO of the "policies and practices of the present Hungarian regime."

Status of Democracy Analyzed on 'Briefing'

Is democracy obsolete? Will it require another war for Americans to deliver the best that is in them? These were the questions posed to Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Harvard historian and White House adviser Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., on "Briefing Session," the public affairs television program co-produced by the AFL-CIO & National Educational Television.

Said Schlesinger: "I think America has shown itself historically capable of meeting great challenges in times of peace as well as in times of war. I think in the 1930's, for example, when we were faced with a great depression . . . we showed a capacity to respond to a great sense of public purpose. I think we can achieve that same capacity without the spur of war."

"We are now engaged in a war," Humphrey replied. "I think we have to get that quite clear. The trouble is that in the past the wars in which we have been engaged have been wars in which the violence and disorder were the result of gunplay, so to speak. Today our war is a much more subtle and yet equally devastating kind of struggle. It is an ideological war. It is a propaganda war."

Humphrey said he believed most Americans do not understand the nature of this war and for that reason they have made inadequate response to its danger.

Edward P. Morgan, the moderator, asked if it were possible that the West has overestimated man's desire for freedom.

"Perhaps," he said, "what he really wants is security."

"I don't see evidence of that," Schlesinger answered. "I think in societies which have never known freedom but which have known poverty and deprivation . . . there the passion for freedom will not be marked. But in societies which have achieved a certain stage of economic development man's instinct for freedom begins to express itself. I see no reason to suppose that this won't even be true of a totalitarian society like the Soviet Union."

The panelists discussed "bigness" and its effect on individual liberty. Individual freedom is destroyed by bigness, Schlesinger said.

"The first bigness to develop was big business and this was followed at about the same time by the response of big government and big labor," he asserted. Big labor was the only way in which the working man was able to defend himself against big business."

"What government really does is to represent, we hope at least, the popular will against some of the great private forces that represent a special interest," Humphrey said. "Government interests are not necessarily just the bad ones that you hear about, sometimes they are the ones that you like."

The next edition of "Briefing Session" will be a continuation of this discussion by the same panelists.

Foreign Aid Endorsed In AFL-CIO Testimony

on the Treasury for $6.4 billion over the following four years. An additional $1 billion authorization is sought to guarantee investments in underdeveloped countries.

"It is our firm conviction," Biemiller testified, "that what's worth doing at all is worth doing well. Since foreign aid is indeed worth doing—since, in our opinion, we really have no choice—we should do it thoroughly and effectively. The proposals before you, combining unified administration, long-term funding and a vigorous and intelligent new approach, will go far toward that end."

Biemiller acknowledged intensified opposition to the "whole concept" of foreign aid, including some from one-time supporters. But he maintained their varying reasons, ranging from opposition to helping "uncommitted" nations that won't stand with the West against the Soviet Union to the need for social reform at home, all can be answered. The costs of both foreign and domestic programs, he added, "are truly described as investments rather than expenditures."

"We believe this program would be wholly justified even if the Soviet Union and Red China didn't exist," he concluded. 'We believe it would be justified by principles that were 19 centuries old before Karl Marx was born—the principles that lead us to help the needy and to extend the hand of brotherhood to all men.

"We are for foreign aid, for using this small part of our great good fortune to help others, not only because it is necessary in a practical sense, but because it is right. The Administration's proposals, we feel, will continue to do what's right, and will do it better."

Opposition Still Strong

Biemiller pointed to the strength of the opposition to foreign aid a few days earlier in a speech to the eighth National Conference on Intl. Economic & Social Development in Washington.

Another conference speaker, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, president of the Retail Clerks, who presented the labor view of foreign aid at one of the dinner sessions, declared the AFL-CIO stand "is basically the same as it was when the Marshall Plan was first presented."

Because of its nature, he explained, the labor movement wants to help meet the pressing material needs of human beings in countries struggling to climb from poverty, "not because it may be anti-Communist, but because it is right."

"In the same way," he continued, "we want to help these people find their way toward a democratic society not to make allies, but because we know a democratic society is the best form of society to man."

Free Unions Aided

Suffridge said labor has been "disturbed" by the failure of foreign aid in at least some cases to benefit "the rank-and-file citizen" of the recipient country. It is for that reason, he went on, that the AFL-CIO has "worked hard" to help build strong, free labor movements in other free nations, because such a labor movement "is the best way to insure that workers will get a fair share of a rising national income."

Biemiller, in his address to the conference, called on friends of the program to emphasize its successes, "the kind of thing that can be done and it being done without fanfare," and expressed the hope the Administration will recognize "the human side of this program and carry on more people-to-people projects."

'Fighting for the Duration'

Enemies of the program are hard at work to defeat it, he said, but the labor movement "will be in there fighting for the duration as we hope you will be."

Kennedy chose the same conference, which annually attracts American organizations, individuals and world leaders concerned with international economic and social development, to make a major speech in support of the program.

He refused to say it will be free from the errors which opponents have charged to past operations.

"But I am more concerned about the waste to our security which will result from too small a program and too short a period of authority than I am about anything else," he declared.

Referring to opponents—"those who are burdened and those who are fatigued and those who feel that we have been through this so much for so many years" Kennedy declared:

"I would think that they should realize that that challenge will be with us for a long time to come."

AFL-CIO Demands Major Overhaul Of Mexican Farm Labor Program

The AFL-CIO has appealed strongly to the Senate to reform substantially the government's program of importing Mexican farm workers and devise a plan for its "final termination," or else let the program expire this year.

The prospect of a veto unless reforms are adopted also was raised by a Kennedy Administration spokesman before a Senate Agriculture subcommittee considering a two-year extension of the program. The House earlier passed a simple two-year extension without reforms.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Walter Mason and Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg called for passage of a bill introduced by Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) and co-sponsored by 15 colleagues.

The McCarthy bill would authorize the Secretary of Labor to limit the number of Mexican nationals for any one employer to the extent necessary to assure competition for American workers. It would compel growers to offer job conditions to Americans comparable to those now guaranteed Mexicans under a bilateral treaty. It would ban the use of Mexicans in other than temporary or seasonal work or as machinery operators.

The bill also would require employers to pay Mexican nationals a wage at least equal to the statewide or national average for hourly-paid farm work, whichever is lower, with a maximum yearly increase of 10 cents an hour.

The AFL-CIO, Mason declared, favors amendments which would prohibit the employment of Mexican nationals on the production of any crop in surplus supply. No crop ever has been declared non-essential by the Secretary of Labor as is permitted under present law.

The AFL-CIO also favors an amendment of the McCarthy bill to "prohibit the employment of Mexican nationals as strikebreakers," Mason stressed.

Even the temporary extension of the Mexican program without these amendments "would be unconscionable," he added.

Goldberg said Pres. Kennedy, Agriculture Sec. Orville Freeman and he himself "firmly and vigorously" support the McCarthy bill.

In issuing his warning, Goldberg said the Administration opposes any extension of the program "unless it is appropriately amended to provide sorely-needed protection for our own workers."

Goldberg said American farm workers must have "protection against the rampant competition for available jobs" from "an almost inexhaustible reservoir of foreign workers."

Money Study Stresses U.S. 'Duty' To Maintain Economic Health

to Pres. Kennedy containing 87 separate proposals, specifically aims at giving national priority to three equally important goals:

- A low level of unemployment.
- An adequate rate of economic growth.
- Reasonable price stability.

The Commission on Money and Credit recommended that the Federal Reserve Act and the Employment Act of 1946 be amended to set out these goals "as applicable to all federal agencies administering economic programs."

The private, independent commission, established in 1957 at the urging of the Committee for Economic Development, a business group, and financed in large part by a Ford Foundation grant, said in the words of its chairman, Frazar B. Wilde, that the conclusions represented "a consensus of American philosophy and economic judgment today."

The three major goals were not defined, but the commission said a low level of unemployment means that the number of job vacancies would be equal to the number of jobless. The commission said it would be reasonable to expect a rate of growth ranging from 3.5 to 4.5 percent a year.

Labor's Dissenting Footnotes

While the "major substance" of the report was approved by all commission members, a number filed dissenting footnotes. These included AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Emil Rieve; Stanley H. Ruttenberg, AFL-CIO director of research; Robert R. Nathan and Isador Lubin.

Ruttenberg stressed in his dissents the need to nail down an unemployment goal of 3 percent of the labor force, the failure of the report to set a target rate of economic growth at 5 percent a year, the need for more specific recommendations dealing with the Federal Reserve Board reorganization, opposition to eliminating the interest rate ceiling on long-term government securities and opposition to removal of interest rate ceilings on FHA or VA mortgage insurance.

The proposal to give the President power to make temporary changes in the 20 percent first bracket income tax rate would be subject to the congressional veto applicable to reorganization plans. It would allow a cut or increase of 5 percentage points, bringing the rate down to 15 percent during recessions and up to 25 percent in inflationary periods, with a limit of six months subject to renewal.

The President could use this proposed power only after he had issued a statement that in his judgment economic conditions were running counter to the three national economic goals.

More Advisers Proposed

To further the President's ability to counter economic swings in the business cycle, the commission recommended that an Advisory Board on Economic Growth and Stability be established by the President to help him in "discharging his expanded responsibilities" and to have the White House issue a series of statements and analyses when the economy is running counter to the economic objectives of the amended Employment Act of 1946.

The commission urged a closer relationship between the White House and the FRB, recommending that the FRB chairman and vice chairman serve four-year terms terminating with the President's term, giving a new President the power to pick his own chairman.

It recommended also giving the FRB, instead of its present special committee, complete and direct control over the open-market buying and selling of government securities and broader control over bank credit by requiring all insured commercial banks to become members of the system.

The report called specifically for "an increase in the benefit level" of unemployment compensation and declared that "federal action should require that all states comply with at least uniform minimum standards." Variations in state laws "weaken the stabilizing action of the system," the commission declared.

In the area of using public spending to combat business cycles, the report proposed more adequate planning for programs and a high ratio of spending in the early periods of a recession. It suggested consideration of the "possibility of advance appropriations for public works programs."

In other recommendations the report urged:

- Abolition of the national debt limit. It stressed that "none of the difficulties posed by the existing debt are so great as to justify giving priority to a policy of debt reduction if such a policy would interfere with stabilizing fiscal policy."
- Using debt reduction during prosperous periods rather than reducing taxes and using a flexible tax rate to bolster consumption during a downswing rather than changing the tax structure.
- Establishment of branch banking under federal control.
- Availability of federal deposit insurance for all savings banks and saving and loan associations from the Federal Savings & Loan Insurance Corp.
- Creation of an "appropriate regulatory body" for private corporate pension funds to devise standards of investment and to assure disclosure to beneficiaries of the financial statements of the fund.

Pact in Honolulu Won by ACWA

Honolulu—The Clothing Workers have won their first contract in Hawaii—a three-year agreement covering 250 employes of Alfred Shaheen, Ltd., largest clothing maker in the islands.

After victory in a National Labor Relations Board election, ACWA negotiated a contract providing wage increases of 5 to 40 cents an hour in various work classifications and a joint review of all wages in the near future. Work classifications and wage scales were established.

The contract also provides seven paid holidays, paid vacations up to two weeks, overtime provisions and an insurance fund.

AFL-CIO Backs Kennedy Request:

Budget Hike Asked For Labor, HEW

The AFL-CIO has called on the Senate to add nearly $1 billion to the House-approved $4.3 billion budget for the Labor Dept. and the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. for fiscal 1962.

Testifying before a Senate Appropriations subcommittee, Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said that the labor movement "strongly supports" the House-passed budget "provided it is amended to incorporate" increased budget requests which Pres. John F. Kennedy submitted to Congress in his extraordinary second State of the Union Message in May.

Kennedy asked nearly $500 million more for the Labor Dept., and $219 million more for HEW, primarily to finance the costs of administering new legislation enacted by Congress thus far in this session.

In addition, Schnitzler urged the Senate to appropriate for the Bureau of Intl. Labor Affairs the full $131,640 increase in its budget requested by the Administration. This proposed increase was trimmed in half by the House.

Funds Asked for Jobless Aid

In his special message to Congress, Kennedy asked $490 million additional for the Bureau of Employment Security to meet obligations under the temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits for long-term jobless.

The AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer endorsed this addition to the budget, as well as Kennedy's request for $1.37 million more to enable the National Labor Relations Board to process an increased load of unfair labor practice cases; $200,000 for the National Mediation Board to reduce a backlog of 2,500 docketed cases; $6.35 million more for the Wage-Hour Div. to provide "expanded services" under the new minimum wage amendments; and $500,000 for a study of economic growth.

The $219 million more which Kennedy asked for HEW, Schnitzler said, is essential if the department is to carry out "its increased responsibilities under the program to aid dependent children of unemployed parents" enacted as a companion measure to TUC under the Administration's anti-recession program.

Schnitzler told the subcommittee that most of the activities of the two departments "influence directly the speed of our economic recovery," and added that both departments can perform valuable services in the future "to assure proper and effective adjustment" to technological changes. To achieve these goals, he said, Labor and HEW must have "the necessary resources and manpower to do their job now and in the years to come."

Health Research Expanded

As passed by the House, the HEW budget was increased $48 million over the Administration's request. This would give the department a $4 billion budget for the new fiscal year—$150 million more than the 1961 budget which set an all-time record.

All of the increase went to the National Institutes of Health for stepped-up research on cancer and heart ailments, mental disease, arthritis, dental health, allergies, neurological ailments and blindness.

For the Labor Dept., the House made some minor cuts in Administration requests, but voted a $647,000 increase over the fiscal 1961 budget for the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training. The move, a recognition of the impact of automation, calls for $500,000 for a more effective training program and the balance for increased staff for the department's manpower program.

The House also increased by $1 million the appropriation request for area vocational educational programs under the Defense Education Act.

Consumer Demand Key To Recovery, IUD Says

There is no "convincing evidence" that the current recovery is strong enough to "lift us out of the stagnant state we were in when the recession began," the executive committee of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has declared.

The committee charged, in a statement adopted at a meeting in Washington, that the "scare cry of inflation" is again being raised to obstruct essential welfare legislation and to "resist union efforts to negotiate badly needed and deserved wage increases. . . ."

Asserting that efforts to focus attention upon the "specter of inflationary wages" instead of recovery are misguided, the committee said:

"Talk of wage restraint by government economists is nonsensical, since it fails to recognize the need to close the gap in consumer demand in order to put idle manpower and idle capacity back to work."

The IUD statement noted:

- Personal consumption will not begin to rise fast enough until personal income increases.
- Business investment will show only "slight increases" in the months ahead.
- Private construction is "well below 1959 levels."
- Federal spending, while slated to increase, is "not sufficient" to spark full recovery.

The IUD urged:

- A temporary $5 billion tax cut to boost mass purchasing power.
- A program of health care for the aged under social security.
- Prompt passage of federal aid to education.
- Greatly increased programs for low and medium income public housing, urban renewal, and effective mass transportation systems.
- Federal grants-in-aid to accelerate essential state and local government construction.
- Action by the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury to lower long-term interest rates.

Labor, the statement said, "must see to it that collective bargaining increases the level of wages and fringe benefits for those who need them most, not merely to fulfill our responsibility to our membership but to provide the increasing levels of income which are required for recovery and renewed economic growth."

Flight Engineers Win Interim Hike

A presidential emergency board has recommended an "interim" 5 percent pay increase for flight engineers of Pan American World Airways, retroactive to June 1, 1960, when the former contract expired.

The board noted that other contract issues have been dealt with in the recommendations of a special commission concerned with disputes over jurisdiction and job qualifications of pilots and flight engineers.

It said, however, that the wage increase should be put into effect to prevent "dissatisfaction and frustration" resulting from the long delay in negotiating a new contract.

E. S. Gottesman of ACWA Dies at 73

New York—Edmond S. Gottesman, secretary-treasurer of the Clothing Workers' New York Joint Board of Neckwear Workers, died here at 73 after a long illness. On the day of his funeral all shops stopped work in tribute to his memory.

Born in Hungary, Gottesman came here in 1904 and became a neckwear worker. He helped found the union, became an officer, and worked for its affiliation with the ACWA in 1938. In 1948 he took on the duties of joint board manager after the death of Louis Fuchs.

Gottesman, in poor health for several years, suffered a heart attack after opening contract negotiations with local manufacturers. Two children survive.

McNamara Report Shows:

Token Medical Aid Helped Only 10,000 of 17 Million

Only 10,000 of the nation's 17 million elderly citizens "benefited directly" in the first six months of operation of the token federal-state program of medical assistance which Congress passed last year, Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) has charged.

McNamara said a report compiled by the staff of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, of which he is chairman, torpedoed the "well-advertised claims" that the measure "would be the answer to the problems of health care for our senior citizens."

The legislation, sponsored by Sen. Robert S. Kerr (D-Okla) and Rep. Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), was substituted during the post-convention session of the 86th Congress for an AFL-CIO-backed bill which would have financed health care for the aged through the social security mechanism.

The Kerr-Mills program, backed by the American Medical Association, provides federal grants for limited health benefits only for the "medically indigent," and then only in states where specific programs are adopted to include such care under regular public assistance programs.

The AFL-CIO assailed the bill because it subjected the aged to the indignity of state-devised "means tests," instead of providing care as a matter of right, as would be done through social security.

McNamara said data compiled by his Senate committee was based on a questionnaire, submitted to all 50 states and four territories, asking about the degree of progress, if any, in putting into effective operation the Kerr-Mills legislation.

The replies, the Michigan Democrat said, "indicate that even by the end of this year there will still be 25 states with no plans for taking advantage" of federal grants for such programs. He said that some 12 million older men and women will not be protected in any public program of medical care as of January 1962.

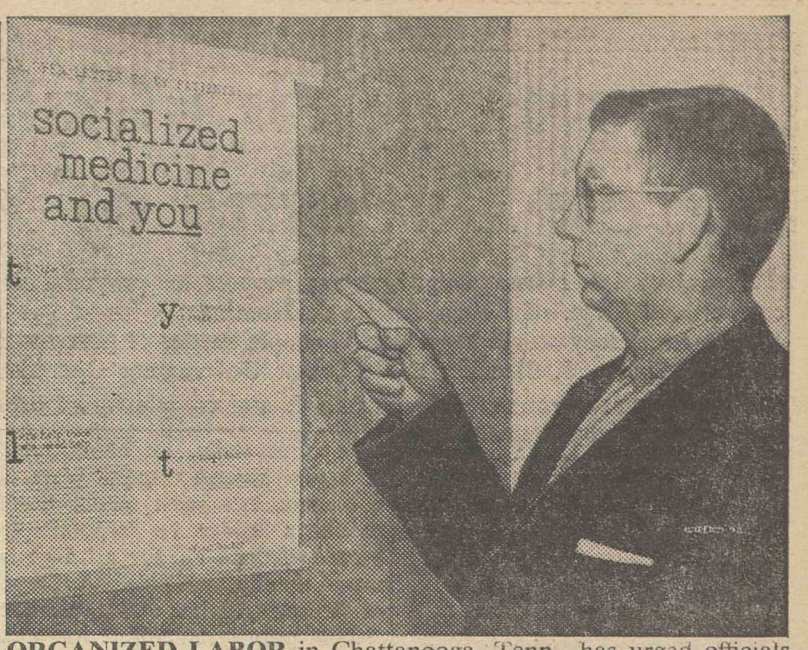
McNamara said the survey proved the contention of liberals during last year's medical care debate that "the state just are not in a position to take advantage of this kind of legislation as a way of providing a floor of protection against the high risks and high costs of illness among the aged of our country."

The Kerr-Mills program, he said, should be a "supplemental" one to augment more inclusive protection such as contained in the Administration's Anderson-King bill, backed by organized labor, that would finance health benefits for the aged through a one-quarter of 1 percent increase each for employers and employes in social security payroll deductions.

The 72-page staff report showed that:

- In the six months ending Mar. 31, 27,000 different individuals had received assistance from the seven state programs which were then in operation.
- Of this number, only 10,000 were actually newly eligible individuals. The other 17,000 already had been receiving medical care through old age assistance, but were transferred to the new program "primarily because the states stand to make a substantial financial gain" since, under the Kerr-Mills bill, "the federal matching-grant formula is more liberal" than under old age assistance.
- Only six of the 20 states with definite program details will be providing "comprehensive medical programs with good quality" by the end of 1961. "The remaining 14 states," the report said, "have major limitations in services so that there are serious doubts the program objectives can be met."
- If comprehensive services were provided by all 50 states for a potential eligible population of 10 million aged, as originally contemplated by the authors of the 1960 law, annual costs to the federal government "could exceed well over $1 billion" instead of the $600 million which backers claimed.

In urging action on the Anderson-King bill, McNamara pointed out that such a program, including the increase in social security taxes necessary to implement it, is favored by 67 percent of the American people, as indicated in a recent Gallup Poll. Only 26 percent were recorded in opposition, and the remaining 7 percent had no opinion.



ORGANIZED LABOR in Chattanooga, Tenn., has urged officials of Baroness Erlanger Hospital to remove from its lobby American Medical Association poster which W. M. Smith, secretary-treasurer of Chattanooga Labor Council, is shown reading. The CLC objected to AMA charge that labor-backed legislation to put health care for aged under social security is "socialism."

Labor Hits Hospital Use Of AMA Propaganda

Chattanooga, Tenn.—The Chattanooga Labor Council has sharply protested the display of a "grossly misleading" American Medical Association poster in the lobby of the Baroness Erlanger Hospital here.

The AMA propaganda poster attacks legislation to finance health care for the aged as "socialized medicine" and charges it would destroy the "doctor-patient relationship."

In a letter to the hospital board chairman, Roy McDonald, the central labor body points out that it is "inconsistent" for a hospital which has accepted federal funds to enlarge its facilities to use the same facilities "to brand as socialistic" the Administration-supported Anderson-King bill which is "desperately needed by our elderly citizens."

The letter, sent on behalf of the council's executive committee, asked that the poster be removed. As an alternative, the council suggested that in "fairness and impartiality, the hospital permit us to place a poster next to the AMA's."

Such a poster, the letter said, would outline labor's reasons, "based on the text of the bill itself rather than propaganda, for favoring health benefits for the aged under the social security system."

The letter pointed out that the hospital has received or been allocated $2.35 million in federal grants under the Hill-Burton Act.

The AMA poster on display has been circulated by the AMA to physicians with the request that it be posted in their waiting and consultation rooms. It is similar in content to a series of AMA newspaper advertisements which have been denounced as "false and misleading" by Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff and Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.), one of the bill's sponsors.

Social Security Ideal At Stake in Health Fight

Los Angeles—An AFL-CIO spokesman has accused the American Medical Association and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce of approaching the question of health care for the aged solely "in terms of finances" instead of "in terms of human dignity and self-respect."

Addressing the annual meeting of the Los Angeles Region Welfare Planning Council, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank said the goal of right-wing pressure groups was to discredit the quarter-century-old concept of social insurance embodied in the basic New Deal social security legislation.

If the AMA and chamber are sucessful, he warned, they will not only force the aged onto public welfare rolls with their "despised needs tests," but will also be able in the near future to shift the entire burden of public assistance financing from general taxation to employer-employe payroll taxes.

In 1949, the federation spokesman pointed out, a 17-member committee representing labor, management and the general public reported to Congress that the goal of social security should be "to prevent dependency . . . and thus greatly reduce the need for (public) assistance."

The sucess of the program, Cruikshank said, is underscored by the fact that in 1940 there were 2 million persons reeciving old-age assistance and that by mid-1960 this number had increased by only 293,000 despite the sharp rise in the national population.

Inclusion of medical care for the aged under social security financing—as envisioned in the AFL-CIO-backed Administration bill sponsored by Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.) and Rep. Cecil R. King (D-Calif.)—is designed to follow the same principle, Cruikshank said, and would "prevent, as well as . . . alleviate, need and personal catastrophe."

Cruikshank said the AMA has been leveling "a constant drumfire of attack" on social security and has denied that it is "based on a valid insurance concept."

The most recent instance, he said, involves a recording made by Ronald Reagan, former Hollywood actor and now producer of a television program sponsored by General Electric Co. In the recording—designed for presentation to women's auxiliaries of medical societies—Reagan "misquoted" a Supreme Court decision, Cruikshank said, in an effort to prove that social security is not insurance.

What the court actually said, the AFL-CIO spokesman declared, was that social security "is not an annuity contract." He added: "Neither is fire insurance nor automobile insurance an annuity contract, but it is nonetheless insurance."

More importantly, he added, the Supreme Court decision clearly declared that "the social security system may be accurately described as a form of social insurance."

Utility Union Hails Fisher On Retirement

New York—Joseph Fisher, retiring after 15 years of service as the only president the Utility Workers had, was hailed for his contributions to the labor movement at a testimonial dinner here given by the union's Local 1-2.

Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, who as secretary-treasurer of the former CIO had installed Fisher for his first term in office, lauded his devotion to "the great task of organizing the unorganized" and improving workers' standards, and for "his idealism and deep-rooted moral convictions, his vital and abiding sense of trade union brotherhood."

"Joe Fisher's reputation and the reputation of his union have been among the cleanest and brightest and most admirable," he said. "Never has there been a negative report on them in the press; never has there been a dark spot on their 15-year record."

William J. Pachler, who succeeded Fisher as UWIU president, presented him on behalf of Local 1-2 with a silver plate engraved with a lifetime union membership card. The local also made a cash donation to Holy Cross High School, Queens, toward a room to be dedicated in honor of Fisher and in memory of the late Mrs. Fisher.

Other speakers included Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO; AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Michael Mann; Bernard Gallagher, vice president for labor relations of the Consolidated Edison Co.; UWIU Sec.-Treas. Andrew McMahon; and the Rev. Philip Carey, S.J., and Rev. Joseph Hammond, priests active in labor schools in whose work Fisher was interested. Marshall Sampson, business agent of Local 1-2, was toastmaster.

Harbor Workers' Compensation Revision Supported by AFL-CIO

The federal Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, which provides insurance to cover fatal and crippling injuries for 600,000 harbor workers around the world, has fallen below realistic levels and its benefits should be raised, the AFL-CIO has declared.

In testimony before a Senate Labor subcommittee, Walter J. Mason of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation said the federation and two of its affiliates—the Metal Trades Dept. and the Washington Central Labor Council — support the Morse-Zelenko bill raising the maximum benefit from $54 to $70 a week.

Pointing out that five years have passed since Congress reviewed the provisions of the act, Mason testified that congressional action to bring the statute more in line with present-day conditions is overdue for the following reasons:

- Basic provisions of the law have fallen behind standards established by the Federal Employes Compensation Act and many state compensation laws—$121 a week maximum benefit for federal employes, $150 a week maximum for injured workers in Arizona, $100 in Alaska were among the examples cited.
- Workers covered by the act—longshoremen, ship repairmen and servicemen, harbor workers, employes of government contractors at defense bases outside the United States, and District of Columbia workers—are engaged in "extremely hazardous" occupations and should be adequately compensated for injuries.
- The maximum benefit was set by Congress in 1956 and has not been raised though the average weekly wage has risen to $115 for longshoremen and $105 for ship repairmen.

Underlying nearly all workmen's compensation laws, Mason told the subcommittee, is the principle that the majority of injured workers shall receive insurance benefits equal to two-thirds of their actual wage loss during the period of total disability.

Citing two professional authorities, Mason quoted the American College of Surgeons as calling for "adequate compensation to secure family security during the entire period of disability and rehabilitation." The position of the American Medical Association was cited as follows:

"Workmen's compensation is not a relief program. It is the proper intent of the program that a disabled employe and his family should not suffer a serious reduction in normal living standards during the rehabilitation period. This requires that the benefit level be maintained at an adequate percentage of the usual wage and include reasonable personal expenses incurred by the employe."

Therefore the reduction in living standards suffered by covered employes is too severe by the standards of both the AMA and organized labor, Mason testified.

Urged in Senate, House:

Urban Affairs Cabinet Post Given Backing of AFL-CIO

Organized labor has pledged strong support to proposed legislation which would create a cabinet-level Dept. of Urban Affairs & Housing.

Such an agency would represent "a simple matter of governmental efficiency," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a Senate Government Operations subcommittee.

"The dramatic growth in the magnitude and complexity of urban problems in recent years, plus the aceleration of this trend which is expected in future years," require a top-level federal agency, he added.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. George D. Riley testified before a House Government Operations subcommittee that a federal Dept. of Urban Affairs & Housing would mean "a voice at the Cabinet table for the vast majority of our citizens" for the first time in the nation's history.

Biemiller put labor's support behind a bill introduced by Sen. Joseph Clark (D-Pa.). Riley testified in support of a bill sponsored by Rep. Dante B. Fascell (D-Fla.).

Biemiller recalled the AFL-CIO has supported the idea of a federal agency since its founding and just this year the AFL-CIO Executive Council renewed labor's support of the Kennedy Administration proposal "to assure a high priority and effective coordination of the housing and urban-focused activities of the federal government."

Department Components

Biemiller observed that the nucleus of the new agency, under Clark's bill, would be comprised of the Federal National Mortgage Association and the Housing & Home Finance Agency, including the latter's constituent organizations—the Community Facilities Administration, Urban Renewal Administration, Federal Housing Administration and Public Housing Administration.

But, Biemiller continued, the challenges facing urban areas require "broader and more direct representation" in the federal government than that now provided by HHFA and other agencies.

Coordinated planning by urban communities is essential, he said, if they are to meet effectively problems resulting from population and industrial growth—new water sources, sewage disposal, schools, slum removal and so on.

The need of cities for information and technical aid will require a federal clearing-house arrangement. A federal agency also can serve in the transmission of information on juvenile delinquency control, on human relations problems and even on the promotion of cultural pursuits, Biemiller said.

Would Guide City Spending

Even for the efficient expenditure of their own funds, cities should find a Dept. of Urban Affairs a necessity, he commented. If a new sewage disposal plant is a community's most urgent need, should a bridge be built simply because federal aid for a bridge is more readily available? A Dept. of Urban Affairs would assure "sound priority attention" for both city and federal funds as a result, Biemiller asserted.

"The rapid growth of our cities, the complexity of their fiscal problems, the lack of knowledge and information relating to the solution of their problems, the multiplication of the social problems they face and the desirability of efficient administration of federal programs to meet their needs all demand the prompt establishment of a Dept. of Urban Affairs," Biemiller concluded.

Riley stressed the increasingly urban nature of American society. He pointed to Census Bureau figures showing that 84 percent of the population increase between 1950 and 1960 took place in what the bureau calls standard metropolitan statistical areas—cities of 50,000 or more and their outlying areas.

The 212 cities in this category grew by 23.6 million, he noted, following the pattern of the 1940s. Only eight of the 212 cities failed to gain, he added.

Riley said the nation's cities have acquired "overwhelming" problems. He cited financial solvency, air and water pollution, traffic congestion and mass transportation, slums and general obsolescence.

A Dept. of Urban Affairs is needed, he concluded, to meet these problems and to achieve uniformity in civil defense and urban renewal, for formulating programs under the new area redevelopment act, for housing programs, and for such purposes as securing urban open space and land reserves.

Schnitzler Asks Funds To Halt Wage Gyps

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler has urged increased appropriations for the Labor Dept.'s Wage-Hour Div. to protect workers against "chiseling" by employers when the federal minimum wage is raised this September and coverage is extended to additional groups.

Appearing on Labor News Conference over the Mutual radio network, Schnitzler challenged the American press "to place the same emphasis" in publicity on violations [of law] by employers that is given to misdeeds of other segments of the community.

Pointing out that underpayments to workers covered by the present $1-an-hour minimum wage increased 25 percent during the 1960 fiscal year, Schnitzler said that if the spotlight of publicity were put on violators "there would be less need for more investigators in the Dept. of Labor."

Schnitzler was interviewed by Norman Walker, labor reporter for the Associated Press, and John Herling, syndicated Washington correspondent. He charged that "during past Administrations" laws regulating labor-management activities "meant 99 percent labor and 1 percent management." He said he expected a more "balanced" approach by the Kennedy Administration.

The AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer announced that the American Surety Association, which sets rate standards for the nation's bonding companies, is offering the trade union movement "the lowest honesty fidelity bonding rate in America."

The association, he said, found "that the trade union movement has the best bonding experience in America," including "all of business, all banks, all fraternal organizations."

Labor's support for programs to improve the nation's health, education and welfare, Schnitzler said, "stems from our desire to have a better American for all Americans." He declared:

Working for All

"As I travel around the country to address various gatherings of our unions, I see over and over again where the leaders of the local labor movement are out working to raise funds to build a wing onto a hospital, are advocating . . . more playgrounds.

"They don't go into this and say, 'We want a playground in this city just for the children of the members of the trade union movement.' They want the playground for all of the children . . . for the entire community."

Van Arsdale Given Labor Dept. Award

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has presented the Labor Dept.'s highest citation for a non-employe to Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., president of the New York City Central Labor Council and of Local 3, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

In presenting the department's award of merit, Goldberg praised Van Arsdale for his "leadership in bringing labor and management in New York together" and as an advocate of better relations.

Negroes in Tennessee To Get Surplus Food

Pres. Kennedy, following a plea from organized labor, has authorized federal surplus food packages for Negro families in two Tennessee counties who were evicted from farms or subjected to economic boycotts after they registered to vote.

Use of federal surplus food for relief of the Fayette and Haywood County families had been strongly urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its meeting last February. The council also set up a labor program of food and clothing donations through AFL-CIO Community Service Activities.

Last month, the AFL-CIO supplemented its aid program by making grants of up to $100 a month until harvest for a group of families still on the land whose normal sources of credit have been cut off by white landlords, store owners and banks.

Kennedy, in a letter to Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman, gave his approval for surplus food distribution to the Tennessee Negroes who have undergone "severe hardships." The Justice Dept. has brought a civil rights suit on their behalf against some 100 landowners who are charged with illegal interference with the right to vote.

Negroes had not voted in the two counties—the only two in the state where they are a majority of the population—since the reconstruction era immediately after the Civil War. A campaign for registration brought 1,500 Negroes on the rolls in Haywood County and about 1,200 in Fayette County.

Administration Housing Bill Under GOP Attack

Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.) discharged three subcommittees from further consideration of the NDEA measure and took the bill into the full committee where, he predicted, final approval could be reached more speedily.

Rayburn Dubious

The fate of federal aid to public education, however, and specifically the measure's provision for allowing states to use grants for raising teachers' salaries, remained in doubt. House Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.) bluntly declared that "the prospects are not too good."

Meanwhile there were these other developments on Capitol Hill:

● The Senate Finance Committee cleared the House-passed social security measure boosting minimum benefits from $33 to $40 a month; raising widows' benefits 10 percent; and permitting men to retire at age 62 with reduced benefits. No date has been set for Senate floor action on the measure, which the Administration estimates would aid 4.2 million persons the first year.

● The House, overriding Republican objections, approved Kennedy's plans to streamline the Civil Aeronautics Board and the Federal Trade Commission. Unless rejected by the Senate, the CAB reorganization plan goes into effect July 2, while the FTC plan will take effect July 8.

● The Senate, in a surprise move, voted 52 to 38 to kill the Administration proposal for reorganizing the Securities & Exchange Commission. The SEC proposal, bitterly opposed by the New York Stock Exchange, had earlier won approval in the House. Under the Reorganization Act of 1949 a White House plan goes into effect unless either chamber vetoes it within 60 days.

● The Administration, in a letter to Sen. James O. Eastland (D-Miss.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has recommended that the Civil Rights Commission be made a permanent government agency. The letter, signed by Deputy Atty. Gen. Byron White, said it was "exceptionally important" that the commission not be allowed to go out of business on Nov. 9, as presently called for.

● The Senate passed and sent to the White House Kennedy's $3.7 billion tax extension bill which continues for another year the present taxes on corporations, new cars, liquor, telephones, cigarettes and travel.

● Senate-House conferees agreed on the Administration's $11 billion highway tax measure to keep the construction of the interstate network of superhighways on a pay-as-you-go basis. Retained in the bill was a program to curb billboards on interstate highways now under construction. The measure retains the present 4-cent-a-gallon gasoline tax until Oct. 1, 1972, instead of allowing it to drop to 3 cents this July 1.

Compensation Seen Lagging Behind Wages

Most state workmen's compensation laws provide less income protection for disabled workers today than 20 years ago.

A report compiled by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security shows that "although dollar benefit amounts have been increased, they have not kept pace with the rising wage level since 1940."

Assistant Dir. Clinton M. Fair, in a letter to AFL-CIO state central bodies, pointed out that the improvement in workmen's compensation benefits in recent years "has been substantially less" than what it should have been.

In most states, maximum weekly benefits for temporary total disability last year were less than 50 percent of the average wage in covered employment in the state.

By contrast, in 1946, when wage rates were much lower, maximum benefits in most states were more than 70 percent of average wages.

By way of example, the maximum benefit in Georgia in 1940 was $20 while the state's average weekly wage was only $17.85. By the end of 1959, the average wage had risen to $71.38, but the maximum benefit had only gone up to $30.

Council Urges More Vigor In Drive for Real Recovery

Calls Joblessness Top U.S. Problem

By Saul Miller

Unity House, Pa.—The real and present danger to the nation's economic health, which impairs its ability to combat effectively the latest Communist thrust, is the more than 5 million men who cannot find jobs and the 20 percent of our productive capacity lying idle.

The answer, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared at its meeting here, is not to raise the specter of inflation stemming from necessary wage increases, but more vigorous efforts to put the nation on the road to real recovery by 1962.

The council struck out specifically at the "wage restraint" proposals being advanced by Treasury Sec. Douglas Dillon and White House Aide Walt Rostow as "untimely and unnecessary," pointing out that the "example of the previous Administration should be lesson enough," with its resulting "unemployment, economic stagnation and not much stability."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference that the nation has not emerged from recession and will not until the unemployment situation is solved. The threat to the nation, he added, is not inflation "but the failure to grow." The wage restraint proposals were "unwise," he commented, as well as "short-sighted" because they improperly appraise the real problem before the country.

The council's analysis of the economic situation was part of the major theme of the opening sessions at the Ladies' Garment Workers vacation resort in the Poconos—that full recovery from the latest recession and a nation alerted to the gravity of the international crisis are needed to meet the Communist threat to peace and freedom.

Program on World Affairs

In a statement on the international crisis, the council called for an eight-point program to strengthen the U.S. and free world position, including granting Pres. Kennedy emergency powers for mobilizing the nation's resources for "any eventuality" and the creation of a special presidential commission to recommend elimination of private and government policies which have "tended to help the Communist bloc" overcome economic difficulties.

The council called also for congressional approval of the Presi-

Council Urges No T-H As Ship Talks Resume

Unity House, Pa.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting here urged Pres. John F. Kennedy to approve a plan proposed by three maritime unions for moving emergency ship cargoes instead of seeking a Taft-Hartley injunction to force 70,000 striking members of these and other unions back to work for 80 days.

Kennedy took the first step toward an injunction June 26 when he established a Board of Inquiry to examine the effects of the walkout that started June 15 on expiration of contracts with American shipping companies.

Acting on the recommendation of Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, who reported for eight government officials that the strike was having a "substantial impact" on the economy, Kennedy appointed a three-member board to meet with the parties and report back to the White House by June 30. He named veteran arbitrator David L. Cole as chairman and Judge Samuel I. Rosenman and Prof. James J. Healy of Harvard University as members.

The council-backed proposal urged on Kennedy called for the President to appoint a National Health, Safety & Military Cargo Clearance Board to process all requests for clearance of ships to move food, oil and other essential supplies.

It had been submitted to Kennedy earlier by Maritime Union Pres. Joseph Curran in behalf of the NMU, the Masters, Mates & Pilots and the American Radio Association. Seafarers Union Pres. Paul Hall, appearing before the council at his own request, said that his union, the Marine Engineers and the Longshoremen disapproved the plan as "unnecessary."

The Administration nevertheless made it clear that it hoped strongly for a negotiated settlement. Goldberg told a press conference here June 28 that there was "plenty of time" for the unions and shipping companies to reach agreement and that "it can and should be done in the national interest."

Goldberg emphasized to the press conference, which he held after appearing before the Executive Council, that the Board of Inquiry had been specifically instructed by Kennedy to mediate the dispute as well as report on the effects.

Goldberg told reporters that he himself had met in New York with the Cole group, which had previously called in all parties to the dispute for private discussions of the issues.

Stating that he was also using the medium of the press to urge cooperation with the Board of Inquiry, Goldberg declared:

"It should not be necessary for the President to ask an injunction" to end the walkout.

"Neither the President nor I have any relish in going the

Arouse U.S. to Crisis, White House Asked

Unity House, Pa.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council called on the Kennedy Administration to "act immediately to alert the American people to the gravity of the international crisis" and give them "the sense of urgency and readiness the hour demands."

It called also for congressional approval of the Administration's foreign economic aid program, especially the long-term planning and financing sought by the White House.

The council warned that the crisis over Berlin and a divided Germany "constitutes the gravest source of danger of a world war" and categorically rejected the proposal of Sen. Mike Mansfield, Senate Democratic leader, to create a so-called "free city" by merging the Communist and democratic sectors of Berlin.

Federation Pres. George Meany told a press conference that the American people do not realize the gravity of the international crisis and steps must be taken "to alert them." He declared the AFL-CIO supports Pres. Kennedy on the steps he has been taking to meet the crisis and said the President is "keenly aware" of the situation and trying his best to stress its seriousness.

Current History Reviewed

On the foreign aid program, Meany declared the question is not one of cost or waste but "what it will cost us not to do it."

Two Major Bills Cleared By Congress

By Gene Zack

The 87th Congress has voted final approval to two major pieces of domestic legislation—an omnibus housing bill and improvements in social security—and has sent them to the White House substantially in the form requested by Pres. John F. Kennedy.

The $4.9 billion housing and urban renewal measure passed the Senate by a margin of 53 to 38 after narrowly surviving a Republican effort to send it back to conference to trim out $1.6 billion in new programs. The measure cleared the House by a 229-176 vote.

The social security measure—which raises the minimum level of monthly benefits, increases benefits for widows and permits men the option of retiring at 62 with reduced payments—was approved by

Cost of Living Dips, Still Close to Record

By Robert B. Cooney

"Down goes beefsteak and up goes rent;
this lowers the index by one-tenth percent.
Take time out for three strong cheers;
we'll be living for nothing in 83 years."

This bit of doggerel, composed by a Labor Dept. technician, was released along with a report which showed the Consumer Price Index for May remained close to its record high level.

The cost of living declined by one-tenth of 1 percent between April and May to 127.4, the report said. It noted that over the past eight months the CPI has been "relatively stable" with fluctuations between 127.3 and the all-time high of 127.5.

The May CPI means the market basket which cost $10 in the 1947-49 base period now costs $12.74.

Robert J. Myers, deputy commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, told reporters the prospects for next month's report were for a "slight upward movement" to the all-time high because of seasonal increases in the prices of fruits and vegetables.

Some 310,000 workers have their wages tied to the May CPI under union contracts. Of this total, about 123,000 workers in major aluminum firms, metal container companies and two aircraft companies will receive pay hikes of 2 to 3 cents an hour to meet the increased cost of living since May 1960.

Some 23,000 workers in metal-working firms will take a cut of 1 cent an hour on the basis of a quarterly adjustment. There is no change for the remaining 164,000 employes.

An accompanying report showed a continuing although gradual rise in factory workers' spendable earnings and buying power, with buying power still below its 1959 "prosperity" level for May.

"A steadily lengthening workweek and higher average hourly earnings boosted spendable earnings for the third successive month, while the buying power of the gains was preserved through stability in consumer prices," the report said.

Spendable earnings—the "take-home" pay after deduction of federal income and social security taxes—rose by about 85 cents over the month to $82.44 per week for a production worker with three dependents and to $74.85 for a worker without dependents.

The slight net decline between April and May of 1961 was due to lower average food prices, chiefly meat and poultry. Price increases continued for non-food items (including rent).

Medical care costs continued upward, the report revealed, noting that a jump of three-tenths of 1 percent in medical care "stemmed mainly from widespread increases in fees for professional services and higher hospitalization insurance rates."

Council Asks No T-H Injunction As Ship Strike Talks Resume

Taft-Hartley route," the secretary said. "It is not a good route to go."

He pointed out that both he and Kennedy were "on record" as opposed to the injunction provisions of the T-H law and that "we have not changed our minds."

In the absence of a negotiated settlement, however, Goldberg said, there was a "statutory obligation" on the President and he must "discharge it."

In New York, meanwhile, the Cole board recessed its public sessions after arranging meetings between union spokesmen and the shippers in an effort to encourage a settlement.

The runaway ship issue has been a major issue in the walkout for all the unions and shipping companies.

In its resolution endorsing a cargo clearance board, the Executive Council denounced the "tax-dodging activities of the big oil companies" which have transferred hundreds of American ships to foreign flags to reap profits by escaping American taxes, labor standards and safety requirements.

Pres. Kennedy expressed his concern about the problem of runaway ships at his own press conference June 28. He described runaways as "ships put by American owners under other flags in order to avoid paying the wage scale which we have for our American merchant marine."

When such ships register under foreign flags, the President said, it affects "not only the welfare of the seamen involved but also affects governmental policy and governmental obligations. We are concerned about the matter."

American shipping unions also have an obligation, Kennedy said, to "make sure that the problems of the American merchant marine in competition with other areas are taken into consideration."

He would, he said, wait for the inquiry board to report and consider what can be done to "work out some solutions" to ease the burdens of the people involved.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference the proposal was "constructive" and would insure that the strike would not affect the national interest adversely. He said he hoped it would be helpful in preserving Kennedy from the "embarassing task" of seeking a T-H injunction.

He termed the injunction provision of Taft-Hartley a "mistake" because an injunction embitters the workers and does not create a climate of reasonableness under which a strike can be settled.

Acknowledging that the Administration might move toward an injunction for lack of other legal techniques, Meany said the record has proved the futility of such moves in solving disputes. There is no "cooling off" during an 80-day Taft-Hartley court order, he said, but rather a disgruntled group of workers forced to remain on the job.

In announcing his appointment of the Cole board, the President said the maritime dispute underscored the need for more flexible procedures than Taft-Hartley provides to deal with strikes. He said he would "make suggestions to the Congress" along these lines very shortly.

Tentative Agreement

Earlier, Curran had told reporters that he and the heads of six major dry-cargo shipping lines had made a tentative agreement the night of June 20, but that the agreement was never executed because at least some shipowners apparently anticipated a Taft-Hartley injunction.

The agreement was contingent on approval by negotiators for passenger and tanker lines, Curran said, and the approval never came.

OAS Urged to Prevent Red Drive in Americas

Unity House, Pa.—A thorough review of U.S. inter-American policy in the political as well as in the economic fields was called for by the AFL-CIO Executive Council here.

It called specifically for the Organization of American States to take "firm action" to prevent the "establishment of Communist regimes in the Western Hemisphere."

The council hailed the democratic labor movement in Latin America for rejecting all attempts to sidetrack the Cuban Communist menace to the hemisphere, adding:

"We are instead convinced that today this danger is even greater than it was in the past. Politically and militarily, Cuba is now the beachhead of the Communist International for the infiltration, subversion and ultimate conquest of the Americas."

Bold and massive economic measures, "designed to correct the deplorable social inequities still plaguing most Latin American countries," are needed as well as a political democratic counter-offensive, the council said.

It called for revival of the Committee for Political Defense of the hemisphere under the supervision of the OAS to combat Communist subversion along the lines taken during World War II against the Nazis and Fascists.

It called for continuation of OAS representatives in the Dominican Republic to "insure a peaceful and effective transition from dictatorship to democracy," and it urged the government to stop any economic aid to the dictatorships of Haiti and Paraguay until political and trade union freedoms are re-established and general elections called.

The council statement called also for strengthened economic aid and political and diplomatic support for the democratic regimes in Venezuela and Bolivia, "currently engaged in a life-and-death struggle against the subversive forces of communism."

Halting totalitarianism and tyranny, the council added, rests in part on the forthcoming special meeting of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council to be held this summer in Uruguay and the administration of the inter-American social progress trust fund created by Congress with an appropriation of $500 million.

The statement stressed that this aid should be used so that the benefits reach the people of the countries involved.

Council Upholds USWA in Dispute

Unity House, Pa.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has found the Sheet Metal Workers in violation of the no-raiding provisions of the AFL-CIO constitution and ordered it to "cease and desist" from all activities against the Steelworkers at the Carrier Corp. plant at Syracuse, N. Y.

Federation Pres. George Meany announced the decision at a press conference after the council had previously heard from representatives of the Sheet Metal Workers and the USWA. The Steelworkers have been conducting a strike against the Carrier Corp. since March 1960.

Council Backs Latin Training Foundation

Unity House, Pa.—The establishment of a foundation for the development of union leadership in Latin American countries has been approved by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The foundation will include representatives of labor, industry, business and the public. Its program is based on a study being made by the University of Chicago and is aimed at bringing to the United States 100 to 150 Latin Americans each year for intensive training in the techniques of labor leadership.

The council at its current meeting adopted a resolution pledging the AFL-CIO to encourage, support and actively assist in the establishment and operation of the foundation, and appropriating $15,000 to help complete the study program.

The proposal originally was endorsed by the Executive Council at its August 1960 meeting, which also appropriated $20,000 to initiate the University of Chicago study.

At a press conference AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the federation's contributions were "seed money" designed to finance planning of the foundation and that the problem now was to get it into operation.

The federation president said the plan called for Latin American labor representatives to study in this country for three months and then to spend nine months in their own countries, supported by foundation funds, to set up programs for their colleagues.

Merger Deadline of Oct. 1 Given State, Local Bodies

Unity House, Pa.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council set an Oct. 1, 1961, deadline for the completion of merger of all former AFL and CIO bodies, declaring that if the still-unmerged groups do not unite by that time, each will "cease to be an affiliate of the AFL-CIO and its charter of affiliation shall be revoked."

The council adopted a statement declaring that "each and every central body which has not yet effected merger is in violation of the constitution of the AFL-CIO." The resolution also affirmed the authority of the federation president to "revoke the charter of any unmerged central body and to charter successor central bodies to exercise the jurisdiction of those whose charters are revoked."

The council declared that the notice of the Oct. 1, 1961, deadline shall be mailed to every unmerged central body, and the officers of each unmerged group were directed to inform the membership of the contents of the council resolution.

All of the former state AFL and CIO organizations have been merged with the exception of New Jersey. Out of 880 central bodies originally existing as separate groups, only 23 remain unmerged, including groups in Chicago, Pittsburgh, Scranton and smaller communities in a half-dozen states. Eleven of the unmerged labor centers are in New Jersey.

dent's foreign economic aid program, especially the long-term planning and financing sought by the White House.

It called also for a "democratic counter-offensive" of "bold and massive economic measures" designed to "correct the deplorable social inequities still plaguing most of Latin America" and reiterated support for democratic Cubans fighting the "beachhead of the Communist International" in Cuba, which it said is serving as the base for Red "infiltration, subversion and ultimate conquest of the Americas."

Other Council Actions

The stress on domestic economic problems and the international crisis topped a series of council actions which included:

● Urging the President to consider an AFL-CIO-supported proposal for clearing essential cargoes to protect the national health and safety during the maritime strike, rather than using a Taft-Hartley injunction forcing the workers back to the ships.

● Hearing Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg bring thanks from Kennedy for AFL-CIO support of the Administration's legislative program and express his own hopes for a continuation of the "fruitful partnership" between the Administration and labor in the public interest.

● Discussing a report on organizing by John W. Livingston, director of organization, and deciding that the next meeting of the AFL-CIO General Board will consider organizing problems "in some depth." Meany told reporters that there has been "more real organizing activity" in the last few months than in quite a long time and more indications of success in the South than in the past several years.

● Deciding to turn over to a special council subcommittee a memorandum on civil rights presented by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph for analysis and recommendations at the next meeting of the council. Meany explained that council members had not had the opportunity to read the long document and he hopes by the next meeting all members will have had a chance to examine the memorandum.

● Calling on the federation's officers to help the Virginia AFL-CIO with problems arising from arrangements for the group's convention under circumstances which Randolph charged were discriminatory. Meany termed the situation "very difficult," pointing out that it has been in existence for many years. He said Randolph's request for suspension of the state body would not be used in light of the council's approach.

In its economic statement, the council declared that the ability of the labor movement to maintain and "even increase wages has been an indispensable element in softening the impact and shortening the duration of every recession since World War II."

There is no automatic relationship between higher wages and higher prices, the council asserted.

"Wage increases that flow from our productive genius, our technological progress, need not and should not push prices upward," the Council said. "On the contrary, it was through the process of higher wages and lower prices that our great industrial society reached its highest peaks of development."

The AFL-CIO has recognized, the council said, "for a longer time than many other segments of American society that the overriding issue of this era is the contest between democracy and Communist totalitarianism."

'Indispensable Weapon'

"But we repeat what we have said many times before—our most indispensable weapon in that contest is a healthy, growing economy here at home," it maintained.

The statement reviewed the movements of the various economic indicators showing that consumer prices have risen an average of only 1 percent a year since mid-1958; that wages in recent years have risen at a less than normal rate; that corporate profits remained high even during the recession; that an increasing share of national income is flowing into the hands of the upper fifth of the population at the expense of the lower fifth.

Noting the "number of important preliminary steps" toward real recovery taken or in process by the Administration and Congress, the council said "much more needs to be done this year." It called again for a public works program to stimulate $1 billion in quick-starting, short-term projects already planned by state and local governments; an immediate cut in the withholding tax; more vigorous efforts to reduce long-term interest rates.

The council concluded that anything less than full recovery is "intolerable to us at home and perilous to the cause of democracy everywhere."

In addition to the talk by Goldberg, the council heard Leon Keyserling in an analysis of the economic situation. Keyserling represents the Conference for Economic Progress and is a former chairman of the presidential Council of Economic Advisers.

It heard also a report on the work of the Afro-Asian Institute in Israel, supported by the AFL-CIO, from its director, Eliahu Elath, and received a report on the recent Kennedy-Khrushchev sessions in Vienna and the situation in Germany from AFL-CIO-sponsored newscaster Edward P. Morgan.

ination, the developments in Cuba and Laos and Communist attempts to paralyze the United Nations. It traced the development of the Soviet "troika" veto strategy and its application in the discussions aimed at banning further nuclear bomb tests. This veto demand is a "final and insuperable obstacle" to a test-ban treaty, the council declared.

The council called on the government for the following measures to arouse the free world and the American people:

● Act immediately to alert the nation to the gravity of the crisis and strengthen the "capacity for national defense in all possible emergencies."

● Strengthen the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and expand political, economic and scientific cooperation among its members.

● Request Congress "to grant the President full emergency power for mobilizing promptly all resources" required to meet "any eventuality."

● Seek to have Britain and France join the U.S. in rejecting the Soviet's latest ultimatum on Berlin and pledge reunification in freedom for Berlin and Germany.

● Call for supporting action by all other NATO powers.

● Launch an extensive U.S. Information Agency program "to enlighten the people" on both sides of the Iron Curtain about the crisis over Berlin.

● Appeal to the American people and the entire world in behalf of Kennedy's declaration that "our country may soon be forced to resume testing." The council further proposed that "when our government does resume such tests, it should notify the UN about any blasts before triggering them and should call upon Moscow to do likewise."

● Appoint a special presidential commission, including trade union representation, to survey and recommend elimination of government and private policies "which have tended to help the Communist bloc alleviate or overcome its own serious economic and political difficulties."

The council said Mansfield's proposal would "undermine the security of West Berlin and open the city to Communist subversion."

Queried on the recommendation on testing of nuclear bombs, Meany replied that he personally sees "no alternative" but to resume testing in light of the Soviet position. Otherwise, he added, the Soviet Union can open up a "tremendous gap" over the U.S.

On foreign economic aid, the council declared that the most "restrictive feature" of the program in the past has been the method of financing and the failure to authorize long-term commitments.

The council urged the U.S. to take the lead by enacting a program along the following lines:

● Unified administration by a single agency.

● Programs carefully tailored to the requirements and potentialities of each country.

● Long-term planning and financing.

● Special emphasis on long-term, low-interest loans for economic development.

● Encouragement to recipient nations to mobilize their own resources, make necessary social and economic reforms and engage in long-range planning.

● Encourage other advanced nations to join with the U.S. in contributing to the economic betterment of less developed countries.

● Separation of military from economic assistance. Economic aid should be determined and financed on its own merits without confusion with the separate role of military aid.

Kennedy Hails Labor In Letter to Council

Unity House, Pa.—Pres. Kennedy told the AFL-CIO Executive Council here that the support the trade union movement "has historically given to our foreign policy is one of the greatest satisfactions and strengths of our democratic government."

In a letter to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, brought here by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, Kennedy declared that in his recent meetings with heads of state, including Khrushchev, the knowledge that the trade union movement supported the policies of the Administration "was a source of confidence."

Goldberg read the letter from the President at a brief press conference on his arrival here. He told Meany, sitting beside him at the press conference, that the Administration appreciated the AFL-CIO's "unfailing support" and that this Administration was extremely conscious of the value of a free trade union movement.

Meany responded that the AFL-CIO will support Kennedy in all of his programs designed to help keep America free.

Kennedy's letter said also that he "welcomed and appreciated the support" given by the labor movement to the depressed area, minimum wage and temporary unemployment compensation laws as well as the AFL-CIO's announced support of proposals still before Congress in the areas of compensation, training, housing, education, medical aid to the aged "and others intended to improve our national life."

Although "we have now emerged from the recession," he wrote there are many economic problems that will "demand our best efforts." He said also that "the ideal of full equality in American society is still unattained."

The President wrote that as the nation is moving toward an era of expanded economic growth, in an effort to "meet the demands of freedom in a gravely troubled world" there must be a "shared conviction that the national welfare is a matter of first concern."

Goldberg told reporters that the letter had been drafted before the Executive Council adopted, a day earlier, a strong statement on the international crisis pledging support for the Kennedy Administration programs.

Offers Personal Thanks

After meeting with the Executive Council, Goldberg told a press conference that he added his personal thanks to the AFL-CIO for its "fine support" of the Administration's program.

He noted that the people do not have a lobby in Washington on matters such as minimum wages, unemployment compensation, health care, and aid to education, except the labor movement and the Administration. This has been a "fruitful partnership," he said, and should prove valuable in helping secure passage of additional legislation in the public interest.

Queried on the unemployment outlook, he termed it a "very substantial and serious problem," although he believes that the nation has hit the bottom of the recession and is back on the road to recovery.

PICKET LINE INJURIES don't keep Mrs. Rita Sylvia (in wheel chair) and Mary Ross (on crutches) from rejoining their fellow strikers at the Peter Paul candy plant in Oakland, Calif. The American Bakery & Confectionary Workers charge the women were run down by a strikebreaker.

Consumer Aid Sought In Peter Paul Strike

Oakland, Calif.—The American Bakery & Confectionery Workers have asked consumers not to buy Peter Paul brands of candy until the company reinstates two workers whose dismissal sparked a walkout by union members here.

Sixty Peter Paul employes, mostly women, have been on strike since June 7, charging the reason for the dismissals was the fact that the fired workers were active union supporters. The union offered to arbitrate the dispute. The company refused.

The firings came after members of an unaffiliated local—the Peter Paul Employes Association—voted to affiliate with the ABC. The affiliation had been recommended by the executive board of the employes' association.

Management has refused to recognize the switch in affiliation and the ABC has filed unfair labor practice charges against it, alleging refusal to bargain and dismissals for union activities.

Candies manufactured at Peter Paul plants are sold under the trade names of Mounds, Almond Joy, Almond Clusters, Chiffon, Dreams, Walnettos, Choclettos and Coconettos.

The company operates three other manufacturing plants, all of which are non-union, the ABC reported.

The Oakland Central Labor Council, which has strongly supported the Peter Paul strikers, called on its members to back the consumer boycott.

"Whenever you go into a store that sells any of these candy bars, request that the person in charge remove them from the shelf or vending machine," the council suggested.

The union's picket line has included a striker in a wheel chair and one on crutches. Both women, the union says, were hit by a truck driven by a strikebreaker through the picket line. Damage suits totaling $400,000 have been filed against the company, the trucking firm and the driver as a result of the injuries.

UAW, Industry 'Big 3' Open Contract Talks

Detroit—The Auto Workers have opened negotiations with the the auto industry's "Big Three"—General Motors, Ford and Chrysler—on contracts covering almost 600,000 employes. Present agreements expire Aug. 31.

At the opening meeting with GM, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther said the union is "not looking for a fight, but for social justice.

"Our attitude is one of complete flexibility," he said, warning employers that "if we fail to solve our problems by voluntary agreement at this table, we may have to face the prospect" of having them solved by government compulsion.

The union presented a 16-page summary of its bargaining goals. It outlined worker problems, and called on the industry to join with the UAW in working out solutions.

Vice Pres. Louis G. Seaton, GM spokesman, said he is willing to "work out a new agreement through free collective bargaining" and is prepared to "work hard to reach a peaceful settlement fair to all."

At the start of Ford negotiations, a company official asserted that "continual government intervention could mean the end of free collective bargaining in this country."

The union's goals in bargaining, arrived at in a special bargaining convention in April, emphasize jobs for the industry's unemployed workers and greater security for the employed.

Delegates at that time adopted a program to achieve these objectives by doing one or more of these things: reducing work time, improving wages and other economic benefits, putting hourly workers on weekly wages, retraining displaced workers, higher and earlier pensions, better health care plans for workers and their families.

The convention suggested that bargainers call on industry to create an automation fund to pay the cost of relocating workers and their families, and to maintain them during retraining, as one method of meeting the problem of a declining number of employes in "blue collar" fields.

3 Confessed Labor Spies Admit 'Fingering' Unionists

Portland, Ore.—Three confessed labor spies have told a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner here that they were sent by a Portland detective agency to report on pro-union sentiment among employes of two Harvey Aluminum plants.

Another former employe of the Wallace Detective Agency testified that he had sold the "confidential" services of the agency to the aluminum firm after an interview during which he was asked if the detective agency could "ferret out" union supporters.

A fifth witness, the head of the detective agency, denied the charge of labor spying and claimed his operatives were at the plants merely to catch pilferers. Harvey Aluminum witnesses are scheduled to testify during the second stage of the trial examiner's hearing, to be held in Los Angeles on July 10.

The detective agency, the company and a subsidiary firm were named in an NLRB unfair labor practices complaint based on charges by the Steelworkers of illegal spying on workers and dismissal of employes for union activity.

Earlier this year, acting on two prior unfair labor practice charges brought by the USWA, the NLRB ordered the company to stop photographing employes who accepted handbills passed out by union organizers and directed the reinstatement with back pay of three fired employes.

One of the three ordered reinstated was a supervisor who was found to have been dismissed because he refused to participate in the firing of a union supporter on trumped-up charges. The labor board also set aside a 1959 representation election lost by the union on the basis of the company's unfair labor practices.

Illegal Activities Charged

The current hearing on the labor spy charge involves alleged illegal activities at Harvey Aluminum plants at The Dalles, Ore., and Torrance, Calif., beginning in July 1960.

One detective agent, Richard W. Moore, told Trial Examiner Martin Bennett that he made $3 an hour while working at the Harvey plant at The Dalles—$1.85 paid by Harvey and $1.15 paid by the Wallace agency.

During this period, he said, he turned in the names of 20 to 25 "pro-union" workers.

Moore testified that he had been offered $500 by an official of the detective agency if he would "cooperate" during the hearing. The offer was made, he said, after the hearing had begun and while he was under subpena to testify.

The witness repudiated an earlier affidavit he signed denying that he had been ordered to do labor spying. He said the affidavit had been given him by Wallace Ummel, head of the detective agency, and he signed it because he thought it would help him keep his job.

A similar affidavit was likewise repudiated by Calvin Davis, who testified that he had turned in the names of 20 union supporters at the Torrance plant and 11 at The Dalles.

Received Checks

Davis told the trial examiner that he had received two checks totaling $350 from the detective agency and later was given $300 by a USWA representative who, he said, merely asked him to "tell the truth."

A third detective agency employe, Stanley R. Hahn, said he reported 36 union supporters at The Dalles plant. Hahn said he had worked for the detective agency as a guard at the Oregonian, one of two Portland newspapers struck by the printing trades and Newspaper Guild, before going on his labor spy assignment.

The Wallace agency operatives testified that they had gathered their information on employes in bars and restaurants as well as through on-the-job contacts.

Oil Workers Strike at 4 Sinclair Operations

Four Sinclair Oil Corp. refineries have been shut down by an Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers' strike involving 6,000 employes at East Chicago, Ind., Corpus Christi and Houston, Tex., and Marcus Hook, Pa.

Another 3,000 employes continued to work without a contract but are in a position to vote for a strike. They are refinery workers at Sinclair, Wyo., and hourly rated U.S. employes in field production of crude petroleum and in pipeline transportation.

Two small refineries remained in operation—the one at Sinclair, Wyo., and one at Hartford, Ill., represented by other unions.

The OCAW said 9,000 workers had been covered by a master agreement which expired June 14 but was extended to June 16 when negotiations collapsed. Refinery workers walked out to join picket lines set up previously by the Maritime Union, on strike against Sinclair tankers.

Severance pay for laid-off employes is the principal issue in dispute. The union seeks severance at the rate of one week's wages for each year of service. Management offered no improvement over former contract provisions—a maximum of four weeks for employes with 10 years of service, lesser amounts for newer employes.

OCAW Vice Pres. B. J. Schafer, heading the union negotiators, said the members' need for severance pay is "critical."

The union has "good reason to believe" that a large number of Sinclair employes will lose their jobs because of automation within a few months, he said, adding that "if Sinclair can spend millions for new machinery" it can "spend a few thousands to provide a cushion for the people they will toss out" on the street.

Several hundred white collar workers also will be affected by any severance pay agreement the OCAW can obtain though the union does not represent them, Schafer said.

In recent years the company has paid severance to some but not all of the "several thousand people it has laid off," Schafer said in underlining the Oil Workers' struggle for payment of the layoff benefit "to all employes" instead of allowing the company the privilege of "picking and choosing" a selected number.

Walkout Wins Pact, Saves Jobs for 200

Rochester, N. Y.—A two-week strike by members of Clothing Workers' Local 234 has led to a new three-year contract with the Rochester Button Co. here and the company announced abandonment of earlier plans to shut down its operations.

After the signing, management and union representatives issued a statement saying the firm has agreed to keep its plants in Rochester and nearby Akron, N. Y., operating on a full-time basis.

ACWA Vice Pres. Abraham Chatman, manager of the Rochester Joint Board, said the union's success is an "excellent example" of how the ACWA can prevent firms from "running away" to other areas. He praised the "spirit and determination" of the firm's 200 employes in supporting the union's efforts to keep the plants here and win a new contract.

Early in June the union charged management with bad faith in negotiating and struck the plants. The company, in business here for 50 years, followed with threats to close permanently. Its offer to set up a $100,000 fund for ACWA members if the union would agree to an "orderly shutdown" over a period of six months to a year was rejected.

Both sides resumed negotiations and reached an agreement which reopened the plants and sent the strikers back to work.

Back-Door 'Work' Law Try Beaten

Montpelier, Vt. — A back-door attempt to enact a so-called "right-to-work" law here has been defeated by a 147-to-67 vote in the Vermont House of Representatives.

Supporters of legislation to ban union shop agreements tried unsuccessfully to tack a "right-to-work" amendment on a labor-backed Fair Employment Practices bill which was before the House. When the amendment failed, most of them voted against the basic FEPC bill, helping defeat it by 105 to 86.

The attempt to clear "right-to-work" through amendment of the fair employment bill came after the deadline for introduction of new legislation had passed with no "work" bill having been introduced.

"Right-to-work" groups have been active in the state, but the vote on the amendment showed them to have less strength in the House than in the 1959 session of the legislature. At that time, the vote against a "work" bill was 136-to-93.

State AFL-CIO officials said the stand taken by Gov. F. Ray Keyser, Jr. (R), against such a measure helped swing votes in the heavily-Republican legislature. The governor called a special news conference to voice his opposition to the "work" proposal.

Boomerang on Coast:

Doctors Fight AMA Stand on Health Bill

San Francisco—A series of radio announcements has boomeranged on the American Medical Association and has set off a vigorous campaign, led by doctors, to organize support for the AMA-opposed Anderson-King bill to provide health care for the aged through social security.

The AMA radio spots used a doctor—or an actor posing as a doctor—to make the claim that he had never seen an old person denied medical care because he could not afford it.

Angered by the AMA testimonials, a group of Stanford University medical men set out to do something about it. With the help of some of their Palo Alto neighbors, they launched a committee which, in three hectic weeks, has burst the bounds of Palo Alto and spread to other parts of the Bay Area and beyond into many corners of northern California.

One of the men who heard the radio announcements was Leonard Herzenberg, assistant professor of genetics at the Stanford University School of Medicine. Another was Dr. Robert Mishell, Stanford medical resident at a nearby Veterans Administration hospital. They enlisted the help of Dr. Philip R. Lee of the Palo Alto Clinic and of the Stanford medical school.

Together they won the endorsement of some of their colleagues and neighbors and formed the Bay Area Committee for Medical Aid to the Aged Through Social Security. The committee launched its own series of radio announcements urging immediate action in support of the Anderson-King bill, published a concise fact sheet on medical needs of the aged, and sponsored a public meeting.

One of the prominent figures supporting the activity has been Dr. Russell Lee, a member of the Truman commission that made the historic study of the nation's health needs and founder of the Palo Alto Clinic which, in the 1930s, was labeled a "little soviet" by organized doctors fighting group practice.

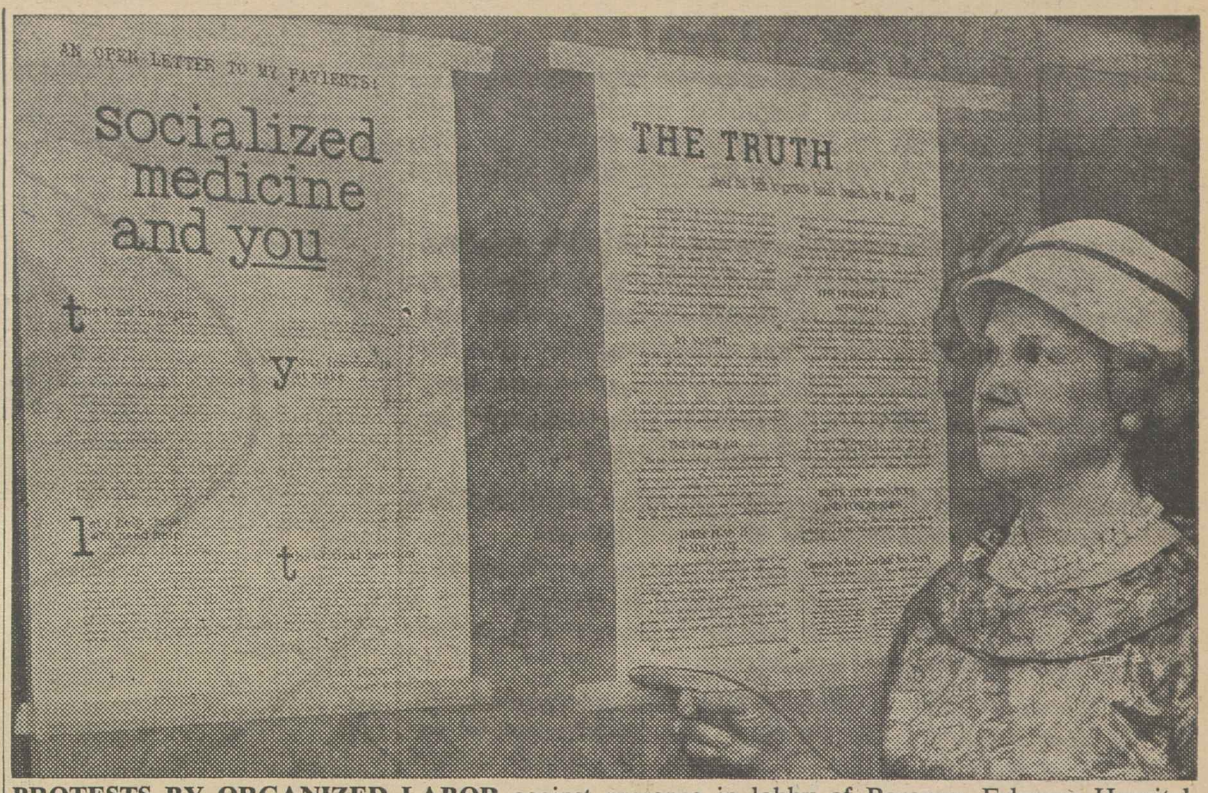
Interest was so widespread and immediate, Dr. Philip Lee said, that the committee almost immediately changed the "Bay Area" in its title to "Northern California." Phone calls and letters poured in, many of them expressing, as he put it, "surprise and relief" that doctors are willing to support the bill.

The committee has vigorously challenged the AMA's "socialized medicine" label for the bill, and has hit the present Kerr-Mills Act as inadequate and designed, Dr. Philip Lee said, to demean poverty-stricken oldsters and defray no more than 10 percent of the acknowledged cost of aged medical care.

The committee fact sheet describes the Anderson-King bill as intended "to meet a common human need, with simplicity and with respect for the individual." The committee offers the services of many authorities in answering questions relevant to medical care for the aged. The committee can be reached at P. O. Box 11552, Station A, Palo Alto, Calif.

Meantime it has issued a letter seeking the support of labor, civic, clerical, and other community leaders and encouraging formation of similar groups in local communities.

It expects, too, through professional contacts, to stimulate interest and support in medical schools throughout the country and, through them, in many of the nation's cities.



PROTESTS BY ORGANIZED LABOR against presence in lobby of Baroness Erlanger Hospital, Chattanooga, Tenn., of American Medical Association propaganda blast against health care for the aged under social security (left) forced hospital authorities to permit display of answer to medical association attack. Mrs. Charles Crable, chairman of citizens' Committee for Medical Care Under Social Security, examines the two posters.

New Poster Answers Health Care Attack

Chattanooga, Tenn.—Organized labor has won "equal space" at the tax-supported Baroness Erlanger Hospital here to answer an American Medical Association propaganda assault on financing health care for the aged through social security.

Hospital authorities, who refused to remove from the lobby an AMA poster branding the Administration-supported Anderson-King bill "socialized medicine," yielded to the Chattanooga Labor Council's plea for the right to post an answer setting out the position of proponents of the legislation.

The medical lobby's poster, prepared by the AMA as part of its multi-million-dollar propaganda drive and signed by the Chattanooga-Hamilton County Medical Society, charged that the labor-backed health bill would "inject the federal government into the privacy of the examination room" and would give the government "control over standards of practice and the choice of doctors."

The reply—prepared by the Committee for Medical Care Under Social Security, a citizens' group with which the central labor body is affiliated—made it clear that the Anderson-King bill "specifically guarantees that the government would in no way control, regulate or interfere with the practice of medicine."

CLC Sec.-Treas. W. M. Smith had recorded labor's opposition to the AMA poster, denouncing it as "grossly misleading" and "false," and had told hospital authorities that it was "inconsistent" for an institution supported by federal, state and local tax monies to have its facilities used to brand the health care legislation as "socialistic."

More than $5 million in tax funds have gone into three major construction projects to enlarge the facilities of Baroness Erlanger Hospital. Of this amount, more than $2.3 million came from federal grants under the Hill-Burton Act; $500,000 came from the State of Tennessee; and $2.2 million was raised through the sale of city and county bonds.

Fire Fighters Board Meets At Harvard

Cambridge, Mass. — The Fire Fighters executive board took part in a week-long work-and-study session here, combining a regular board meeting with lectures and discussions led by five Harvard professors and a prominent Canadian economist.

In morning and evening sessions, the 17 board members heard university experts in fields such as labor law, arbitration, public relations, job evaluation, public speaking and bargaining techniques. Afternoons and remaining evenings were devoted to formal executive board sessions.

The program, developed in cooperation with Joseph O'Donnell, director of the Harvard University Trade Union Program, included discussions led by John T. Dunlop, James Healy, Robert Livernash, Robert Segal and Ross Atwood of the Harvard University faculty and Dr. Eric Taylor of Canada.

Fire Fighters Pres. William D. Buck described the program as "stimulating and useful."

In its regular board meeting, the union reiterated its opposition to consolidation of police and fire departments in municipalities and directed a continued campaign for repeal of a 1959 North Carolina law prohibiting fire fighters from belonging to a union.

Doherty Warns CWA Convention on 'Neolithic Opposition' to Automation

By Willard Shelton

Kansas City, Mo.—It would be "foolish" for American workers to "assume a neolithic position of opposition" to the new machines of automation, but unions can help make sure that automation "moves in the right direction—and that we move with it."

This was the theme of Letter Carriers' Pres. William C. Doherty before the 23rd convention of the Communications Workers here. Pointing out that workers in the telephone industry and in the post office service operate in a field of common interest—that of free communications—Doherty told the convention that in the long run he was certain automation would require more workers rather than fewer.

Problems More Complicated

Problems created by automation are more complicated now than in the past, Doherty said, and he endorsed CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne's statement that the objective is to make sure that workers "share" in the benefits to society rather than bear alone the burden of temporary difficulties.

The Letter Carriers' president told the delegates that efforts at automating post offices so far had "made some of the postal jobs less tiresome and less onerous," but that in every case he knew of had resulted in the creation of "not fewer jobs, but more jobs."

Doherty saluted the cooperation of the two unions in the international field, including their cooperation in helping strengthen free unions in Latin America. Both CWA and the Letter Carriers are members of the Postal, Telephone & Telegraph Intl., the organization of free trade unions in the communications industry.

The convention devoted major time to the distribution of Committee on Political Education awards to locals that had met or surpassed their quotas and to planning intensified future political activity.

COPE Awards Presented

Vice Pres. John Crull presented the convention's award to CWA Dist. 8, the locals of which contributed 132.5 percent of their quota of voluntary COPE contributions. Dist. 5 received a parallel award for the highest percentage of actual dollars given in COPE funds.

Deputy Dir. Al Barkan of the national Committee on Political Education reminded the delegates that every dollar given by CWA members "went back into the field on behalf of COPE-endorsed political candidates," and that not a penny went to pay anyone's salary or operating expenses.

COPE funds aided Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) to survive a massive attack on him last year in the Democratic primary by "the drug companies, the electric companies, the American Medical Association," Barkan declared.

He named Sen. Quentin Burdick (D-N. D.) and members of the House in key congressional districts as others who had been aided by COPE funds.

Warning that enemies of labor were on the attack in Congress and state legislatures, Barkan asserted that unions must intensify their efforts rather than relax them in the political and legislative fields.

Legislation Stressed

In a series of resolutions, the convention endorsed stepped-up political education and particularly stressed the importance of "legislative follow-through" to seek effective action on programs supported by the union.

A resolution on economic affairs warned that the nation is still in "serious trouble" because of joblessness despite the apparent increase in economic activity.

The convention called for elimination of the federal excise tax on local telephone service, terming the levy a "luxury sales tax on an essential service."

Ralph McGill Receives Race Relations Award

New York—A Georgia publisher, winner of the Better Race Relations Award of Hotel & Restaurant Employes Local 6, has charged that the "real agitators" in the South are not the Freedom Riders but the states that invoke laws which "have been declared unconstitutional . . . wherever they have been tested."

Ralph McGill, publisher of the Atlanta Constitution and a nationally-syndicated columnist, was honored by the 27,000-member local "for the effectiveness with which he, as a southerner, has used his creative talent to advance the cause of equality."

McGill warned that areas which try "to keep the past upon its throne . . . will deteriorate in income, population and education." He added that "the states which act responsibly will profit materially and spiritually."

Resort to mob violence, McGill said, is "evidence that those who defy the processes of law realize that the ball game is about over—and that they are losing it."

Within the South, he reminded the audience, "there are many brave and honorable people who are standing against violence and idiocy and intellectual dishonesty which is so often used to rationalize injustice."

McGill was chosen for the Local 6 award through a post card poll of the union's membership. Five nominees were proposed by a board which included former recipients of the award. The rank-and-file ballots, the union reported, gave McGill "an overwhelming majority."

Bitter Fruits

AFTER TWO YEARS of study a unique tripartite committee set up under a collective bargaining agreement to suggest solutions to the problem of job displacement created by automation has reported that "bargaining by itself cannot fully solve these problems."

The answer, said the committee composed of public members and company and union members in the meat packing industry, is adequate economic growth to absorb displaced workers and newcomers to the labor force. The committee called also for legislative action in the retraining, unemployment compensation, employment service and other job areas to help workers hit by plant closings and new machinery and equipment.

The study indicated that automation hits hardest at unskilled and semi-skilled workers and members of minority groups.

The unions—the Meat Cutters and the Packinghouse Workers—were critical of the committee's opposition to proposals for a shorter workweek without loss of take-home pay as an "economic imperative" to achieving full employment.

This report, a concerted effort by labor and management with the aid of outstanding public figures to propose solutions to one of the major problems of the Sixties, reveals the broad national scope of the difficulties created by automation.

These difficulties require national solutions, with first priority given to restoring the nation's economic health and creating policies that will allow healthy and vigorous growth.

A national policy on a shorter workweek must also be given a top priority along with measures designed to aid displaced and down-graded workers.

In this approach collective bargaining can make its contribution to a peaceful, orderly transition to the new technology that eventually will spell progress for America. But unless the workers and the public as well as the companies share in this progress, the fruits of automation will be bitter.

Independence Day

WE AMERICANS HAVE GROWN more sophisticated than our grandfathers, who greeted each Fourth of July with lethal firecrackers and chest-beating oratory. Flaunting the power and glory of the Republic may have become a little old-fashioned in some circles, like ice boxes and circus parades.

Down underneath, this greatest national holiday means as much to us as ever—even more, perhaps, in this era when liberty is on the defensive throughout the world for the first time since 1776.

The principles so nobly stated by Jefferson remain as the best hope of mankind; the revolution they heralded will never end while people anywhere are still enslaved. Human freedom is our cause, and our dedication to it will never falter.

It is ingrained in us; without it, as a nation, we are doomed. While we have it, the fight our forefathers put up to gain it is never far out of our minds, and there is, perhaps, more than we sometimes realize, a sober readiness to fight for it if we have to.

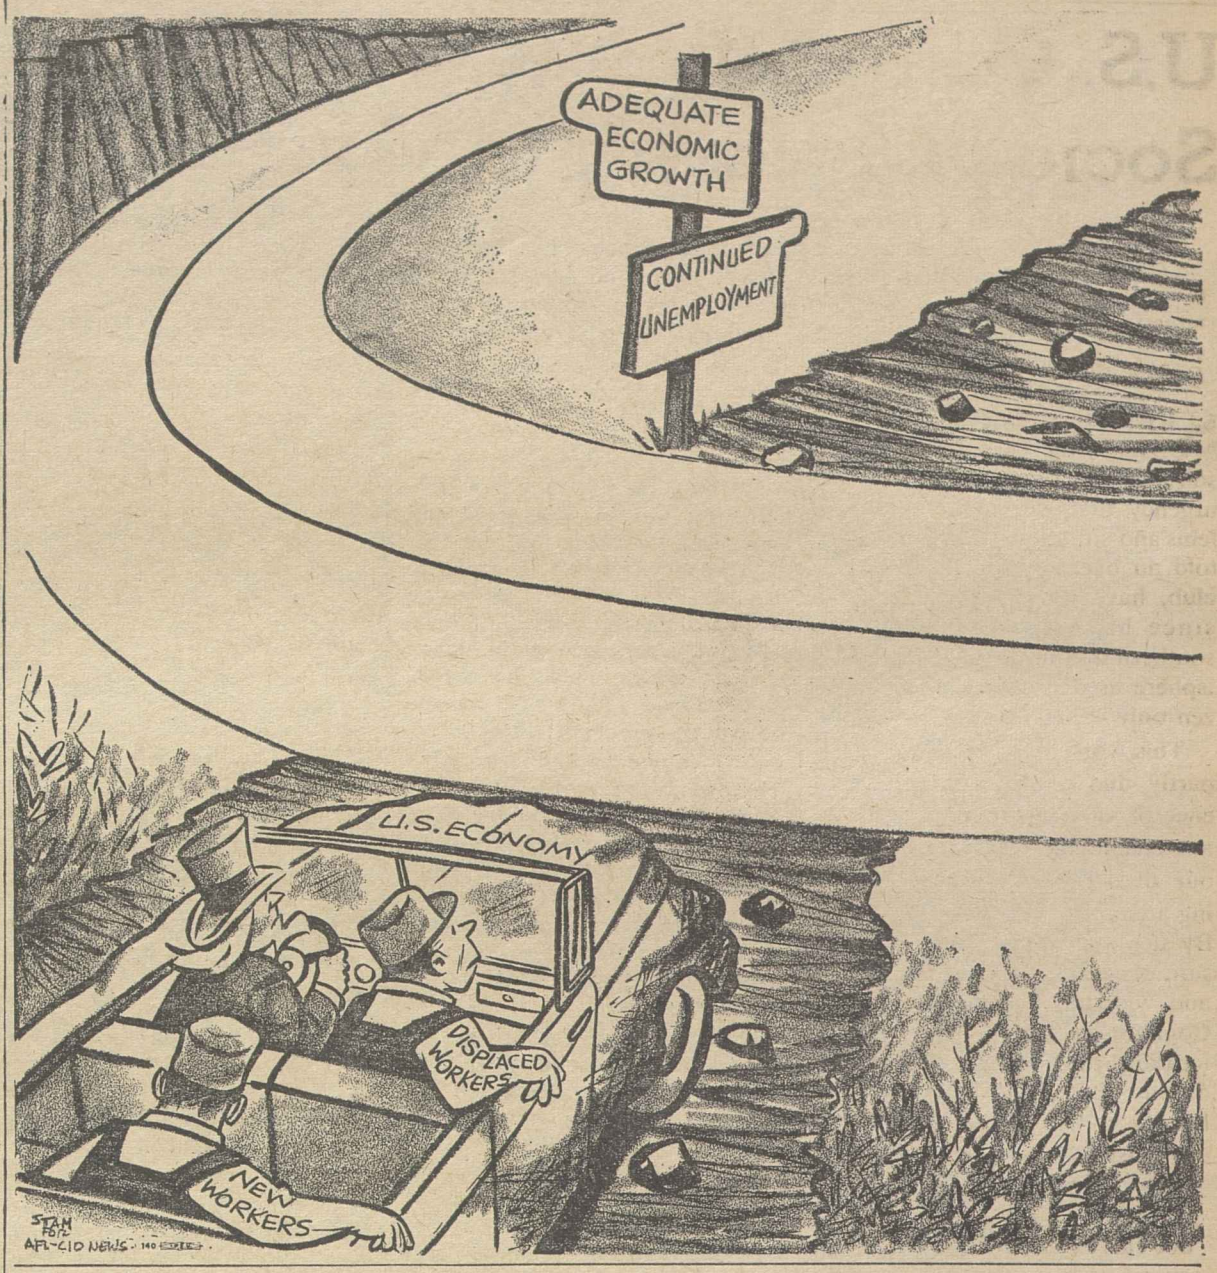
Crossroads



Prime Minister Says:

Private Enterprise in Sweden Paralleled by Public Services

Excerpts are given below from a recent speech by Prime Minister Tage Erlander of Sweden before the National Press Club, Washington, D. C.

By Tage Erlander

THERE IS NO CONFLICT between an expanding public sector and a dynamic and flourishing industry. On the contrary, they support and supplement each other. More than 90 percent of Swedish industry is in private hands. Its success depends greatly on services and facilities provided by national and local government. It depends on facilities for education, and active labor market policy, transport facilities such as roads, railways, harbors, airports, etc. Growing industrial development demands a rapidly increasing supply of electric energy, it needs good housing and medical care.

Traditionally these are fields where the government has long played a leading role in Sweden.

Furthermore, with a rising standard of living, people tend to demand relatively more from the public sector. They want better education for their children and they want public roads for their private cars. A government that wants to meet the hopes and wishes of the citizens must take the consequences of the citizens' own planning. In the present stage of development of our society this means a rapid expansion of the public sector.

This expansion which is and certainly will remain a major aim of our economic policy has thus a two-fold purpose: To stimulate industrial development and to meet the actual and urgent demands of our citizens. Let me briefly give you one example of how we try to approach this problem.

Take a man who is laid off from his job. This creates two problems. The total economy has lost a production factor, the man's work. The man has lost his means to keep himself and the family alive. Three alternatives are offered. One is to do nothing and leave it to the man's own initiative, which may or may not be effective. The second is to pay him unemployment compensation, which helps him but not the total economy. The third way is to assist him to regain his usefulness. This can be done either by helping him to move or by retraining him or by doing both of these things. This gives back the production factor to society and the means of support to the man.

We have tried the last method and have found that it works. It limits nobody's freedom, and it means an investment in production.

Or take what you call socialized medicine in Sweden, that is our compulsory health insurance. A Swedish physician may be, according to his own choice, self-employed or government employed. Even if he is government employed he may have a private practice on a part-time basis. A patient has a free choice of doctor and he can go to a private or a public hospital. The self-employed doctor and the private hospital set their own rates.

The insurance system pays all the patient's expenses while he is in a public hospital. For care outside a hospital the patients gets from his insurance three-quarters of a government-employed doctor's fees. A patient who prefers a private doctor or a private hospital gets exactly the same amount of money. If that means additional costs, the patient has to meet them himself.

IN ESSENCE this means that our system is comparable with your Blue Cross and Blue Shield, only that our membership is compulsory and the premiums are paid on the tax bill.

I do not know how to measure the efficiency of health care, but I can say that our infant mortality is by far the lowest in the world and our life expectancy is among the highest.

I am fully aware that some people fear that the increase in government influence implies a serious threat to personal freedom and may impair private initiative and responsibility.

But I wonder whether these fears are not exaggerated. We believe that increased security is in fact a way to enlarge the freedom of choice, to open new possibilities for everybody to build his future according to his own wishes. It is our concept of an open society.

Countries have different traditions, different means to realize their objectives. It is deeply rooted in the Swedish tradition and experience to regard the state as an instrument of cooperation between individual human beings. We have found that it is often more rational and more just to solve in cooperation the problems that are too large for the individual to solve by himself. Ours is a very pragmatic approach. But it is sustained by our faith in the ideals of cooperation and solidarity in a society of free men.

Morgan Says:

U.S. Can't Afford to Disregard Social 'Explosion' in Americas

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

SINCE HIS RETURN from a tour of South America, there has been in Adlai Stevenson's reports, public and private, a sense of urgency that we cannot afford to ignore. Problems and situations, the American UN Ambassador told an overflow luncheon at the National Press club, have grown worse since his visit to the southern half of the hemisphere as a private citizen only 15 months ago.

Morgan

This worsening is only partly due to the existence of an infernal nuisance named Castro or to our disastrously damaging attempt to do him in. By stepping up the pressure of their propaganda and widening the front of their infiltration, the Communists admittedly have hastened the deterioration, have increased the flammability of conditions. But the problem of Latin America would have been there in all its depth without Castro or a single agent from Moscow or Peiping.

For Latin America is exploding with social revolution which Communism exploits but did not cause. Indeed we came closer to causing it ourselves by a combination of short-sightedness and selfishness. In the past Americans and their government failed to realize that poverty, ignorance and injustice are not ingredients of stability and that exploitative enterprise by private capital is not a sound substitute for national policy.

As a matter of fact we may be luckier than we deserve to be. In an article in the July issue of Harper's magazine, a business consultant with much experience in Latin America, Peter F. Drucker, makes the interesting argument that Cuba's "fidelista" revolution might have already spread to other parts of the hemisphere, to Venezuela, Peru, Equador and perhaps Mexico, if it had not been for Fidel Castro himself.

"His strutting, his oppression of the middle class, and his suppression of all liberties," Drucker writes, " . . . above all, his clumsy interference in other Latin American countries—lost him a good many of his earlier admirers, including even many pro-Communists."

BUT NOW WHAT the Latin American crisis boils down to in crude terms is a struggle between Communists and us for control of its social revolution. Presumably we have learned our lesson and we are not seeking to dominate it but to keep it from domination. We've got our work cut out for us and we are starting late. Stevenson spoke of encountering a variety of do-it-yourself kits, of sorts, in paper-back books printed in Communist China. One subject: How to become a guerrilla fighter. Another: How to overturn the Catholic Church. In Brazil ambitious students find it almost impossible to study abroad; it's too expensive. But the Chinese have just offered them 100 scholarships.

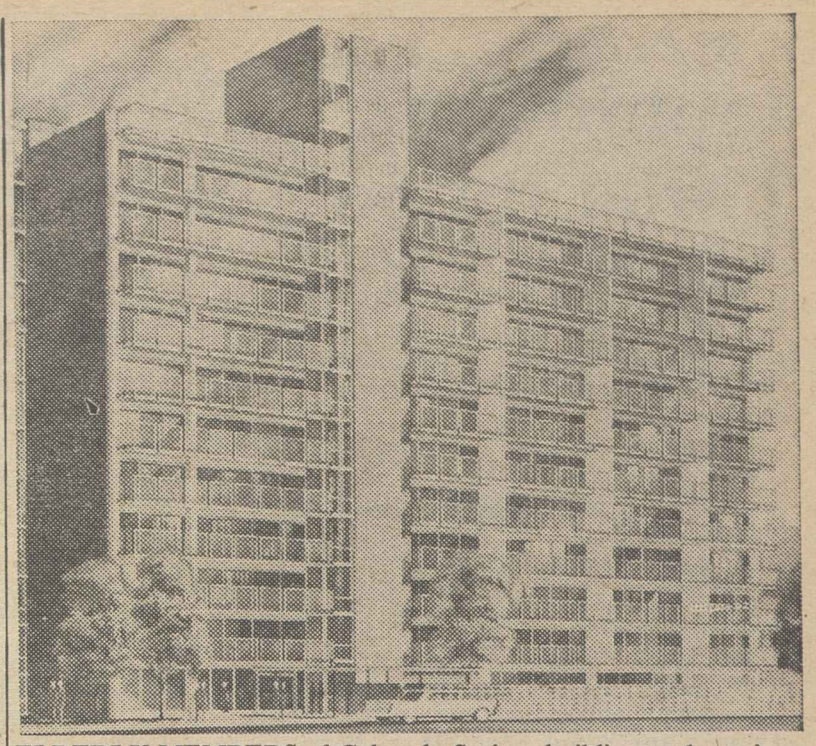
Nevertheless Stevenson found genuine enthusiasm for the Kennedy Alliance for Progress program, the long-term aid plan for which Congress has already approved the first $600 million. The dangers and the difficulties here, however, are vast. This is not just another foreign aid package, this is a bold experiment in financing social revolution. It cannot succeed unless Latin leaders come through with genuine reforms—in collecting taxes, distributing land, in mass housing projects, in squeezing out graft, cutting down red tape and in making the military toe the line.

In Montevideo, Uruguay, this summer the ecomic ministers of the Latin republics are supposed to come up with their respective plans for social reform. Then, hopefully, a kind of inter-American priority board will be established to select projects to concentrate on and allot funds for them from the central aid pool—somewhat like the way a body in Paris, the OEEC—Organization for European Economic Cooperation—helped engineer Europe's recovery under the Marshall Plan.

We can't just sit back, though, and expect that miracle to be repeated as long as we keep checkbook in hand. In the first place, the Marshall Plan was geared to repair the wounds of war in a society already highly industrialized. In Latin America, industrialization must be created, almost from the ground up. In the second place, bureaucracies need constant goading and prodding and even then they are slow to act.

After four separate sets of reports and/or surveys stretching back to February when the fresh Kennedy Administration was talking about food for peace and other projects with such spirit, not one grain of such food has yet reached the vast area of northeast Brazil where U.S. and Brazilian officials agreed it was needed.

If the whole picture of Latin American upheaval is as urgently in need of attention as Adlai Stevenson says it is, and there is every turbulent indication that it is, the Alliance for Progress can do without a manana spirit.



ELDERLY MEMBERS of Colorado Springs building trades unions will get priority in renting suites in this projected $1.4 million apartment house for the elderly in the Colorado city, shown in architect's sketch. Ten unions have formed a non-profit corporation and will operate the Building Trades Council Apartments. Each of the 120 suites will have a lanai-type balcony. Glass panels around the building top enclose a roof garden which will have a view of the Rocky Mountains.

Union Locals to Build Apartment for Elderly

Colorado Springs—Ten buildings trades business agents and an attorney are trustees of a corporation which will own and manage a projected $1.4 million non-profit housing enterprise here for "senior citizens."

The corporation is Colorado Springs Building & Construction Trades Housing, Inc. The housing enterprise, first of its kind in this part of the country, is an 11-story apartment building on E. Kiowa Street here.

F. L. Davis, local contractor, has been awarded a contract to build 120 suites for rental to persons 62 years old or older.

The building will cost approximately $1 million, plus the cost of land, furnishings and equipment. The project is being financed on a long-term low-interest loan. Tenant applications are now being reviewed and priority will be given families of union members, the corporation has announced.

The building, to be called the Building Trades Council Apartments, will have a panoramic view of the Rocky Mountains from the top-floor roof garden and glassed-in solarium. Each apartment will have a lanai-type balcony.

Rents will range from $60 to $110 a month for buffet units, single bedroom and two bedroom apartments, including utilities. Each unit will have a furnished kitchen with refrigerator, built-in range and waste-disposal unit.

The building will have a community lounge, recreation and hobby rooms, automatic elevators, and automatic washers and dryers on every floor.

Business Manager Ed. R. Nelson of the Southern Colorado Building & Construction Trades Council, said a certificate of incorporation has been issued to the union sponsoring group and the Federal Housing Authority has approved an insured loan. Nelson is president of the corporation.

"Union representatives are devoting time and effort to this non-profit project," he said. "They believe that such a service to our elderly people deserves the unselfish efforts of all organized labor."

The entire building, naturally enough, will be constructed by union labor, the new corporation has said.

Utah State AFL-CIO To Convene Aug. 21

The annual convention of the Utah State AFL-CIO will be held Aug. 21-23 in Salt Lake City.

The time and place of the meeting were not available to the AFL-CIO News when the convention calendar for the remainder of the year was printed in the June 17 issue.

Washington Reports:

Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy Urged as Goal in Resumed Tests

THE UNITED STATES can avoid a propaganda burden when it resumes nuclear tests by devoting major attention to the development of peaceful uses of atomic energy with the Soviet Union invited to participate, Rep. Chet Holifield (D-Calif.), chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 450 radio stations.

Rep. James E. Van Zandt (R-Pa.), ranking GOP member of the committee, on the same program pointed out that one projected experiment, Project Plowshare, "involves the explosion of atomic power to develop harbors." "Agriculture, medicine and industry also would benefit from the new tests," he declared.

"Scientists believe they can explode nuclear power underground in Colorado where we have millions of tons of oil shale and boil out of the rocks millions of gallons of oil," Holifield added.

He said resumption of tests would also help develop a seismic means of detecting nuclear explosions so that the number of detection stations might be reduced to half as many.

"THIS SHOULD HELP remove one of the Soviet objections to the proposed inspection system," Holifield added. "Another factor is weapon safety. And if we could test types now on the drawing boards and in the laboratories, we might have a new weapon as revolutionary as the hydrogen bomb was in 1949."

Van Zandt pointed out that the projected tests would be carried out underground so that no danger of radiation and contamination would be involved.

Both panelists said they thought it would be "disastrous," to merge nuclear test talks with general disarmament negotiations as asked by the Soviet Union.

"I can't think of a more complicated and extensive field than that of disarmament," Holifield stated. "If we can't find a means of agreement on a comparatively simple question like nuclear power, then I say there is no hope of disarmament."

Van Zandt said that the United States should make every effort to continue the nuclear test ban talks at Geneva, even though the Russians refuse.

ATOMS FOR PEACE—This should be the major objective of any renewed nuclear tests by the United States—according to Rep. Chet Holifield (D-Calif.), chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, left, and Rep. James E. Van Zandt (R-Pa.), also on the committee, in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational radio program.

How to Buy:

Limitations of Health Insurance Force Buying of More Policies

By Sidney Margolius

CONTRARY TO THE OPINIONS of some newspapers which attack Blue Cross as now providing "too much" coverage, families often buy additional policies because their health insurance is too limited.

This department is always getting letters asking advice on mail-order offers of health insurance at what seem like low rates, sometimes even only $2 a month. You even can put some such policies in force by mailing a buck for two months' coverage.

For example, one Kansas City, Mo., company offers what it calls a "major accident" policy. This sounds something like a "major medical" policy. Of course, it is not. It covers only accidents. Another "hospital-confinement" policy starts paying only after the first $100 of expense, and also excludes any existing sickness or condition.

Interest in buying additional policies actually is symptomatic of a serious problem. "Multiple coverage" of health insurance represents an increasing expense to many families. Because many policies are inadequate to start with, salesmen for standard insurance companies, as well as the mail-order companies, have an opening to sell extra policies to supplement Blue Cross or other basic coverage.

The way to avoid such extra expense is to get the broadest policy available to start with. This department recently examined Blue Cross rates in a number of cities. In most, for a few pennies more you get much greater coverage. In Pittsburgh, for example, the Blue Cross plan insuring a family for up to 90 days of hospital care costs $10.40 a month. For 25 cents more you get 180 days of coverage. In Detroit, the 120-day coverage can be extended to 365 days for another dime a month.

Actually a family rarely needs this extra-long insurance. Rather than buy another "peace-of-mind" policy, you'll save by taking the bigger option in your basic insurance.

Keep in mind that a buck paid to you in the form of a non-taxable health insurance fringe benefit is more valuable than a cash dollar on which you have to pay 20 percent income tax.

The only time a supplementary policy may be warranted is if basic coverage is extremely limited, as in a few parts of the South where Blue Cross pays as little as $7 per day towards hospital care.

Moreover, individually-bought accident and health insurance policies are costly for what they provide. Because of high selling expenses, insurance companies usually return in benefits only about half the money they collect.

OFTEN THE SUPPLEMENTARY policy sold to families is a "major medical" policy. This is something like the deductible collision insurance sold for cars. You yourself pay the first $50 or $100 of a medical expense. Then the insurance pays 75 or 80 percent of the balance up to a pre-established limit.

Deductible insurance is a good idea for cars. You probably could pay the first $100 of damage to your car without going bankrupt. And eliminating small claims cuts costs so that auto insurance companies can keep down your rate. It can cost $25 in administrative expense to process a $25 claim.

Health insurance companies also consider the deductible a deterrent to "unneeded care."

However, the danger is that having no insurance for the initial medical bills may prove to be a deterrent to needed care. Whether someone should get care should be determined by medical authorities, not by insurance companies. In the long run, treating health insurance like car insurance may raise insurance costs, not lower them.

Another kind of supplementary insurance workers sometimes buy is "wage" insurance. This pays cash benefits if you're unable to work because of illness. But this is a costly type of insurance, and not even tax-deductible as is insurance which pays medical and hospital bills.

There's reason to suspect that some families may buy supplementary policies because they don't really know or understand their present coverage. In buying any health insurance, it's always important to compare: (1) costs; (2) the detailed benefit provisions and limitations of the policy (3) the record and status of the company. (Especially, consult your state insurance department before you buy a policy by mail. If the company isn't licensed in your state, your insurance department can't help you if you are treated unfairly.)

ILO Study Shows:

U.S. Lags Woefully In Social Security

FOR MANY YEARS most Americans have accepted social security as a civilized approach to easing the financial problem of growing old. Of late, however, a small but vocal chorus—devoted to the ideals of the 19th Century—has been preaching the philosophy that there is something sinister about federal programs for the aged and that in some mysterious way such programs threaten our freedoms.

If anyone is in the slightest degree frightened by this chorus, he owes it to himself to become familiar with a study just released by the Intl. Labor Oganization on the comparative cost of social security, country by country.

The study covers 41 countries and to even the casual reader, certain well-founded conclusions are immediately apparent:

- Practically every country in the world has some form of social security.
- Most countries have medical care programs, the product of legislation.
- The countries spending the largest percentage of their income on social welfare programs are the highly industrialized, progressive states of western Europe.
- The United States, which ranks 25th in the listing, is in step with such countries as Portugal and Panama.

It should be explained that the ILO study ranks as social security programs such things as sickness and unemployment insurance, pensions, family allowances, public health services and so on.

To be considered for inclusion in the ILO study, the program must have been set up by legislation and administered by a public, semi-public or autonomous body. Only a few Iron Curtain countries are included, since the ILO did not consider the statistical data made available by them as sufficient.

Here are the top 33 countries listed, with the percentages of national income spent on social security expenditures:

West Germany	20.0	Switzerland	8.2
France	17.9	Poland	7.7
Austria	14.8	Iceland	7.6
Italy	14.2	Israel	6.6
New Zealand	12.8	Panama	6.6
Sweden	12.5	Portugal	5.7
Finland	11.6	U. S. A.	5.7
Denmark	11.6	Japan	5.3
Netherlands	11.4	Tunisia	5.2
United Kingdom	11.4	South Africa	4.4
Ireland	10.8	Ceylon	4.1
Norway	9.9	Guatemala	2.9
Luxembourg	9.8	Turkey	1.2
Yugoslavia	9.5	Viet Nam	1.0
Australia	8.8	India	1.0
Canada	8.5	Taiwan	0.3
Chile	8.5

The ILO study is released at a time when the question of medical care for the aged through social security is developing into a major issue in this country.

For many of the nations in the world, this addition to social security would be considered relatively minor. Most of our allies, particularly in western Europe, have long since adopted programs of national health insurance which provide protection for all citizens. Countries such as the United Kingdom, West Germany, France and Italy are regarded as free democracies and yet they have found that freedom is better safeguarded when a high priority is placed on the health and well-being of their citizens.

In its article on the British program of national health insurance, Look magazine pointed this out by saying:

"The crucial choice the British have made is to place health on the list of essential services—just as we do with education, sanitation, water supply, the police and the armed services. It's a life-and-death matter, the British say, and they have acted accordingly."

From Soup to Nonsense:

This Key to the Future Is Just A Part of Our Regular Service

By Jane Goodsell

A GLIMPSE INTO the future: "Say, Dad, can I have the keys to the rocket ship? I've got a heavy date tonight on Mercury. Yeah, sure, I'll be careful, but don't worry if I'm late. I'm likely to get held up by traffic on the Milky Way."

"Hello, Martha? Listen, drop everything and hurry on over. I've picked up an advance edition of Venus Vogue, and the whole issue is devoted to the latest styles from the fashion center of the solar system. They're absolutely stunning, and they're sure to take Earth by storm!"

"Bill, I want you to eat every bit of your carrots. Why, there are billions of little boys on Jupiter who'd be happy to eat that lovely dish of carrots."

"Well, I'll tell you how I feel about Venus. It's a nice place to visit, but I wouldn't want to live there."

"I'd better not play another hand, fellas. I've got to rocket all the way back to Earth tonight, and I've got a tough day tomorrow."

"Sally, if I told you once, I've told you a thousand times, you simply cannot date Saturn boys! Saturn is no place for a young girl. It's not that I don't trust you, but any girl can lose her head on a planet with nine moons."

"Say, how'd you folks like to see the movies we took on our vacation trip to Pluto? I had a little trouble with the time exposure, and the light meter didn't work quite right, but . . ."

"HENRY, IF YOU WANT to visit your mother on Jupiter, you'll have to go by yourself. I simply refuse to go anywhere where I weigh over two-and-a-half times as much as I weigh here on Earth. Besides, I have my heart set on vacationing in Mars. Helen spent two weeks there, and loved it. It made a new woman of her. She was only 21 years old, their time, and she weighed less than 100 pounds."

"I'm just as loyal to my planet as the next man, but I still say the Dodgers haven't a chance against the Martians in the Interplanetary Series."

"I think we should invite our friends from Pluto to our New Year's Eve party. After all, some of them don't get a chance to celebrate a New Year during their whole lifetime with their years being so long and everything. I really feel sorry for them, and this is a fine opportunity for us to show our interplanetary good will."

New Machinery Helps:

Haggerty Predicts Missile Site Peace

Machinery established by the Kennedy Administration should help forestall future labor-management difficulties in the nation's $3 billion space program, C. J. (Neil) Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., has declared.

Appearing on Labor News Conference over the Mutual Broadcasting System radio network, Haggerty said that under the program established by executive order, "99 problems out of 100 will be adjusted at the local level," and that those not solved there will be handled by a top-level tripartite Missile Site Labor Commission.

The commission, headed by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, was empowered by the President to establish local committees at missile and space sites to "anticipate" and dispose of labor problems. Labor members are Haggerty, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Industrial Union Dept.

Many of the difficulties encountered in the past, Haggerty said in the radio interview, resulted from the fact that the federal government launched the missile program "without plan, without formula, without any type of form or consistency."

He contrasted this with the defense program, launched by the government prior to World War II, which worked out "complete understanding of stabilization of employment and work conditions" between labor, management and the defense establishment.

Questioned on Labor News Conference by Peter Braestrup, Washington correspondent for the New York Times, and Alan Adams, Washington reporter for Business Week, Haggerty expressed disagreement with a suggestion by Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.) that there might be need for federal legislation outlawing missile base strikes.

"Laws merely aggravate a situation that could otherwise be handled in a sensible, logical fashion," Haggerty said. He added that labor and management had given the Administration no-strike, no-lockout pledges to speed construction of missile launching sites as part of the program establishing the Missile Site Labor Commission.

Haggerty was critical of recent hearings conducted by the Senate Government Operations Permanent Investigations subcommittee, headed by McClellan, which dug into the construction lag at missile bases.

The hearings, the BCTD president said, were completely "one-sided," and "opinions were given off the top of the head of the witnesses, and these opinions were accepted as facts and printed in the record as facts."

Criticism of the McClellan hearings—which attempted to place the blame for slowdowns in the missile program almost exclusively on unions—came from another source, as the National Constructors Association released the transcript of a radio interview with a covering statement that "testimony about strikes and unreasonable labor costs . . . did not tell the whole story."

In the interview, over Radio Station WDOK, Cleveland, NCA Sec.-Treas. E. D. Hoekstra declared that the responsibility for labor-management misunderstandings lay in the fact that the government had "no overall coordination" on missile sites and "no means of settling disputes in a prompt and fair manner" to assure unions of "a forum where their cases could be heard and heard promptly."

Haggerty also criticized the McClellan subcommittee for the fact that unions were not "given a chance to offset the damaging statements made" by management witnesses. The BCTD president said the committee "had me waiting every day for 10 days" but suspended hearings before permitting him to testify.

AMERICANS ARE STILL AT WORK, this time examining one of films from the AFL-CIO "Americans at Work" television series which was made available by the federation and presented by the State AFL-CIO to the New York State Dept. of Education. The examination is being conducted by (left to right) Dr. Joseph R. Strobel, assistant commissioner of education; Dr. Walter Crewson, associate director; Sec.-Treas. Harold J. Garno of the New York State AFL-CIO.

Non-Ferrous Price-Support Bill Backed

The AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. has urged enactment of price-support legislation to aid the nation's hard-hit lead and zinc producers as a stop-gap move "pending the development of . . . an adequate long-range non-ferrous metals program."

MTD Pres. James A. Brownlow told a House Interior subcommittee that the bill sponsored by Rep. Ed Edmondson (D-Okla.)—which would support domestic lead production at 17 cents per pound and zinc at 14.5 cents per pound—is needed "to conserve our reserves of these metals and to provide employment opportunities for unemployed workers."

Brownlow emphasized that enactment of the bill to aid small producers would "in no sense constitute a substitute for a long-overdue, long-range program needed in lead and zinc and the other non-ferrous industries."

Any long-range policy, he said, must be designed "to assure to the workers in these industries a maximum stability of employment and a full opportunity to move forward with further necessary and desirable improvements in their wages and working conditions through collective bargaining."

The MTD president said an overall program also should be geared to give domestic lead and zinc producers "reasonably stable markets and prices for their products which will allow for the recovery of costs of production and a reasonable profit."

Democracy at Home 'Best Weapon' Abroad

"Fulfillment of the promise of democracy at home is in essence our best weapon for extending our influence abroad." This statement by Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) was made in the final edition of the present series of "Briefing Session," the public affairs television program co-produced by the AFL-CIO and National Educational Television & Radio Center.

Humphrey and Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., Harvard historian and a special assistant to Pres. Kennedy, were again the panelists in the second section of a two-part program on the question "Is Democracy Obsolete?"

Said Humphrey: "The dynamism of our way of life or of our democracy requires that we give everyone an opportunity to participate.

"This means full employment. It means expanded production . . . We have become somewhat willing to accept 5 or 6 million people unemployed as a sort of pattern that you have to live with . . . These are some of the reasons that our revolutionary spirit hasn't taken hold in the world as well as it should."

Schlesinger said communism's great appeal to underdeveloped countries was as a means by which "they can get into the 20th century in a single leap."

"Unless we can show," he said, "that it is possible to achieve economic growth and social progress through democratic means, a means consistent toward the democratic direction, then we lose this great uncommitted part of the world."

Humphrey pointed to a failure in communication between this country's leaders and "the poor, the needy, the hungry, and the sick." The Communist, he said, identifies himself with such people even though they are the very ones he goes on to exploit.

"We have constantly talked of our foreign aid and many of our great national goals in terms of the high and the mighty, of industrialization, of wealth," he said. "We all too often deal with the privileged classes."

Both panelists said democracy is far from obsolete but the American people will have to make sacrifices if the worldwide struggle against communism is to be won. Here is the way Schlesinger put it:

"I think one thing we must do is understand that sacrifice is not sort of a dramatic, one-shot effort.

"I think a lot of people think of sacrifice as something which is done in a moment of glorious excitement and preferably by someone else and do not understand that in a peacetime democracy, sacrifice is a long, irritating, weary, sustained commitment. When we understand that, we will understand much better the context in which we can do things for our country."

"Briefing Session" has been suspended for the summer. Plans for its resumption in the fall are being discussed.

Boycott Rule Broadened by Labor Board

The National Labor Relations Board, in a unanimous decision, has held that it is not necessary to produce evidence that a subcontractor in the construction industry is engaged "in commerce" in order to bar picketing of the job site under the secondary boycott ban in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Overruling Trial Examiner C. W. Whittemore, the NLRB held that the Sheet Metal Workers had engaged in an illegal secondary boycott because picketing of a non-union subcontractor halted all work at the construction site.

The trial examiner had dismissed the complaint against the union on the ground there was no showing that the subcontractor was engaged "in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce"— the language used in 1959 amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act tightening restrictions on so-called secondary boycotts.

In its decision, the NLRB said the union's actions would have been illegal before the 1959 amendments. Since the changes were made by Congress to close "loopholes" in the law, the board declared, the examiner's decision would "thwart" the intent of the legislators.

Kennedy Orders U.S. Recognition Of Employes' Right to Organize

Pres. Kennedy has directed federal agencies to consult with unions of government employes and to recognize the right of federal workers to organize and "to seek to improve working conditions and the resolution of grievances."

He also set up a cabinet-level committee, headed by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, to recommend union recognition standards and policies and to explore "the broad range of issues relating to federal employe-management relations." The six-man task force was given a Nov. 30, 1961, deadline to submit its proposals to the President.

In a separate memorandum to agency heads, Kennedy called on all government departments to apply new minimum wage standards to their employes even though the federal government—the nation's largest single employer—is exempt from coverage of the Wage-Hour Act.

Kennedy said the new rates—$1.15 an hour effective Sept. 3, 1961, and $1.25 as of Sept. 3, 1963—should apply to laundry workers employed by the federal government "even though such workers in private employment are specifically exempted by law."

Laundry workers are among some 750,000 federal blue collar workers whose pay is set by wage boards on the basis of prevailing rates in private industry.

The American Federation of Government Employes in mid-May wrote Kennedy urging establishment of a governmentwide policy "calling for all federal employes to be paid at least the prevailing minimum wage."

In establishing such a policy, Kennedy told agency heads that "the social and economic reasons" for raising the minimum wage in private industry "are equally compelling and applicable to wage-earners employed by federal departments and agencies."

The President's union recognition memorandum declared that "the participation of federal employes in the formulation and implementation of employe policies and procedures affecting them contributes to the effective conduct of public business."

He emphasized that the right of federal employes to organize and be represented by their unions "should be recognized by management officials at all levels in all departments and agencies." Government unions have charged in the past that headquarters' directives on consultation with unions often are ignored by lower-level supervisors.

The White House memorandum served notice that the government will not recognize unions with racial discriminatory practices.

Kennedy instructed federal agencies to "maintain relationships only with those employe organizations which are free of restrictions or practices denying membership because of race, color, religion or national origin."

Some government employe unions have segregated locals, although the number has been considerably reduced in recent years.

Kennedy named to Goldberg's task force to study federal employe-management relations, Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara, Postmaster Gen. J. Edward Day, Budget Dir. David E. Bell, Civil Service Commission Chairman John W. Macy, Jr., and Theodore C. Sorenson, special counsel to the President.

E. C. Hallbeck, chairman of the AFL-CIO Government Employes' Council and president of the Post Office Clerks, welcomed the White House memorandum on union recognition as "an important step in the right direction." He declared, however, that government unions still favor legislation giving statutory recognition to unions in preference to policy statements which can change with shifts in Administration.

IAM Re-Elects Hayes, Walker

The Machinists have re-elected Pres. Al J. Hayes and Sec.-Treas. Elmer E. Walker in a secret ballot referendum. Hayes had no opposition. Walker won, 62,975 to 22,702, in a contest with Vice Pres. Roy M. Brown, Los Angeles.

Nine candidates for vice president were elected in a field of 13 candidates—Floyd E. Smith, Matthew DeMore, J. C. McGlon, P. L. Siemiller, J. W. Ramsey, Ernest R. White, George L. Watkins, Harold J. Gibson and, for Canada, Mike Rygus. All are incumbents except Smith, DeMore and Rygus.

HARRY POLLAK (left), AFL-CIO liaison with the Peace Corps, discusses labor's role with Peace Corps Dir. R. Sargent Shriver, following testimony before Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Peace Corps Legislation Supported by Labor

Pres. John F. Kennedy's Peace Corps can provide the nation with "a new direction in foreign policy techniques which is needed for the struggle to eradicate the age-old blights of poverty, illiteracy and disease," the AFL-CIO has declared.

Testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, a federation spokesman urged enactment of legislation proposed by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) which would establish the corps on a permanent basis.

"If it is organized properly and administered intelligently," AFL-CIO Intl. Rep. Harry H. Pollak told the committee, the Peace Corps "should live up to its promise of utility and effectiveness. It will be on trial, but we believe it will succeed."

Pollak, assigned by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as a liaison officer between the Peace Corps and organized labor, urged that the legislation place "greater emphasis on recruitment of the older worker and the retired worker." Among such workers, he said, there is "a pool of industrial skills which very often lies unused."

He urged that Peace Corps projects not be limited to those developed exclusively on a government-to-government basis.

"Vital institutions in developing societies are the free trade unions," Pollak declared. "They should be taken into partnership, together with other democratic institutions, such as the cooperatives, in developing Peace Corps projects and programs."

At the same time, he said, there is "dubious value" in having peace corps activities in countries of the Soviet bloc, Spain or the Dominican Republic "where the trade unions are completely suppressed." He added:

"A free trade union is, in a very real sense, an excellent barometer for democracy. Where it does not exist, freedom does not exist."

Pollak warned that "despite the best intentions" of America, the people of the less-developed countries "are going to take a good look at Americans bearing gifts." Leaders of the emerging nations, he said, "are not primarily interested in providing a well-rounded education in international affairs or a low-cost 'grand tour' for young Americans."

What these nations want, he said, are people who can "perform highly desired functions." In addition to the recruits from the offices, farms and colleges, Pollak added, the new nations need "the union school teacher, the mason, the carpenter, the bricklayer, the electrician, the newspaperman, the printer, the auto mechanic, the machinist."

American labor, he said, "with its long history of international cooperation," is aware that a Peace Corps cannot be "a universal patent medicine that can cure everything that ails our ravaged world." By itself, Pollak said, the corps will not "solve the enormous problems of hunger and disease." He added:

"But the Peace Corps can help. Properly administered . . . it can express to the peoples of the world some of the finest aspects of our American heritage."

Savings and Loan Firm Signs Union-Shop Pact

San Diego—Labor history was made here when Sentinel Savings & Loan Association signed union-shop agreements with two AFL-CIO unions.

The pacts—with Building Service Employes Local 102 and Office Employes Local 139—mark the first time that 100 percent of the employes of a savings and loan firm in the U.S. were covered by union-shop agreements.

Principle Endorsed:

AFL-CIO Asks Broadening Of Youth Job Training Bill

America is "doing far too little" to help its young people acquire needed job skills, the AFL-CIO has declared in endorsing the principle of the Kennedy Administration's three-pronged program aimed at providing job training for the nation's youth.

The federation's position was spelled out in testimony by Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller before a Senate Labor subcommittee and by John H. Beidler, assistant to Biemiller, before a House Labor subcommittee.

At the same time, the AFL-CIO called for changes designed to strengthen the bill's key provisions and renewed a plea for White House action to "move the economy forward and provide greater job opportunities" both for young people and presently idled workers.

"Simply to aid youth to acquire and improve skills," Biemiller declared, "will go for naught unless jobs are available for them. This is even more true in the case of youth than for the population generally, because unemployment is particularly acute among young people desiring jobs."

The Administration bill—sponsored by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Representatives Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) and John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.)—calls for:

- An on-the-job training program, supplemented by classroom instruction.
- A public-service, public-works employment and training program operated in conjunction with state and local governments.
- A federal-state youth conservation corps, similar to the Civilian Conservation Corps of the New Deal era.

The on-the-job and public-service pilot training programs, Biemiller said, "would be desirable in helping us, as a nation, to meet our growing problems of unemployable youths."

He pointed out, however, that both programs "duplicate in many respects" similar provisions in the Administration's Manpower Development & Training bill now being considered by Senate and House committees.

"There seems to be little reason," the AFL-CIO spokesman said, for including these programs in a youth job-training measure unless Congress follows labor's suggestion that the Manpower Development & Training bill give "special priority" to retraining workers who are 30 years of age or older, who are heads of families or who have been in the labor force for five or more years.

Biemiller made it clear that this position "should not be interpreted to detract from our support for both on-the-job and public-service training for younger workers."

"We do support both programs, because an approach to a solution to the problems of our younger workers is gravely needed," he explained.

The federation spokesman also endorsed creation of the youth conservation corps, declaring that "much work needs to be done" in conservation, development and management of natural resources and in development, management and protection of recreational areas. A corps such as the one proposed "would be admirably suited to perform these services," he declared.

Biemiller urged, however, that the plan be broadened to go beyond the pilot program recommended by the Administration, declaring that "sufficient experience has been gained from operation of the old CCC to permit a full-scale operation." He recommended that Humphrey's original proposal for 50,000 corpsmen the first year, 100,000 the second and 150,000 thereafter be approved.

The AFL-CIO urged that the legislation "make clear that work performed by these young men should not be permitted to create greater unemployment for others." It cited, as an example, "road construction which has traditionally been performed by construction trades," and which, it said, "should continue to be contracted out."

Appearing before the Senate subcommittee, Mrs. Mildred Jeffrey, director of community relations for the Auto Workers, put her union on record in support of the program, with recommended changes, declaring that "10 million boys and girls now in school are doomed to substandard employment throughout their adult years" unless training and employment opportunities are made available to them.

Head of Pilots Backs U.S. Aid for Airports

Federal financial assistance of at least $100 million a year for five years is needed to bring American airports to an acceptable level of safety and efficiency, Pres. C. N. Sayen of the Air Line Pilots has testified before a Senate Aviation subcommittee.

Speaking in support of a bill to make $75 million a year available for airport aid, Sayen said the pilots "strongly endorse the legislation as a minimum" but feel that it falls short in relation to known and predictable needs.

Saying that aircraft technology has made obsolete the facilities at many airports, the head of the 14,000-member pilots' organization observed:

"We can complete 3,589 miles of four-lane highways and 184 miles of six-lane highways a year, but it requires practically a national emergency to secure another 1,000 feet of concrete for an airport runway."

Sayen said almost half of the nation's publicly owned airports need immediate improvement or expansion at a calculated cost of $1.1 billion over five years, half of it coming from the federal government.

Needed facilities, he said, include runways of adequate length, instrument landing systems, approach lights, surveillance radar, runway visual range equipment, and better runway lighting.

Only two years were required, Sayen testified, for jet aircraft to become the "accepted method of travel" for medium and long distance flights. More than 200 large jet transports have been placed in scheduled air carrier service since late 1958, and more than 300 turbojet airliners will be in domestic service by the end of 1961, he predicted.

Airport facilities which had not previously kept pace with the growth of commercial aviation were rendered even more obsolescent by jet transports, Sayen said.

Pointing out that average federal aid to airports for the past 10 years has been at the rate of $28.5 million per year, the ALPA head contrasted that with the total projected cost of Dulles Intl. Airport at Chantilly, Va.—$85 million—and the $3.223 billion spent last year in the federal highway aid program.

"When we can have a $4 billion road-building program, 90 percent federally financed, a $75 million or more airport aid bill is certainly not unreasonable," he said.

Boot-Shoe Convention Stresses Labor Unity

Cincinnati—Two basic themes ran through the 23rd convention of the Boot & Shoe Workers' Union here—the need for labor unity, getting all unions to work together for common union goals, and the need to arouse members to play more active parts in union affairs.

While the 300 delegates discussed many other problems, including the possibility of merger with the United Shoe Workers, automation, foreign competition, and runaway shops, the convention and its speakers constantly returned to the problems of labor unity and membership complacency.

The problems were linked by Vice Pres. J. W. McGonigal, who took new members to task for accepting with a shrug the gains made by labor unions over the years and forgetting the hard work, money, and sweat that went into their making.

"Unfortunately for the entire labor movement," he said, "this complacency extends even to the ballot box, a very important medium for the protection of working people."

On the much-talked about question of shoe-union merger delegates passed a resolution endorsing such a move as being for "the common good of all our brother shoemakers in the United States and Canada."

The move was given impetus by speeches by Pres. John A. Mara of the Boot & Shoe Workers and Pres. George Fecteau of the United Shoe Workers. The two unions represent about 110,000 of the 125,000 organized shoe workers. There are an additional 125,000 unorganized shoe workers who, delegates felt, could be more readily organized by a merged organization.

Fecteau discussed the problems of automation and runaway shops, suggesting a shorter workweek as the answer to new machines.

One of the great problems arising in organizational drives in shops in the South, which had moved from other sections of the country, was the pressure brought by management, he said.

This not only hurt organization, he said, but also hurt in negotiations because workers would not back their negotiators after being told by their foremen and supervisors that they would be out of jobs if wage increases were granted.

Both Pres. Joseph McCurdy of the United Garment Workers and Arthur Gildea, secretary-treasurer of the Brewery Workers, warned against the decline in direct negotiations between union representatives and management.

Gildea placed most of the blame on the Taft-Hartley Act and the Landrum-Griffin Act.

"We have seen," he said, "our previous system of sitting around the table with management to negotiate a contract become a situation where we sit and listen to arguments between attorneys. I am concerned that we find ourselves spending more and more of our members' dues for legal expense."

One answer to the increasing threat of foreign competition would be for all union members to demand a union label in the shoes they buy, delegates resolved.

The seriousness of foreign competition was outlined by Harry Alberstein, president of the Frolic Footwear Co., Jonesboro, Ark., who said the shoe industry is engaged in "a real cold war" and that management and labor in this country must band together to win.

Delegates passed a resolution backing COPE, urging all members to give at least $1 a year; asked state legislatures to follow the example of Massachusetts law makers and make retailers display the name of the foreign country making shoes in type no smaller than the price of the shoes; and endorsed the provisions of the Muskie marketing bill which would limit foreign imports.

Mara and McGonigal were reelected. Daniel Goggin, Tom Cory, H. B. Hutchison, Frank Kappel, Derald L. Wells, Kenneth Scott, Michael Tesoro, Leo Frieda, and Homer Mitchell were chosen members of the executive board.

In Committee Vote:

African Unionists Rebuff Reds at ILO

Geneva—Voting by secret ballot, African trade unionists at the Intl. Labor Organization's 45th session here elected six non-Reds to represent the continent's workers on the ILO's African Advisory Committee.

The Soviet bloc has carried on an intense campaign in the newly independent African countries, but when the returns were in, Communist-backed candidates failed to win a single seat.

"The black-balling by the African workers themselves of the candidates known as playing the Communist game was a tremendous victory for the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions," Rudy Faupl, U.S. worker delegate to the ILO, said.

"Communist delegates lobbied hard to get their handpicked spokesmen in Africa on the advisory committee. Their failure shows how effective the ICFTU has been in convincing the Arican workers that democratic trade unionism free of Communist tentacles is their best hope."

The African Advisory Committee is an outgrowth of the first ILO African Regional Conference held in Lagos, Nigeria, last year.

U.S. Backing Assured ILO by Kennedy

Geneva—Pres. John F. Kennedy has pledged the continuing support of the U.S. government to the Intl. Labor Organization at the agency's 45th annual conference here.

In a message read into the record by conference Pres. Amir Raschid of Burma, Kennedy declared:

"I assure you that the great work the organization undertakes will have the full participation, encouragement and support of this country. I extend every good wish to you and to the delegates."

That conference asked that African labor questions be submitted to an all-African committee of government, worker and employer delegates that should meet at least once every two years.

In plenary session earlier Andre Bo-Boliko, secretary-general of the Union of Congolese Workers, had denounced Soviet-bloc delegates who claimed that the rump Congo government of Antoine Gizenga was the only "legal" government.

Communists Assailed

"These various speakers belonging to a single bloc have all spoken in favor of the division of the country since they declare that they recognize only governmental regimes that they themselves have artificially created in the Congo," Bo-Boliko said.

"No one has spoken of the nefarious consequences for the Congo masses of this flagrant intervention in the internal affairs of our independent state.

"Let no country come and boast of its assistance to certain Congolese politicians and of plunging millions of peasants and workers into poverty."

Another African worker, Lawrence Borha of Nigeria, told the conference that unless trade unionism "sets itself up in opposition to forces which diminish liberty, it is not trade unionism."

"It may be an agency of state policy," he added. "It may be an instrument for political party maneuvers. But it is not trade unionism."

Harold Collison, successor to Sir Alfred Roberts, British former chairman of the worker delegates, said that a "trade union movement which is not free to make its own decisions without outside interference is not a trade union."

Endorsing an ILO report warning that a union may lose its capacity to stand independently for the interests of workers if it becomes the instrument of a political party, Collison said:

"It is a cardinal principle of our movement and of the ICFTU, which the British Trade Union Congress helped to build, and which continues to receive our full support."

Meanwhile a technical committee completed work on proposals for international standards assuring that foreign workers get the same social security benefits as the nationals of any country in which they are working.

Worker members won a victory when the committee decided to recommend the standards as a convention that would be binding on ratifying governments. Some employer and government delegates had argued for a recommendation that would have only moral force and would not require ratification.

"To deprive workers of the benefits they have earned merely because they are migrants, often for reasons beyond their control, violates all concepts of decency," Sec.-Treas. Toney Gallo, of the Cement Workers, an adviser to Faupl, said in debate.

"Equal treatment of nationals, non-nationals, refugees and stateless persons is social justice, a basic principle of the ILO. We workers of the U.S. want to give more than lip service to this principle by supporting a convention."

Mauritania 100th Member

The admission of the new African state of Mauritania as the 100th ILO member nation by a vote of 236-25, with 72 abstentions, led to boycott of the rest of the session by Morocco.

The Moroccan delegation walked out because of an old dispute with France over possession of the territory south of Morocco. France gave Mauritania independence despite the Moroccan claim to sovereignty over the area.

Some, but not all, Arab delegates voted with Morocco, while all the Soviet bloc abstained. The four U.S. government, worker and employer votes went solidly for admission, as did almost all the non-Arab African votes.

URW Appoints District Directors

Boston—The Rubber Workers' international executive board, at a meeting here, has approved URW Pres. George Burdon's appointment of two new district directors—Harley C. Anthony of Dist. 1, Akron, and Joseph H. Cramer of Dist. 8, Atlanta.

Anthony had been assistant to Carl F. Swartz, former director, who died June 5. A URW pioneer, Anthony helped organize a union at the B. F. Goodrich Co. in Akron, and has worked on the URW field staff since 1937.

Cramer, a native of Camden, N. J., has been a URW member in Camden, Newark, N. J., and Clarksville, Tenn. For seven years he was on the union staff in the East, and for the last 10 years he has worked in the South. He succeeds Ray C. Nixon, who died June 3.

Continuing Human Rights Fight Urged by Faupl at ILO Parley

Geneva—The Intl. Labor Organization "must maintain human rights where they already exist and fight for their establishment where they are yet to be won," Rudy Faupl, U.S. worker delegate, declared at the ILO's 45th session here.

The Communist bloc delegates maintained silence but applause thundered from the other benches in the hall when Faupl concluded by saying: "In this mission we must not fail."

Government and employer delegates joined representatives of the world's free workers in congratulating Faupl after the speech.

Addressing himself to the question of labor relations, the theme of the three-week session's general debate, the leader of the U.S. worker delegation warned that "regardless of what may be the formal legalistic trappings, labor relations are a mere mockery unless the workers are secure in their basic freedoms."

Freedom of association, he said, means that "workers must have the untrammeled right to establish their own trade union organizations without restrictions and without interference by any employer, government or political body."

"It must be a right," he added, "which workers can exercise freely and without fear of reprisal or discrimination."

Collective bargaining is the "most effective path to progress for the workingman and his family," Faupl continued, adding there is no genuine collective bargaining "if wages are eliminated from the scope of labor-management relations."

The ILO itself, he pointed out, had said in a report to the conference that in the Soviet bloc countries "wage-fixing is handled within the framework of the economic plan, by legislation or by decision of the central authorities and is not covered by collective agreements."

No amount of double-talk can conceal the fact revealed by the report that collective bargaining does not exist in the Communist countries since the workers are unable to negotiate their wages, Faupl said.

"Indeed, even if there were not other restrictions," he emphasized, "freedom of association under such circumstances becomes completely meaningless."

It was a "sad fact" that the ILO Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendation had demonstrated by citing chapter and verse that in the Communist bloc there were "tremendous restrictions on freedom of association," Faupl recalled.

The committee's report, he demonstrated, listed no less than eight provisions in Soviet law which were viewed by the ILO experts as "incompatible" with the Convention on Freedom and Protection of the Right to Organize.

The report showed that the same situation exists in the other Soviet bloc countries although all of them had "brazenly ratified" the convention, the U.S. worker pointed out.

That neither freedom of association nor genuine collective bargaining exist beyond the Iron Curtain is the "obvious" and "stark" conclusion of the report, Faupl added.

"This cannot be explained away on the grounds of the requirements of a different economic system," he declared. "It is the totalitarian political system which denies workers their basic freedom."

Faupl criticized the ILO report on labor relations for glossing over "this fundamental fact" and voiced regret that the study of trade unions in the Soviet Union by an ILO mission had also "unfortunately distorted" the situation.

But he added that trade unionists in the free industrialized countries who had largely won their basic rights after long struggles were now being joined by African workers in placing great value on them.

At the ILO's recent first African Regional Conference, Faupl recalled, the delegates unanimously said that the ratification and strict application of ILO conventions on human rights was a question of "honor and prestige" for all African states.

"Our African colleagues have carved out for themselves the job all of us in the ILO must unflinchingly undertake," Faupl said. "We must not temporize, we must not equivocate; we must not rationalize.

"I care not what may be the economic system. I care not what may be the ruling political party. Freedom and human rights mean the same thing all over the world. We betray the highest principles upon which our organization was founded if we seek to minimize or gloss over oppression and tyranny."

Expanded Foreign Aid Gets Support of IUD

The present unfavorable balance of international payments should not be used as an excuse to prevent expansion of the nation's foreign aid program, Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has declared.

In a letter to Sen. J. William Fulbright, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Reuther declared that "it is patently absurd to say that the wealthiest nation in the world cannot afford foreign aid."

At the same time, the IUD president endorsed the Kennedy Administration's request for making development loan funds available on a long-term basis in order to assure proper planning of aid programs.

The Administration has asked for $2.5 billion for fiscal 1962, authority to draw on the Treasury for $6.4 billion over the following four years, and $1 billion to guarantee investments in underdeveloped countries.

Reuther declared that aid programs have too often concentrated upon some temporary political advantage rather than on "basic programs contributing to sound economic growth." He emphasized that relatively greater aid should be channeled into education, basic utilities, public health, improved agricultural programs and "broad scope" programs of land reform.

Such programs, the IUD president said, demand a continuity in U.S. foreign aid.

"Nations confronted with exploding populations," Reuther said, "can safely undertake investment in basic long-term health and utilities programs only if they are assured that essential outside support will be available on a continuing basis."

Reuther called for inclusion in overall aid programs of a "sound labor program." If totalitarian methods are to be avoided, he declared, free trade unions must be given an opportunity to "participate actively in the process of development." He emphasized that a "stable democratic society is not possible without an effectively functioning trade union movement."

Social Security, Housing Bills Passed

House Tries to Break School Aid Blockade

voice votes in both the House and Senate.

Meanwhile, efforts were underway in the House to break a legislative logjam which has thus far tied up final action on the Senate-passed federal aid-to-public-education bill.

School Bill Stalled

With the $2.5 billion public school bill stalled in the powerful Rules Committee, the House Education Committee, headed by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D.-N. Y.), reported out amendments to the National Defense Education Act which included limited federal loans for private schools.

The public education measure still faced tough sledding and an uncertain outcome in the House where, in 1960, efforts to provide federal funds for raising teachers' salaries were defeated.

In other action on Capitol Hill:

- Senate-House conferees reached agreement on a six-year, $570 million program to help combat water pollution on the nation's rivers. The bill, expected to receive final floor approval after the long July 4 holiday, provides $80 million in federal grants the first year, $90 million the second, and $100 million annually for the last four years to help communities build sewage treatment plants.
- The Senate passed, by voice vote, a measure raising the national debt ceiling by $5 billion—to $298 billion—for one year. The measure earlier had won approval in the House.
- The House approved a huge $43 billion defense budget, only $6 million less than Kennedy had requested. Some sections of the bill were trimmed and more money was provided for manned bombers than had been proposed by the Administration.
- The Senate unanimously passed, by voice vote, a $1.7 billion authorization for the Administration's expanded space program. The bill includes an effort to beat Russia to the moon and back with a manned space craft.
- Congress sent to the White House a bill providing $11.5 billion more in federal grants to permit completion of the interstate highway system on schedule in 1972. To keep the program on a "pay-as-you-go" basis, Congress voted to continue the 4-cents-a-gallon federal gasoline tax until Oct. 1, 1972.
- A Senate Labor subcommittee approved the Administration's plan for retraining unemployed workers, but killed a provision for federal subsidies to help relocate the jobless.

The housing and social security measures sent to the White House for Kennedy's signature had been regarded as "must" legislation by the Administration. Their passage—on the heels of earlier congressional approval of temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits, minimum wage improvements, aid to depressed areas, and aid to dependent children—left the Administration with only two of its "top priority" bills still to be acted upon.

One is school aid; the other, on which the House Ways & Means Committee is expected to hold public hearings shortly, is health care for the aged financed through social security.

As passed by Congress, the housing bill authorizes $2 billion in urban renewal grants; construction of an additional 100,000 low-cost public housing units; $1.2 billion in loans for college housing; $50 million in loans to local governments to acquire and repair mass transportation facilities; $50 million in grants for communities to buy open space for parks; $75 million for loans for housing for the elderly; and $200 million in farm housing loans.

In addition, it permits 35-year loans, with minimal down payments, to make it possible for middle-income families to obtain housing previously out of their reach; and authorizes 20-year loans, for up to $10,000, for rehabilitation and modernization of older homes.

The social security bill sent to the White House boosts minimum monthly benefits from $33 to $40; raises widow's pensions by 10 percent; gives men retiring at 62 a pension of 80 percent of what they would receive if they retired at age 65; eases eligibility requirements for pensions; and liberalizes slightly the provisions governing the amount of money retirees may earn while drawing benefits.

Beirne Urges United Fund Drive Study

Dayton, O.—Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers, has called for "citizens' commissions on federation" to study the operations of the nation's 2,200 united funds and community chests.

Beirne, who is also chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, told more than 400 volunteers from united funds and community chests at a two-day campaign leaders national conference here that it may be time "for us to consider the future of federation and how we can minimize the bureaucracy of the united appeals and maximize personal involvement."

He cited three questions which "might naturally arise" out of such communitywide appraisals of the nearly $1.5 billion a year campaigns:

- Is the information and education effort of funds and chests too "campaign-oriented" to help the public "understand the underlying causes" of social problems?
- Is there not a "clear and unquestioned need" to put social planning on an "equal basis" with fund-raising?
- Why is the professional social worker in "such short supply" if the social welfare movement "truly values his services?"

Heritage Unit Gives Award to AFL-CIO

Unity House, Pa.—The AFL-CIO was awarded an "outstanding citizenship" citation by the American Heritage Foundation for its efforts in getting citizens to register and vote in the 1960 election.

The award was presented to Pres. George Meany at the Executive Council meeting here by foundation Executive Dir. Brendan Byrne. The citation included a reproduction of Lincoln's Gettysburg Address.

Rail Workers Win Strike In Uruguay

Montevideo, Uruguay—Some 10,000 members of the Federation of Railroad Workers won wage increases amounting to 48 percent from the nationally-owned railroads after a 34-day strike that had international labor support.

Newspapers hailed the strike as "an historic triumph" for the democratic labor movement. The settlement left some issues, including hours, weekly rest and vacations, to be arbitrated, with a decision due in three months.

Involved in the victory were the solidarity of the strikers, the strong backing of the Uruguay Confederation of Labor (CSU) and the support of the AFL-CIO, Intl. Transportation Federation, Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers.

The AFL-CIO contributed $500 to help finance the walkout. The ITF helped obtain a boycott of the port of Montevideo and of Uruguayan ships in foreign ports.

Goldberg Again Asks Disclosure Law Teeth

The Kennedy Administration has reiterated its plea to Congress to put teeth into the 1958 Welfare & Pension Plan Disclosure law in order to "correct a situation which has deceived many thousands of American workers for over two years."

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, in a special statement, called for passage of the AFL-CIO-supported amendments to the law which would give the Labor Dept. investigative and enforcement authority it presently is denied, would authorize the government to bring civil suits to enjoin violations, and would set up more stringent regulations on bribes, kickbacks and embezzlement.

A tight reporting system has been urged by organized labor since legislation first was introduced three years ago. All of the proposed amendments were in the original bill introduced by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) and backed by the AFL-CIO in 1958, but were cut out by the House.

Goldberg declared that when the law was enacted, "it was hoped that the principle of disclosure to participants and beneficiaries of these plans would create pressures strong enough to insure their scrupulous and honest administration."

"Two years of operating experience," the Cabinet officer said, "have shown that this was a vain hope."

He described as "a totally ineffective remedy" the provision of the law which relies upon private lawsuits brought by individuals as "the main deterrent to wrongdoing" in the administration of health, welfare and pension funds.

In addition, he said, the law gives the Labor Dept. no power to investigate plans "even in those cases in which [there is] some reason to believe that impropriety may exist."

Testifying in support of the Administration amendments this year, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said their enactment was "essential if the interests of America's wage and salary earners are to be protected."

AFL-CIO Backs Boost In Civil Defense Funds

The AFL-CIO has called on the Senate to restore to the civil defense budget $25 million which the House had cut from Administration requests for fiscal 1962.

Such a move, Legislative Rep. George D. Riley told a Senate Appropriations subcommittee, is essential to "repair the damage" done by the House to the program designed to protect the American populace in case of enemy attack.

The largest single cut was a $14 million slash in funds for emergency hospital supplies and equipment. The Administration had asked that aid be given 1,000 additional hospitals of 200 beds each to help provide added facilities for caring for victims of attack. The House voted instead to authorize assistance for only 500 more hospitals.

The House also cut $1.5 million from the request for research and development of experimental fallout shelters, and refused to provide $1.2 million for a shelter in the projected White House office building to be constructed in the nation's capital.

Riley registered the AFL-CIO's "continued opposition" to the plan to transfer the civil defense function, and "particularly . . . the shelter program," to the Defense Dept.

"Planning and programming for civilian shelter," the federation spokesman said, should "logically be delegated to the agency of government presently charged with housing."

Riley said the plan to put civil defense operations under the military would mean that the present OCDM would be "relegated to a mere planning agency." Organized labor, he said, "feels strongly that civil functions should never be subordinate to military operations, though they may be closely allied and essential one to the other."

United Textile Union Endorses New Party

Hamilton, Ont.—The Canadian conference of the United Textile Workers, taking direct political action for the first time in its 17-year history, has called on its 9,200 members to give moral and financial support to the New Party.

The New Party is being sponsored by the Canadian Labor Congress, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and other liberal and farm groups. It will be formally organized at a meeting in Ottawa the week of July 31.

Congress in Stretch Drive With Major Battles Ahead

Joblessness Near 7% for 7th Month

By David L. Perlman

The Labor Dept.'s employment-unemployment estimate for June shows the nation still mired in serious joblessness with a seasonally adjusted unemployment rate of 6.8 percent — virtually unchanged for the seventh consecutive month.

A record influx of teen-agers entering the job market with the close of school sent both employment and unemployment figures soaring to post-war records. One bright spot was a better-than-seasonal 500,000 increase in employment of adult men.

Jobs Rise Sharply

Total employment rose by 1.9 million in June to 68.7 million, 17,000 above the previous high last July; unemplyoment increased 800,000 to 5.6 million, 1.2 million higher than in June 1960.

While the number of persons out of work 15 weeks or longer declined seasonally by 300,000 to 1.6 million, it was still nearly double the level of a year ago. The number out of work for more than a half-year rose slightly to 928,000 compared with 396,000 in June 1960.

A companion report on employment in major cities showed a slight improvement for the second successive month. Eighty-eight of the nation's 150 major labor markets reported unemployment rates above 6 percent —but this was down from 96 in May and from the all-time high

Meany to Broadcast Appeal for Aid Bill

Underscoring labor's wholehearted support of the pending Administration foreign aid bill, the AFL-CIO has announced that Pres. George Meany will make a major radio address on the subject.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the federation was negotiating with radio networks for prime time on a coast-to-coast hookup. The broadcast will take place Thursday night, July 13. Union members should consult their local newspapers for time and station.

'Knotty' Areas Still Remain:

Internal Disputes Unit Gives Progress Report to Council

By Saul Miller

Unity House, Pa.—A "partial progress report" of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's subcommittee on internal disputes has been accepted by the Council with instructions to the group to continue its discussion and report back to the next meeting.

AFL-CIO Pres. Meany told reporters at the wind-up of the council meeting here that the committee has made a "good deal of progress" but that some "knotty" areas remain to be resolved.

The subcommittee has been working on machinery and "ground rules" for final and binding arbitration of internal disputes, on instructions from the 1959 AFL-CIO convention which adopted the arbitration approach in principle and instructed the special subcommittee to develop a "detailed plan of procedure."

Meetings to Continue

The subcommittee is composed of Vice Pres. A. J. Hayes as chairman, Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther, Joseph Beirne and Joseph Keenan, and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler. Meany said it was instructed to continue consultations with the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the Industrial Union Dept. so that it can complete its report by the October council meeting. He said the committee indicated agreement in certain areas but that two "knotty problems" remained—B&CTD and IUD disputes and boycotts.

The committee reached complete agreement on raiding problems, Meany said, and the general framework for settling disputes. He said in reply to queries that this would involve a panel of arbitrators and a director of disputes. But he stressed that there is "nothing final," and that "nothing has been adopted."

He commented in reply to another query that he is "encouraged by the fact that they [the committee] have reduced the areas of dispute and disagreement."

In other internal areas, Meany announced:

- The Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee, created by the AFL-CIO to organize farm workers in California, will set up an orderly transfer of its members to an appropriate international union.

Meany commented that the federation went into the farm worker area to help develop a trade union consciousness and to improve conditions. On the latter, he stressed, the campaign has been successful, with wages increasing an estimated 25 percent. The average dues-paying membership since the cam-

School Bill, Foreign Aid Pending

By Gene Zack

The 87th Congress passed the two-thirds mark of its current session facing a series of major legislative hurdles despite a solid record of accomplishment to date.

Ahead of the Democratic-controlled Congress lay the prospect of sharp battles over three key measures proposed by Pres. John F. Kennedy: federal aid to public schools, mutual security and health care for the aged financed through social security.

Each poses a major test of strength for the new "working coalition" which the Administration has fashioned in the House to blunt the force of the conservative Republican-southern Democratic bloc which in the past has succeeded in killing or emasculating most progress legislation.

For a progress report on AFL-CIO's 20-point legislative program in the 87th Congress, see Scorecard, Page 6.

Composed of practically all northern and western Democrats, a surprisingly large group of southern Democrats and about 30 liberal Republicans, the new coalition has been an important factor in Kennedy's initial successes on Capitol Hill.

In the first six months, working at a pace unmatched since the early days of the New Deal, Congress has enacted the bulk of the "must" measures which Ken-

T-H Court Injunction Halts Maritime Strike

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—American-owned passenger and freight ships have started to sea again under a Taft-Hartley temporary restraining order ending a strike called June 15.

U.S. District Judge Sylvester J. Ryan issued the order as several of the striking unions reached contract agreements with companies representing more than half the merchant marine fleet. An appeals judge refused the petition of two unions to block the order, and Judge Ryan was slated to hear arguments on the government's petition to make an injunction permanent for 80 days.

Pres. John F. Kennedy, acting on the "reluctant" recommendation of Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, used the T-H injunction procedure on the ground that a continuation of the strike "imperils the national health and safety."

The President called for a continuation of negotiations during the so-called "cooling off" pe-

Ship Strike Halted by T-H Court Order

riod. He also directed Goldberg to draft amendments to improve the national emergency provisions of T-H, and called for a review of "procedures for improving collective bargaining" in the maritime industry.

The strike of 70,000 seamen produced these developments:

● Members of the Maritime Union, by a vote of 13,168 to 652 at meetings in 21 ports, approved new four-year agreements with companies operating 590 ships. Substantially similar agreements were reached by the Masters, Mates & Pilots and the American Radio Association.

● The Seafarers, representing 20,000 Atlantic and Gulf Coast sailors, announced the signing of contracts with 95 percent of affected employers. SIU and at least one other union—the Marine Engineers—have opposed the issuance of the T-H restraining order. SIU said it was unnecessary because only a few ships were involved.

Terms of Agreements

The NMU said its new contracts provide a 4 percent wage increase effective June 16, and an additional 2.25 percent each year; vacations of 60 days a year after one year of service with the same company; increased pension and welfare contributions; allowances for room and meals ashore and subsistence allowances while traveling.

Pension fund trustees, it was agreed, will work out details of a severance pay plan, and a joint committee will study issues involving working conditions or leave them for final arbitration. The "runaway flag" issue—American ships sailing under foreign flags—is referred to the Secretary of Labor.

SIU concluded one-year agreements providing a 4 percent money package increasing welfare, pension and vacation benefits; employer recognition of the union's right to board "runaway" ships and to bargain for crews where majority status is attained; and agreement for a joint committee of union and management to draft a program for helping the industry.

A Board of Inquiry named by Kennedy under the Taft-Hartley Act to study the maritime strike and to seek a settlement reported back to the President that "full accord" had not been reached by all strikers and ship operators and that the national health and safety were imperiled by its continuance.

"The circumstances of this dispute," Kennedy said in announcing his decision to ask for an injunction, "present new evidences for the imperative need of improvements of the national emergency section" of T-H.

"I have directed the Secretary of Labor promptly to prepare for submission to the Congress proposals for improving our mechanism" of dealing with such conflicts. "This dispute also points up the necessity for reviewing our procedures for improving collective bargaining in the maritime industry."

The Board of Inquiry included David L. Cole, chairman, Judge Samuel I. Rosenman, and Prof. James J. Healy of Harvard University.

The board reported that the maritime bargaining structure is "most complex" and involves "virtually every shipping company" in the U.S. and five separate international unions.

Main obstacles to agreement, the board said, are two major issues—the practice of certain American ship operators in registering their ships under foreign flags and contract inequities involving groups of workers.

DRAMATIC HIGHLIGHT of the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting was the helicopter landing of Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg on the Unity House lawn to address the council. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany thanks the secretary for his visit as the Marine-piloted "whirlybird" prepares to fly him back to Washington.

New Legislation Held Needed in Rights Field

Unity House, Pa.—Enactment of federal and state legislation "to enforce fair employment and fair housing and to safeguard . . . the basic civil rights of every American" is essential to "speedy racial justice," the AFL-CIO Executive Council has declared.

The federation leadership approved a resolution at the council's midsummer session here asserting that "faith in freedom and justice here at home must not be betrayed."

The statement declared that "brutal attacks and mob violence against peaceful citizens, who have faith in the law of the land and who have faith in freedom, cannot be permitted or tolerated," and it called on "all those who either perpetuate or condone acts of race hate and acts of violence prompted by race hate to cease and desist."

The Executive Council commended Pres. John F. Kennedy for his Executive Order establishing the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, and declared that labor is "encouraged by the firmness of the initial steps" taken by the committee.

"We shall extend to the committee," the council said, "every assistance and press for the effectuation of its mandate with speed and determination."

At the same time, the AFL-CIO declared that "no matter how well designed, executive action is no substitute for legislation," and added:

"We must urgently insist on the enactment by Congress of an enforceable Fair Employment Practices Act outlawing discrimination because of race, creed, color or national origin in all employment in interstate commerce and in production of goods and services for interstate commerce.

"We call on all organized labor and an all friends of organized labor to join in this urgent and vital task of abolishing in America all discrimination . . . including those vestiges that inexcusably remain within the trade union movement."

The council noted that "important gains" have been made at the state level in recent months through enactment of new fair housing laws; laws against discrimination in public accommodations, in public transport and in colleges and universities; and laws enforcing fair employment practices.

"Every one of these advances," the Executive Council said, "has been made with the help of leadership and massive support of the trade union movement in each state."

In another action, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany named a three-man subcommittee to analyze a memorandum on civil rights presented by Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph.

The committee will be headed by Vice Pres. George M. Harrison, and will include Vice Presidents Jacob S. Potofsky and Richard F. Walsh. It will report its recommendations to the next council session.

Reorganization, Upgrading:

Revision of USES Proposed by Council

Unity House, Pa.—A "complete reorganization and upgrading" of the U.S. Employment Service to provide an "effective" federal program of job placement and employment counseling has been called for by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

In a statement adopted at its session here, the council said a national employment service should be "an essential part of the labor market structure of an industrial society," and added that establishment of such a system is "long overdue."

The AFL-CIO leaders, referring to key Kennedy Administration proposals for putting America back to work, declared that "no genuine program that aims for full employment, including the retraining and relocation of many displaced workers," can be successful without a federal job placement service.

Only during wartime, the Executive Council said, has the nation had such a federal service. At present, state employment offices operate on a "decentralized" basis, with at best only "weak and haphazard" exercise of federal authority.

"By failing to keep up with changes in employment and skill requirements," the council said, "the employment service offices have permitted private agencies to develop lucrative high-fee business operations that frequently misrepresent job opportunities."

The Executive Council was critical of those instances of "discriminatory and segregationist practices" engaged in by the employment service. It declared:

"Not only are the segregated facilities an affront to the dignity of American workers, but the racially segregated job-opening files maintained by the service in a number of southern states results in camouflaging discriminatory hiring policies of firms holding government contracts. These are intolerable practices for a service financed 100 percent by the federal government."

In urging reorganization of the USES, the council made it plain that what is needed is more than "the addition of funds and personnel," declaring that "merely more of the same cannot possibly produce the kind of national employment service that is needed."

The AFL-CIO called for "complete separation" of the employment service from the unemployment insurance system, and the development of "broad-gauged" services for both employers and workers.

AFL-CIO Asks Volunteers for Peace Corps

Unity House, Pa.—All AFL-CIO affiliates have been urged to assist in making the peace corps "a successful and enduring program" by encouraging the enlistment of volunteers from labor's ranks.

The federation's Executive Council adopted a statement supporting the peace corps and declaring the AFL-CIO believes that such programs "are not solely the concern of governments."

"Vital institutions in developing societies, such as free trade unions, should be taken into partnership in developing peace corps programs," the resolution asserted.

American labor, said the council, knows from its long history of international cooperation that the peace corps is only one aspect of foreign relations, that "it will not, by itself, solve the enormous problems of hunger and disease which afflict so many of our brethren." The council added:

"However, it can serve as a real contribution in our struggle to help establish social, economic and political justice throughout the world."

The statement noted that AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne and Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building and Construction Trades Dept. are serving on the peace corps advisory committee and have called for mobilization of the energies and skills of American workers to assist new nations to spark their industrial development.

Food & Beverage Trades Dept. Chartered by Executive Council

Unity House, Pa.—A Food & Beverage Trades Dept. to deal with the special problems and concerns of AFL-CIO affiliates in the food and beverage industry has been chartered by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The council approved the charter application and a constitution for the new department submitted by nine federation affiliates. The new department is estimated to have one million members who are engaged in the manufacture, production, processing, sale and distribution of food and beverage products.

The nine AFL-CIO unions submitting the charter application and who will make up the department for that part of their membership engaged in the food and beverage industry are:

American Federation of Grain Millers.

Distillery, Rectifying & Wine Workers.

Hotel & Restaurant Employes and Bartenders Intl. Union.

Amalgamated Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen.

Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union.

American Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

Retail Clerks Intl. Association.

United Packinghouse, Food & Allied Workers.

Seafarers Intl. Union of North America.

The charter application was submitted to the council at its February meeting but final action was put over to the next meeting to allow a more detailed study of the proposed constitution.

The constitution calls for the creation of local food and beverage trades councils to be chartered by the department. A major objective will be to protect and safeguard "the health and well-being of the consumers of food and beverage products and the advancement of the welfare and interests of all workers engaged in the food and beverage trades industry."

The activities of the new department will be financed in the main by a per capita tax of 1 cent per member per month paid by each affiliated international or national union for those of its members engaged in the food and beverage trade industry. Conventions will be held every two years. The department will have a president, secretary-treasurer and vice presidents equal to the number of affiliates with each affiliate selecting its own vice president.

Any questions arising on membership eligibility of an AFL-CIO affiliate that cannot be resolved by the new department will be taken to the AFL-CIO Executive Council for decision.

The Food & Beverage Trades Dept. will become the seventh trade and industrial department in the AFL-CIO. The others are the Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Industrial Union Dept.; Maritime Trades Dept.; Metal Trades Dept., Railroad Employes' Dept.; Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

paign started in May 1959 has been 1,500.

He noted that the federation's total expenditure will exceed $500,000 and that it can spend only a certain amount of money in any one area. Meany said the Packinghouse Workers and the Meat Cutters are both working in the area and are interested in the AWOC members.

The success in the farm area, Meany stressed, has been in compelling employers to raise wages, but he added they are "still too low."

● The chartering of a new and seventh AFL-CIO department—the Food & Beverage Trade Dept.—to handle the special problems and concerns of workers in the industry. The petition for a charter was signed by nine AFL-CIO affiliates. It is estimated that the department will have about 1 million members.

● The authorization of a two-day conference on labor and higher education to be conducted by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education in Washington, in cooperation with the American Association of Land-Grant Colleges and State Universities.

● The referral to the executive officers of a request for a federal charter by an organization of employes of the Ladies' Garment Workers Union.

General Board To Meet Oct. 9

Unity House, Pa. — The AFL-CIO General Board, composed of representatives of all federation affiliates and trade departments as well as the Executive Council, will meet in New York City Oct. 9 for a one-day session on organizing problems.

The Executive Council will open its fall session on Oct. 10 in the same city.

In the legislative area the council:

● Commended Pres. Kennedy for his "forthright" executive order establishing the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity and pledged "every assistance" to help it effectuate its mandate.

The statement called also for congressional approval of "enforceable" fair employment practices legislation and requested "all organized labor" to join in the urgent and vital task of abolishing all discrimination based on race, creed, color or national origin, "including those vestiges that inexcusably remain within the trade union movement itself."

● Called for an effective national employment service to meet the problems of technological change and high unemployment, including a "complete separation of the employment service from the unemployment insurance system" and an end to discriminatory and "segregationist practices" engaged in by the employment service.

● Recommended early adoption by Congress of the McCarthy-King bill carrying out the Administration's proposals for updating the jobless benefits program and providing a fairer distribution of the social costs of unemployment "now borne primarily by the nation's wage and salary earners."

● Called for support of the peace corps by all AFL-CIO affiliates by encouraging the enlistment of volunteers from labor's ranks.

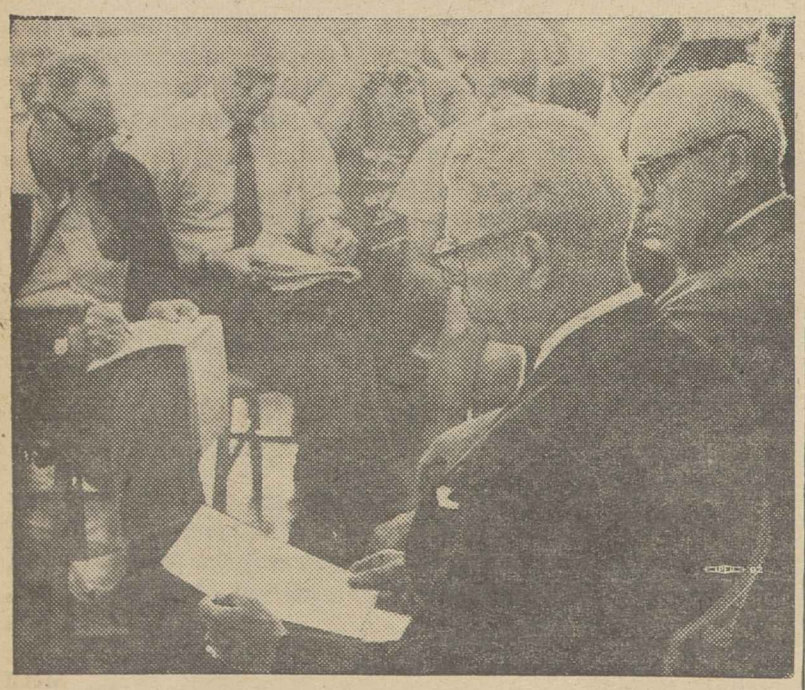
In actions affecting strikes, the council:

● Supported the request of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers for a nationwide boycott of Peter Paul candies until the company reinstates workers dismissed because of union activity.

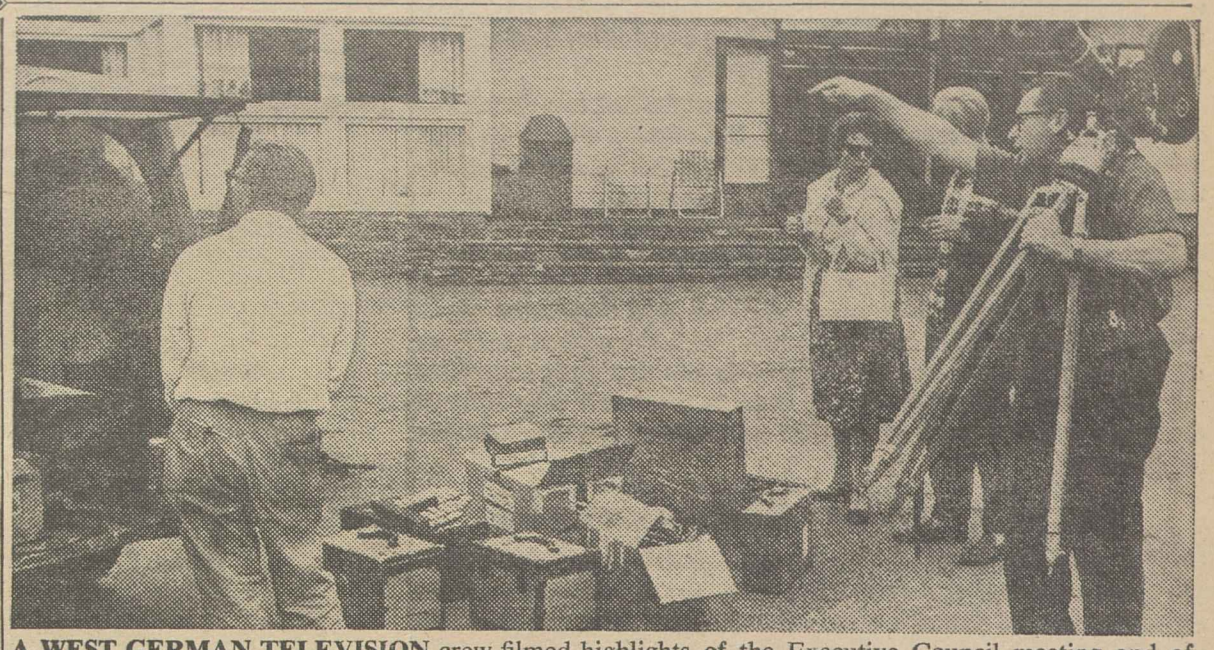
● Welcomed the court decision in the Peyton Packing Co. case for "greatly strengthening the authority of the Secretary of Labor to prevent importation of strikebreakers." The council stressed that while it wants "no closed borders" in the American hemisphere, trade unionists in the U.S., Mexico, and Canada "do not want commuting workers used to undermine wages and working conditions or to act as strikebreakers."

● Assailed the use of "federal courts as a strikebreaking medium" by television station KXTV in Sacramento, Calif., in a walkout involving the Broadcast Employes & Technicians. The council said the strike is a "graphic illustration" of how the "most vicious provisions" of the Landrum-Griffin Act can be used to oppose a legitimate walkout. The station is owned by John Whitney, publisher of the New York Herald Tribune.

● Protested to Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges over use of an exhibit in a trade fair at Lima, Peru, of a Sears, Roebuck store as a typical American store. The AFL-CIO has been supporting a Retail Clerks' nationwide boycott of Sears because of its labor relations policies.



THANKS FROM Pres. Kennedy to the AFL-CIO for its support of Administration policies and its firm position on international affairs is read to reporters at Unity House by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg on his arrival to address the Executive Council.



A WEST GERMAN TELEVISION crew filmed highlights of the Executive Council meeting and of Unity House activities after earlier work at AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington. The firm plans to use the film in a documentary on American labor.

Backing Given Kennedy Program To Overhaul Jobless Pay System

Unity House, Pa.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has endorsed Pres. John F. Kennedy's plan for permanent overhaul of the federal-state unemployment compensation program and has declared its "early adoption" by Congress would go "a long way toward meeting deficiencies in the system."

Noting that organized labor long has called for modernization of the jobless insurance system, the council said that if the pending proposal had been adopted earlier "the severity of the last two recessions would have been greatly mitigated."

The Administration proposal, contained in legislation sponsored by Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) and Rep. Cecil R. King (D-Calif.), would set federal standards, below which the states could not fall, on the amount—but not the duration—of weekly benefits.

The measure also would broaden coverage to include 3 million more workers, provide additional federal aid for long-term unemployed who are regularly part of the labor force, provide a standby program of temporary extension which would be triggered automatically in recession periods, and raise the unemployment insurance tax base from $3,000 to $4,800.

The Executive Council said the program aims at "a fairer distribution of the social costs of unemployment," and noted that this burden is currently "borne primarily by the nation's wage and salary earners."

It pointed out that since enactment of the unemployment insurance law in 1935 "nothing has been done to correct basic deficiencies" which have developed over the years. Chief among these, it said, has been the continued slippage in the ratio between weekly benefits and lost wages.

The AFL-CIO pointed to one weakness in the Administration bill—its failure to put a floor under the duration period for jobless benefits — and indicated there is a need for a minimum 26-week period. It added:

"However, there is no question that [the McCarthy-King bill] is a positive step toward modernizing the jobless pay system."

In addition to covering more workers and yielding greater replacement of lost wages, the council said, the Administration plan "will provide more interim assistance to unemployed families who are now bearing the cost of technological change and economic readjustment," and will "also enhance the effectiveness of the jobless pay program as an economic stabilizer."

The Kennedy program would:

● Require states to provide benefits equal to 50 percent of the individual's normal wage, not to exceed half of each state's average weekly wage, beginning in 1964. This would rise to 60 percent of the state's average weekly wage in 1966, and to two-thirds in 1968.

● Prohibit states from denying benefits to claimants undergoing approved job training.

● Establish a permanent program of additional compensation so that long-term jobless, beginning in the 27th week of unemployment, would be entitled to federal benefits for half the period of state benefits up to a maximum of 13 added weeks.

● Cover employes of nonprofit organizations and workers engaged in agricultural processing, and increase coverage from firms with four or more employes to firms with one or more workers.

● Set up, on a standby basis, an emergency program of temporary extension of unemployment compensation, with federal rather than state benefits, to be triggered when nationwide insured unemployment is 5 percent or more for three consecutive months—providing that, during the same period, the total number exhausting regular benefits exceeds 1 percent of those covered.

● Increase the annual earnings on which employers now pay unemployment compensation taxes from the present $3,000—a base unchanged in a quarter-century—to $4,800.

The latter figure is the same base used in figuring employer-employe social security taxes. The bill would also continue indefinitely the temporary increase of four-tenths of 1 percent in taxes enacted to finance the present temporary extension of jobless aid.

Postal Transport Union Votes 3-1 for Merger

Members of the Postal Transport Association have voted 10,263 to 3,397 in a mail referendum to join in a three-way merger establishing the United Federation of Postal Clerks.

Two of the unions involved—the 92,000-member Post Office Clerks and the previously unaffiliated 25,000-member United National Association of Post Office Craftsmen—formally merged at a special convention held in April.

A convention of the 21,000-member NPTA, held at the same time, voted to refer ratification of the merger to referendum after it narrowly failed to get the two-thirds vote required for convention action.

With NPTA's national officers strongly favoring the merger, the proposal won handily in 13 of the union's 15 regions. A statement by Pres. Paul A. Nagle hailed the ratification action and declared:

"By their votes the members of NPTA have proven dramatically their determination to attain a truly unified postal employe labor movement under the proud banner of the AFL-CIO. This action brings within reach the ultimate goal of one postal union."

E. C. Hallbeck, who has been president of the Post Office Clerks and remains as president of the merged union, expressed the hope that the National Postal Clerks Union, an unaffiliated group which broke away from the Post Office Clerks three years ago, would join in the merger.

Under the unity agreement, which took effect immediately upon ratification, Nagle became administrative vice president of the Postal Clerks. NPTA's industrial secretary, Wallace J. Legge, was named assistant secretary-treasurer and NPTA Vice Pres. William E. Price became research and education director of the merged union.

The NPTA, one of the oldest postal unions, was founded in 1891 as the Railway Mail Association. Reorganizations of the Post Office Dept. in recent years which brought railway mail clerks under the supervision of local postmasters resulted in growing sentiment for merger within the organization. The union's officers originally sought unification with the Letter Carriers but a proposed merger was rejected by the NPTA membership in a 1960 referendum.

Negotiations for merger were subsequently begun with the Post Office Clerks after the NPTA's 1960 convention endorsed the goal of unity of all postal unions.

Finish the Job

THE FIRST SESSION of the 87th Congress has rolled up an impressive legislative record in its first six months. Laws providing for aid to depressed areas, improvements in the minimum wage, increased social security benefits, new housing programs, temporary extension of unemployment compensation and aid to dependent children are on the statute books.

This six-month record—by far the best of the last two decades—can take on even greater significance if Congress will in its final months move decisively in the other areas requiring urgent legislative attention.

Topping the agenda as Congress heads into the home stretch are federal aid to education, health care for the aged and a meaningful foreign aid program based on long-term planning and financing.

The first six months—coming after an arid legislative era—have instilled new hope that when faced with the critical problems of the day Congress can come up with the necessary legislative solutions. Full realization of this hope is a distinct possibility if Congress will clean up its agenda of national problems before adjournment.

Stuck with Joblessness

THE LABOR DEPT. report on unemployment in June underscores emphatically AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's recent comment that the nation will not have emerged from the recession until the unemployment situation is solved.

Last month there were 5.6 million persons looking for nonexistent jobs. A year earlier, in June 1960, unemployment was 4.4 million.

The seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment at 6.8 percent of the labor force in June is virtually unchanged for the past seven months. The number of workers jobless for 27 weeks or more was more than double that of a year ago; the number of persons jobless 15 weeks or more was almost twice the number for the same month a year earlier.

All this adds up to no visible progress in solving the acute unemployment problem regardless of what other economic indicators show. Until unemployment starts moving downward in all categories, the recession is still with us.

The Meaning of Aid

THE OPPONENTS of the Administration's foreign aid program for the most part are throwing up a smog of contrived and confusing arguments designed to exploit the shallow, narrow self-interest that they believe to be the dominant mood in the nation today.

The AFL-CIO framed the issue in terms of the fundamental principles and traditions of America when it told the House Foreign Affairs Committee:

"It is undoubtedly true that a major reason why we have continued our foreign aid program for so long a span is the threat of world communism. That's certainly a worthy motive, not just as a measure of self-preservation, but as a means of protecting others from tyranny.

"However, we in the labor movement go a step further. We believe this program would be wholly justified even if the Soviet Union and Red China didn't exist. We believe it would be justified by principles that were 19 centuries old before Karl Marx was born—the principles that lead us to help the needy and to extend the hand of brotherhood to all mankind."

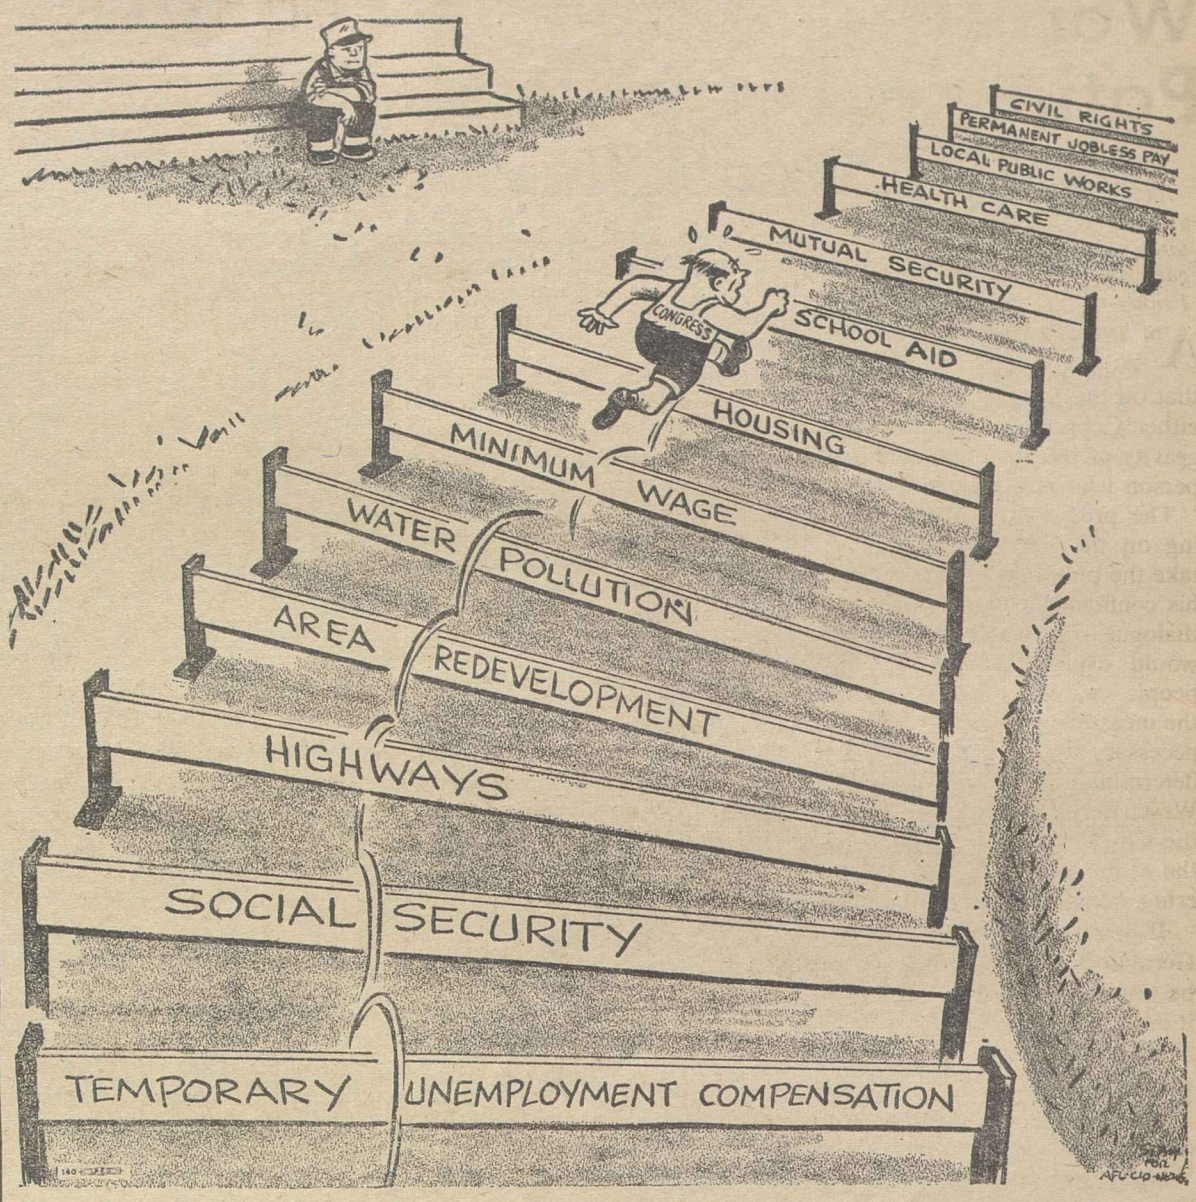
Plenty of Hurdles Ahead



Southern Publisher Speaks:

States Seen as Real Agitators In Attacks on Freedom Riders

Ralph McGill, publisher of the Atlanta Constitution, was chosen by the 27,000-member Local 6 of the Hotel & Restaurant Workers in New York for its annual Better Race Relations Award. Following are excerpts from his acceptance speech:

By Ralph McGill

THE SIT-INS, the Freedom Riders, the mobs about schools all reveal the folly of those who are trying to keep the past upon the throne.

The sit-ins had the great value of dramatizing a moral issue and awakening conscience. They had yet another effect. They demonstrated the economic power of the Negro in southern communities. This was wholesome.

There was a third result. It should not be overlooked that in every city where sit-ins occurred, white students joined with Negro students in the demonstration.

I remember talking with a young Negro in Tallahassee, where one of the first sit-ins occurred. He told me that when he and his friends went into the drugstore they were, quite understandably, tense.

"When we saw the white students come in to sit with us," he said, "the emotional reaction was such that some of us burst into tears."

If I could do one thing here, I would like to emphasize that too often mobs seem to represent the whole face of the South only because the political leadership of the states involved hold all the reins of power in their hands and local leadership has not stood up to be counted.

There is a story of mutual progress in the South, and I ask that it be neither forgotten nor ignored as, in righteous indignation, we condemn all that is wicked and evil.

The Freedom Riders . . . also are a demonstration of morality. One might have some doubts about the wisdom of some few of the procedures, but they have been a strong moral asset because they have revealed the central fact which is that the real agitators are the states involved.

These states invoke state laws which, wherever they have been tested, have been declared unconstitutional. When citizenship rights are denied, who is agitating? Who is provoking whom?

One of the frustrating paradoxes of the situation is that Montgomery's local buses have for three years been desegregated, following the success of Martin Luther King's passive resistance program in that city. It is very likely that members of Montgomery's mob had that day ridden on desegregated buses.

These mobs . . . are evidence that those who defy the processes of law realize that the ball game is over—and that they are losing it. They are a reminder, too, to those chambers of commerce and businessmen in the cities who have permitted themselves to be paralyzed by the Klans and their white-collar counterpart, the Citizen's Councils, that business and industry must respond to morality and law, and to the Constitution, or suffer grievously.

IT ALREADY is evident that those states which do not manage an honorable acceptance of responsibility will deteriorate in income, population and education. The states which act responsibly will profit materially and spiritually.

There is not and never has been a region which could be confined in the phrase "The South." There are many Souths. There are many brave and honorable people there who are standing against violence and idiocy and intellectual dishonesty which is so often used to rationalize injustice.

I know of no sadder persons than those southern governors, editors, businessmen and southerners in Congress who have committed themselves to the ugly proposition that they will defy the courts and deny the constitutional rights of citizens. Many of them privately are ashamed. The more callous are the more angry and defiant.

The grounds for maneuver and phony rationalization of injustice and illegality are about gone. The issue now is seen in stark simplicity—do all citizens of this country have equal rights or don't they? This country must give answer.

Morgan Says:

Worldwide Struggle Requires Patience, Power from America

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

AN IMPORTANT MEMBER of the Kennedy Administration says privately and somberly that on the basis of what he knew he didn't think either Congress or the country was aware of the gravity of the world situation. There is only one person who can tell them, he said: the President.

The pressure is growing on the President to take the public more into his confidence, to start a dialogue in which he would explain, and the people would discuss, the measures that may be necessary to support our determination to defend West Berlin. And yet the Chief Executive is at the center here of a towering dilemma.

Morgan

If he sets the country in motion too soon on the German crisis, its great lumbering momentum may be too strong for him to stop if he needs to stop it before a collision. If he sets it in motion too late, Khrushchev is apt to assume the President's serious words at Vienna were no more than words.

SO TIMING IS CRUCIAL here and so is the degree of action. It is reliably reported that the White House is not thinking in terms of mobilization now but in terms of a series of quiet decisions, some military, some political, some economic, which would add up to increasing preparedness.

The Pentagon's latest leak mistakenly puts too much emphasis on the military. When somebody talks of evacuating U.S. dependents from "exposed positions" in Germany and France, of putting NATO on a battle-ready basis and of commandeering commercial planes, this is all very exciting and it appeals to the impatient but characteristic American fancy for quick action and fast solutions. But as Sen. Fulbright said in a major foreign policy speech on the Senate floor, this inclination "to be more responsive to dramatic events than to the hard continuing struggle itself" may be no longer relevant "to our present role as defenders of western civilization."

Berlin is not just the site of a potential fire. It is the symbol of a new test of strength between the Communist and the non-Communist worlds. We need fire-fighting equipment on hand but this is only part of what we need. The test stretches from Berlin to Burma, from Germany to Johannesburg and we must stretch our vision and our power and our patience with it, not aim everything nervously at one place.

Power is necessary, perceptive policies are vital but style, that is to say, performance as a nation, is also required, Fulbright told the Senate. "In the present struggle," he said, "style is as important as power. They have a one-to-one relationship."

Up to now our style, our national performance, has been jerky, breathlessly trying to apply short-term measures to get things done quickly, to get them fixed and out of mind. Berlin is threatened so let's get it unthreatened. Castro is a bully and a bearded nuisance so let's clobber him. The Communists are infiltrating Laos so let's seal off the border and make those lotus eaters love us.

If I were the leader of an uncommitted country, Fulbright said, this—in effect—would be my policy: No political alignment with either power bloc. I'd seek economic and technical aid from the U.S. I might take some from the Communist bloc too, not unaware of communism's ultimate plans for us, but I would discreetly inform Washington that guns or even dollars cannot keep communism out of my country. Imaginatively, dispassionately supporting my efforts to promote my people's welfare would help. If communism should attack me overtly I'd ask for U.S. and allied military support. To counter Communist terror and subversion internally I would seek American technical military assistance and more economic aid.

If I headed a new so-called neutralist country, Fulbright went on, I would have silently identified my hopes for the future with American leadership. And despairing of consistently wise American leadership, as I often would, I would remind my U.S. colleagues that the Soviet revolution occurred more recently than theirs, and its heirs are adroit in trimming their sails to the revolutionary winds of change around the world.

Yet much of the world remembers what the American revolution has accomplished. ["It is not our affluence or our plumbing or our clogged freeways that grip (their) imagination (but) the values upon which our system is built."] "And the countless millions who do remember—whether in Vietnam, Iran, Cuba or elsewhere—hope and insist that the spirit and intelligence that inspired America's revolution will animate America's foreign policy."

There is a pattern of national performance, a style, for you. It won't work in the crisis of Berlin without power and the resolve to use same, but power won't work elsewhere without it and let us remember that we are engaged with the Communists everywhere, not just Berlin.

2 Senators Hold West Berlin Worth Danger of Atomic War

THE WEST SHOULD DARE to risk a thermonuclear war to save West Berlin, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.), Democratic whip, and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 450 radio stations.

"The issue isn't just West Berlin," Humphrey declared. "West Berlin stands as a symbol not only of freedom behind the Iron Curtain, a symbol of courage and patriotism, but it stands also as a test of American sincerity, of the sincerity of the West, of our honor, our commitments. And I believe that if the U.S. and our allies were to betray West Berlin, we would, for all practical purposes, be through as a world power and indeed as a moral force in the world."

"War may be possible, but at the same time, the preservation of peace and freedom requires risks," Javits said. "I believe the alternative [to standing firm] in Berlin would be the signal to all of Europe that we intend to give up so far as the Communists are concerned. This alternative is so dire and serious a threat to our very survival that we do not dare to undertake it, notwithstanding the risk."

Henry Cox, public affairs adviser in the Office of German Affairs at the State Dept., said on the same program that the present crisis began in November 1958 when Chairman Khrushchev asserted in a speech in Moscow that "it was high time the so-called occupation status of West Berlin should be lifted, that western forces should be withdrawn from the city and that the city should be transformed into what he called a free city."

JAVITS SPOKE OUT against a recent proposal by Sen. Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) that all Berlin be made a free city.

"The way the Communists operate," he said, "they would speedily infiltrate and subvert a 'free city' Berlin. They can starve it because they surround it if we are not there physically seeing to its preservation."

Javits said he did not think that Khrushchev's threat of signing a peace treaty with East Germany would make a unified Germany impossible.

"I do not believe it because everybody knows that the East German government is Communist, a tool of Khrushchev, and the East German people are still to be reckoned with," he said.

Humphrey declared that we should not accept a permanent division of Germany as inevitable.

"We should accept as inevitable our determination to bring about a resolution of the problems in Central Europe and our determination to have the Soviet Union fulfill its agreement for self-determination by the German people of Germany's future," he said.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

IN THE AFTERMATH of a major national election, such as last year's, there is bound to be political ferment in the party that loses. For the Republican Party the process has been marked by the rise of Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz.) whose self-proclaimed conservatism has long been pleasing to many of the GOP county chairman.

Goldwater was the unrivaled hero of the recent Young Republican conference in Minneapolis. The passionately conservative college students and young businessmen gathered there managed to avoid electing as president an open supporter of Goldwater, but they gave the senator a welcome vastly warmer than they managed to work up for their party's presidential nominee in 1960, Richard M. Nixon.

Their platform repeated cliches of the right-wing GOP familiar across 30 years. They proposed tax policies to "permit the accumulation of capital and encourage its use"—as if they had no knowledge that personal wealth has proliferated under the present tax structure that they apparently think is confiscatory.

They asserted a belief in an "independent" Federal Reserve Board—and assuredly they didn't realize that so redoubtable a conservative as Herbert Hoover repeatedly tried to get then Pres. Calvin Coolidge to use political power with the Reserve Board to curb stockmarket speculation before the great crash of 1929.

AS FOR THE REST, the Young Republicans want the government to stay out of the power field and "turn existing projects over to private enterprise." (There comes the Tennessee Valley Authority battle again.) They believe joblessness arises from wage rates pushed too high. They want foreign aid withdrawn from young countries that don't follow a path to what they call "capitalist economies," although the governments of all emerging nations clearly feel an absolute necessity to guide and to some measure control their economic development.

Goldwater, of course, was the real hero of the Republican National Convention last year although the delegates nominated Nixon. He got an ovation from the Platform Committee in Chicago while New York's Gov. Rockefeller's reception was almost chilling in its bare courtesy. The GOP would have made Goldwater Nixon's running-mate had the delegates dared.

The nomination of Goldwater for the presidency in 1964 seems to most political observers highly unlikely. Eastern and Pacific Coast Republican leaders—say, Sen. Clifford Case of New Jersey—would shudder at having their state candidates run with the Arizona senator heading the ticket. Senators who come from sparsely settled states face a built-in handicap.

STILL, Goldwater has emerged from the intra-party wrangling about why Nixon lost last November as a more formidable force than most observers foresaw two or three years ago. His increased leadership may compel Nixon to run for governor of California next year to try to re-establish a specific political base rather than leave himself in the convention as a candidate out of office for four years. Nixon, of course, must also take account of Rockefeller's certain drive for the nomination if he is re-elected next year to a second term as governor of New York.

Democratic factionalism in New York City gives Rockefeller ample reason to hope for re-election, and it is reasonably clear that he will do everything possible to build a nationwide organization far in advance of the convention.

A three-way battle for control of the convention may develop—with Nixon and Rockefeller the principal rivals for the nomination but with Goldwater having basic strength that would make him a key figure. The new chairman of the Republican National Committee, Rep. William E. Miller (N. Y.), says that he thinks competition for the nomination will stir up interest and strengthen the party's chances in the election.

BERLIN IS A SYMBOL of freedom for 17 million Germans in Communist East Germany, and of the steadfastness and honor of the free West according to Sen. Hubert Humphrey (Minn.), Democratic whip (left); Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) and Henry Cox (right), public affairs officer, Office of German Affairs, Dept. of State, in interviews on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public affairs educational radio program.

Progress Report on the 87th Congress

At its meeting Jan. 5, 1961, the AFL-CIO Executive Council adopted a 20-point legislative program. A scorecard of progress on that program thus far in the 87th Congress follows:

ISSUE	AFL-CIO POSITION	STATUS
AID TO DEPRESSED AREAS: Local communities with high, chronic unemployment need federal aid to encourage new industry, retrain workers for new jobs.	Executive Council called for a "bold program of loans and grants for vocational retraining, essential public works, plant construction and technical assistance to encourage establishment of new plants . . ."	Congress passed and the President signed a $394 million law meeting most AFL-CIO objectives.
HOUSING AND URBAN RENEWAL: Federal aid needed to help eradicate blight in cities, provide low-cost public housing, and encourage private housing construction for families with moderate incomes.	Council asked action "to meet one of America's sorest problems and to help put America back to work." Also called for a new Dept. of Urban Affairs in the government.	Congress passed $4.9 billion measure expanding urban renewal and public housing programs, and establishing new program of long-term, low down-payment loans for moderate income housing. Hearings have been held on bill establishing Dept. of Urban Affairs.
AID TO EDUCATION: Local school agencies have been unable to finance needed school construction, adequate teachers' salaries to attract and hold teachers.	Council called for federal aid for school construction to "improve our educational plant and also help provide jobs for thousands." Also asked aid for teachers' salaries.	Senate passed $2.5 billion program of aid for construction and teachers' salaries. A $2.4 billion bill reported by House Labor Committee, now before Rules Committee.
MINIMUM WAGE: Fairness and economic reality demand an increase in the $1 minimum wage, plus extension of the protection of the law to millions of workers not covered.	Council called for action "in 1961 . . . in order to bring a measure of economic justice to workers and to add to the purchasing power on which economic recovery depends."	Congress passed and the President signed a bill extending coverage to 3.6 million workers not now covered, raising minimum to $1.25 an hour for them after 4 years, for presently covered workers after two years.
HEALTH BENEFITS FOR AGED: Mounting costs of medical care, plus greater need for care by retired people, make passage of Anderson-King bill proposed by Pres. Kennedy an urgent necessity. The bill would provide a system of hospitalization, nursing home and home nursing insurance for the aged under social security.	Council said "Congress should proceed at once to pass this sound and humane system for meeting one of the prime needs of our senior citizens."	Hearings have been scheduled by the House Ways & Means Committee, where social security legislation must originate.
UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE: Inadequate state unemployment compensation makes federal action to establish minimum benefit and duration standards necessary. Recession-born unemployment necessitated action to provide extended benefits for those who had exhausted their rights.	Council asked "immediate action . . . to restore unemployment payments to those whose rights have been exhausted, to extend the duration of payments to those now receiving them and to set a realistic floor under their amount."	Pres. Kennedy has proposed legislation, introduced by Rep. King and Sen. McCarthy, to extend coverage, set a floor of one half of a worker's average weekly wage up to an eventual maximum of two-thirds of the state's average weekly wage, and extend duration under certain conditions. No action has been taken. Congress earlier passed temporary emergency bill for those whose benefits were exhausted.
TAX REVISION FOR ECONOMIC GROWTH: Tax loopholes drain off substantial federal revenue and give special groups unfair privilege. Tax system is too inflexible to be used efficiently as an economic tool.	"The federal tax system should be flexible enough to aid in spurring economic recovery and encouraging economic growth," said the council in urging Congress to give the President the power temporarily to reduce taxes. Council also asked for closing of tax loopholes.	President proposed closing some tax loopholes, but also asked for new and unneeded investment tax credit for business. Hearings have been concluded by House Ways & Means Committee.
PUBLIC WORKS: Expanding needs for highways, airports and other public works, plus poverty of state and local governments, makes federal action necessary. Public works can also help reduce unemployment.	Council said "federal programs for the construction of hospitals, roads and airports . . . should be expanded by more generous appropriations, both to provide more employment and to help reduce our chronic shortage of these facilities."	Senate committee has concluded hearings on Clark bill to spur construction of public works in times of high unemployment. President has signed bill assuring continuation of federal highway program. Hearings on accelerated airport construction bills have been concluded.
FEDERAL RESERVE POLICY: Federal Reserve Board has failed to use its full powers to cut interest rates, spur economic recovery. Membership of board does not reflect views of differing economic groups in the nation.	"Our monetary policies should be designed to influence our industrial technological progress consistent with our economic growth." Board membership should "insure competent representation of all basic functional economic groups . . . "	Board policies are not basically a legislative problem. No action has been taken on FRB membership.
MIGRANT WORKERS: Migratory farm workers are the most depressed group in our society. They are subject to periodic unemployment, low wages, poor living conditions, lack of educational facilities. They are denied protection of most social legislation.	The problems of migratory labor "must be vigorously dealt with on all fronts—wages, housing, education, social security and public health." The importation of Mexican farm workers "should be discontinued as quickly as possible."	Hearings have been concluded in both houses on bills to protect migrants. Bill extending Mexican farm worker importation passed House without reforms.
COMPREHENSIVE LABOR LEGISLATION: Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin laws make organizing, collective bargaining difficult for unions. Anti-racketeering sections of Landrum-Griffin do not adequately curtail management corruption.	Council asserted that "both the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts contain provisions which harshly and unfairly limit the freedom of workers to organize and bargain collectively."	No action in either house.
SITUS PICKETING: Supreme Court interpretation of Taft-Hartley Act unfairly restricts right to strike on multi-employer jobs.	"Simple justice demands early action" on legislation to remove restrictions on right to picket construction sites," council said.	Hearings concluded by House committee.
ATOMIC ENERGY: The nation has been lagging in development of peacetime uses of the atom, while the Soviet Union and Great Britain have made substantial progress. Protection of workers from atomic hazards is inadequate.	Council asked expanded federal program to develop peaceful uses of atomic energy, and "an effective comprehensive federal program to control atomic radiation," provide federal workmen's compensation for atomic workers.	Bill reported in House to provide facilities for production of electric power at reactor in Hanford, Wash.
NATURAL RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT: Increasing demands for water, recreational areas, and other natural resources require forthright action for intelligent conservation and development.	The council noted that "a bold program of land and water development on a river basin approach is urgent. An adequate program of water pollution control cannot wait any longer."	Expanded water pollution control bill passed by Congress.
CIVIL RIGHTS: Continuing deprivation of civil rights of minority groups requires federal enforcement action.	Council called for increased federal powers to assure civil rights for all Americans, to guarantee equal employment opportunities and to eliminate voting restrictions.	No action has been taken by Congress. The Aministration has announced its intention to utilize full presidential powers to insure civil rights.
IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE REFORM: Outmoded immigration laws discriminate against certain nations, and the number of immigrants is kept unnecessarily low.	Council asked that the existing system be revamped to remove discriminatory features, to increase the quota to 250,000 anually, and provide for admission of refugees.	No action in either house.
MUTUAL SECURITY: Newly emerging nations and increased competition for support by the Soviet Union pose a serious challenge to freedom in the world.	"In the newly emerging nations of the world, economic and technical assistance from democratic nations can make the difference between freedom and tyranny for the people," said the council.	Hearings concluded by Senate, in progress in House. Pres. Kennedy has asked for long-term development loans to assure continuing progress.
FEDERAL EMPLOYES: No formal recognition of the right to bargain collectively exists for federal employes.	Council called for legislation giving "statutory certification to bona fide trade unions of federal employes."	Pres. Kennedy has formed cabinet level committee to recommend executive action on recognition and bargaining.
FARM LEGISLATION: Existing farm programs have injured family farmer, failed to prevent decreases in farm income.	"We favor the enactment of legislation which will wherever possible base price support on production payments aimed at support of the family farm and lower prices to consumers."	Hearings on general farm legislation giving greater authority to control production to the farmers themselves have been held in both houses.
NATIONAL DEFENSE: Strong defense forces to meet "brushfire" wars as well as major wars are needed to deter aggression.	We need "a defense establishment equipped to cope with small crises as well as large ones; with limited as well as total war."	House has passed defense spending bill increasing funds for military preparedness.

AFL-CIO Tells House:

Long-Range Loans Vital to Foreign Aid

The Kennedy Administration's foreign aid proposals, "combining unified administration, long-term funding and a vigorous and intelligent new approach," will "go far" toward making the program effective, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller has testified before the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

In expressing the AFL-CIO's "full endorsement" of the Kennedy program, Biemiller read into the record the text of the resolution the AFL-CIO Executive Council had adopted the week before at its meeting in Unity House, Pa.

The resolution gave labor's "general support" to the program and said the council was "particularly glad" to endorse it "because it includes a number of policies which have been advocated in the past by the AFL-CIO."

Biemiller told the committee that the President's plan for unified administration and making development loan funds available on a long-term basis was "welcome" to labor. He also asserted that foreign aid must be "more intelligently applied" and "must be tailored to the real needs of the recipient country."

"I submit there is nothing new or novel about the President's emphasis on long-term commitment," he added.

No Partisan Undertaking

"It recognizes the fundamental necessity for assuring both other nations and our own that we are engaging in a continuing association that is not subject to the changing tides of political life, that this is a national commitment, not a partisan undertaking.

"The President's proposal . . . fulfills exactly the purpose of that standard contract phrase that an agreement is binding on 'heirs, assignees and successors.' It proposes exactly the same kind of contract Congress has repeatedly made with the several states, as recently as passage of the highway bill. . . . No state could afford to enter into long-term undertakings such as national highways if it expected annually that the axe might fall and the project disappear.

"The nations receiving our aid must have the same feeling of confidence. They should not be tempted to use loans and grants for shallow, short-run projects for fear that a long-term plan might have to be abandoned in mid-course."

Conceding that money has been wasted and serious mistakes have been made in the past, Biemiller flatly said that the "waste has been less and the mistakes far less spectacular than the critics have charged." Human frailties and judgment being what they are, he went on, there undoubtedly will be mistakes in the future.

Fewer 'Blunders'

"It is our firm belief," he declared, "that the new Administration, armed with this bill, can and will see to it that there will be fewer well-meant, expensive blunders in the future."

He stressed the need for social reform in many of the emerging nations the program is designed to help, and voiced the hope that its proposed new approaches "will open the way to 'interference' in the best sense—guidance and persuasion, based upon the obvious need."

We should not attempt to impose our pattern of government on uncommitted countries, he said, but concede that "each country must evolve according to its own needs and in the light of its own problems."

"If the price of our aid were to be the imposition of a preconceived design," he said, "we would be foolish indeed."

J. Carlton Yeldell Dies in New York

New York—J. Carlton Yeldell, since 1956 labor relations secretary of the National Urban League, died here after a long illness. He was 45 and lived in suburban Jamaica.

He was graduated from Howard University in 1939 and in 1948 received a master's degree there in political science. At one time he did community service and political action work for the former National CIO. As an Urban League staff member he worked with unions and government agencies in promoting job opportunity equality for Negroes.

His widow, Frances, and two sons survive.

DELAWARE BECOMES the sixth state to restrict the use of strikebreakers as Gov. Elbert N. Carvel (D), seated, signs a bill prohibiting third parties to a labor dispute from furnishing or recruiting replacements for striking workers. Shown at the signing ceremony are, standing left to right, Sec. Samuel F. McClafferty of the Northern Delaware Central Labor Union; Pres. Walter Hempton of Typographical Union Local 123, and Rep. ILO Rejects Soviet 'Troika' Plan, Asks Withdrawal of South Africa

Geneva—Communist efforts to impose the so-called "troika" principle on the Intl. Labor Organization were defeated at the ILO's three-week annual conference.

The "troika" plan, just advanced by Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev for the United Nations, calls for having all international organizations run by a western-Communist-neutralist triumvirate. The UN has refused to accept the proposal.

The principle was attacked by ILO Dir. Gen. David A. Morse, who declared that it is wrong to talk of "neutrals" in international civil service when the need actually is for men who have "objectivity and honesty of purpose."

Much of the dispute centered on a Communist resolution demanding increased Soviet representation on the ILO staff. The resolution was rewritten in committee to call for giving "paramount consideration" in recruitment to the maintenance of the "highest standards of competence, efficiency and integrity."

The rewriting drew a charge from Ivan Goroshkin, Russian government delegate, that the resolution had been "so amended that the text now before you has nothing to do with the original proposal."

Morse said the Communist bloc nations were themselves to blame if more of their citizens were not on the ILO staff because they refused to have their nominees submit to competitive examinations.

The conference called on South Africa to withdraw from the ILO by a vote of 163-0, with 89 abstentions. The demand was in the form of a resolution originally presented by Nigeria that said that because of the racial discrimination policy known as apartheid practiced by South Africa, this government's continued membership "is not consistent with the aims and purposes" of the ILO.

Daniel J. Geyser, South African government delegate, said his government had "no intention of acceding to the request."

"My government firmly and wholeheartedly supports the condemnation of the South African racial policy," George L-P Weaver, U.S. government delegate, said.

"We feel that apartheid is repugnant to the principles and aims of the ILO and does violence to the minimum standards of decency and elementary social justice to which we subscribe."

But Weaver, former trade union official who is scheduled to become assistant secretary of labor for international affairs, added that he would abstain in the vote because the action called for does "not best advance the elimination of apartheid."

Bert Seidman of the U.S. worker group expressed deep regret that "at a time when a new Administration in my country is taking vigorous steps against racial discrimination at home its representative has found himself unable" to vote for the resolution.

"I realize that the government representative of my country has done this in good conscience, but I say that I regret this because it seems to me that every opportunity must be seized to express the moral indignation of decent people everywhere against the inhuman and despicable policy of apartheid," he added.

A resolution defining employment problems and policies was given strong endorsement by Solomon Barkin of the Textile Workers' Union of America in the name of all worker members of the committee that prepared it for the conference.

But the workers lost a close fight in plenary session on the 40-hour-week issue when the employer delegates stayed away to prevent a quorum.

The recommendation setting 40 hours as the goal to be reached as soon as possible everywhere was approved by 159 votes to 7, with 98 abstentions, but it was not adopted because the number of delegates voting failed to form a quorum.

James P. Griffin, District 26 director of the United Steelworkers, immediately called for another vote on the ground that the absence of a quorum merely invalidated the first count.

While recognizing that the vote was invalid, the chair ruled that a second vote could not be taken and that the matter was finished.

The American worker delegate, Rudy Faupl, however, received assurances at the one-day meeting of the ILO Governing Body following the conference that the workweek issue would be put on the agenda of the next conference.

Major Battles Still Ahead for 87th Congress

nedy made the keystones of his domestic program.

At the top of the list were the Administration's anti-recession measures—temporary extension of unemployment compensation, area redevelopment and emergency aid to dependent children—which the President had called necessary to help restore vitality to the lagging economy.

Domestic Measures

High on the list, too, were the President's long-range domestic programs—housing and urban renewal, raising of the minimum wage and broadening of coverage, social security improvements, financing of the federal interstate highway program and anti-pollution legislation—all enacted substantially in the form requested by the White House.

Here is the status of the key measures still pending in Congress:

Aid to education—The Senate, by a 49-34 vote, has passed a $2.5 billion program of federal grants which the states may use for constructing new classrooms or for raising teachers' salaries. Aid would be limited to public schools.

A similar measure—differing only in the formula for distributing funds to the states—was reported favorably by the House Education Committee. But then the long-smouldering controversy over aid to private schools erupted.

Two northern liberals on the House Rules Committee—demanding that aid to non-public schools be included in a bill to extend and broaden the National Defense Education Act and brought before the committee—joined with the one-time ruling conservative bloc on the rules body to bottle up the school-aid measure. Also tied up through this maneuver was the President's college scholarship proposal.

The Education Committee subsequently reported the NDEA extension, which included limited loans for private school classroom construction, but the Rules Committee has not yet moved.

Mutual security—The Administration's $9.9 billion measure has encountered stiff opposition both from the historic opponents of foreign aid and from Capitol Hill forces opposed to long-range commitments of Treasury funds.

Kennedy has asked for $2.5 billion for fiscal 1962, plus authority to draw on the Treasury for $6.4 million more over the following four years. An additional $1 billion authorization is sought to guarantee investments in underdeveloped countries.

The AFL-CIO has consistently advocated long-term commitments which would give assurances that, once an aid program has been launched, the necessary funds will be forthcoming.

Much of the opposition to continued foreign aid centers on the contention that help should not be given "uncommitted" or "neutralist" nations.

Health care—The American Medical Association and big business lobbies have sharpened their attack on the Administration-backed Anderson-King bill to use the social security mechanism for financing some health benefits for the aged.

Because tax-writing measures must originate in the House, there has been as yet no action by the more liberally oriented Senate. The House Ways & Means Committee is expected to open hearings on the AFL-CIO-supported measure late in July.

In other areas, Congress still has before it such measures as situs picketing, aid for migratory workers, civil defense, emergency public works, permanent overhaul of the unemployment compensation insurance program and the controversial omnibus farm bill.

It was uncertain, in view of the battles to come over major Administration proposals, whether any of these would come to a vote during this session of Congress.

Governor Grants Clemency:

Terms Reduced for Henderson Strikers

Raleigh, N. C.—Executive clemency by Gov. Terry Sanford (D) has paved the way for the possible release from prison of seven unionists jailed on charges of conspiracy to dynamite during a strike in Henderson.

The governor ordered a three-year reduction in the sentences of seven officers and members of the Textile Workers Union of America, imprisoned in November 1960 for an alleged plot to blow up the struck Harriet-Henderson Cotton Mills.

Sanford's action meant that the union members—four of whom were serving five-to-seven-year sentences, and the remaining three of whom were serving six-to-10-year terms—will be eligible for parole this summer after having served one-fourth of their minimum sentences.

In New York, TWUA Pres. William Pollock hailed the governor's action as "a move to end the suffering and hardship" the jailed union members have undergone. Pollock indicated the union would work for "complete vindication for these men in the hope that full pardons will eventually be granted to each of them."

The clemency move by Sanford means that Johnnie Martin, vice president of TWUA Local 578, and rank-and-file members Calvin Ray Pegram, Warren Walker and Robert Edward Abbott are eligible for immediate release, providing approval is given by the parole board. Prison authorities here indicated the board normally takes from 30 to 60 days to process applications for release.

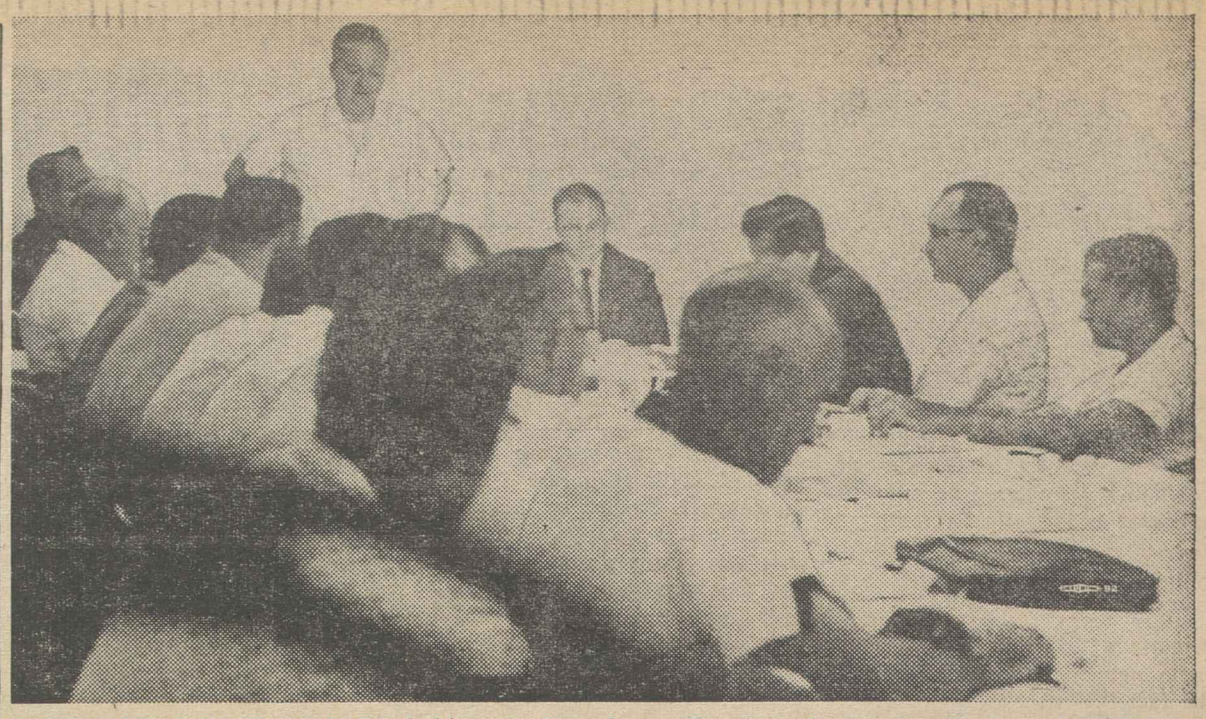
TWUA Vice Pres. Boyd E. Payton, the union's Carolinas' director, and Intl. Representatives Lawrence Gore and Charles Auslander, whose terms were reduced to three-to-five-year limits by the governor's action, will not be eligible for parole until Aug. 3 at the earliest, because of the necessity of serving a minimum of nine months, or 25 percent of their sentences.

Pollock declared that "it is our hope that the parole board will carry out the governor's directive as quickly as possible."

An eighth union member, Malcolm Jarrell, was released from prison in May after having served six months of a two-to-four-year sentence. His parole—granted at the earliest possible date on which he could have been released—came shortly after Harold E. Aaron, the state's star witness in the conspiracy case, was arrested on charges of shooting a man in a Martinsville, Va., motel.

For some months newspapers in North Carolina have demanded editorially that Sanford reopen the case, declaring that Aaron's testimony as a secret agent for the State Bureau of Investigation was subject to question.

The editorials were followed by a flood of letters from across the nation urging the governor to free the jailed TWUA members.



SOUTHERN LABOR SCHOOL held at St. Petersburg, Fla., brought together leaders of AFL-CIO central bodies in 11 states for a week-long advanced institute, taught by instructors from both universities and the labor movement. Topics ranged from taxation policies to the role of state and local labor councils and problems of organizing. Pictured above is a class on southern social problems, addressed by Prof. F. Ray Marshall of Louisiana State University.

June Joblessness High For 7th Straight Month

of 101 reported in March and April.

The Labor Dept.'s summary job report—a more detailed analysis will be issued later—reflected the impact of the higher post-war period birth rate on the scramble for jobs. An estimated 2.5 million teen-agers entered the labor market last month, compared with 2.2 million in June 1960 and 1.9 million in 1959.

The seasonally adjusted 6.8 percent unemployment rate in June compares with 6.9 percent in May and 5.4 percent in June 1960.

While the number of part-time workers increased during June as a result of the teen-age impact, the number of regular full-time workers whose hours had been cut below 35 because of slack work was down by 100,000 to 1.2 million.

Among the 150 biggest labor markets, nine cities moved out of the substantial unemployment grouping in June while one area—Reading, Pa.—was added to the list, for a net drop of eight.

Recall of laid-off workers in auto and auto supply industries, pickups in furniture manufacturing and food processing, plus an upturn in construction activities were credited with boosting Chicago, Cincinnati, Dayton, Wilmington, Grand Rapids, Kalamazoo, Lansing, Kenosha and Racine out of the substantial unemployment category.

These factors, along with pickups in retail trade and service jobs, also helped improve the employment picture in six other major labor markets.

Lowell, Mass., Battle Creek, Flint and Saginaw, Mich., and Atlantic City, N. J., all changed from the Labor Dept.'s Group E (9 to 11.9 percent unemployment) to Group D (6 to 8.9 percent jobless), while Detroit moved from Group F (12 percent or more unemployment) to Group E.

The number of smaller areas of substantial unemployment increased to 225 in June compared with 215 in May and 199 in April. The Labor Dept. emphasized, however, that these changes "do not necessarily reflect a recent worsening of the local employment situation" since additions to the list are largely based on special surveys requested by the areas involved.

6 Areas in 'Depressed' Group

Six of the new areas added to the list were classified as communities of "substantial and persistent unemployment" which would make them eligible for depressed area aid.

They are Opelousas, La.; Watertown, N. Y.; Rockingham-Hamlet, N. C.; Wenatchee, Wash., and Arecibo and Cagus in Puerto Rico. In addition, Okmulgee-Henryetta, Okla., which had been on the substantial unemployment list, was brought into the depressed area grouping. This brought the list of smaller areas of persistent unemployment to 101 while the major areas so listed remained unchanged at 20.

Boost in Steel Jobs Trails Rise in Output

Rising steel production has meant some increase in employment in the nation's steel mills—but not very much.

Labor Dept. statistics show that production rose 13 percent between February and April.

During the same period, steel employment went up only 2 percent.

Trade Union Schools Lure 10,000 Pupils

An estimated 10,000 trade union members will spend at least part of their vacations this summer going to school—union schools aimed at giving them better backgrounds in trade union history and better tools to help them with collective bargaining, grievances and arbitration.

Dir. Lawrence Rogin of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education reports that nearly 100 union-sponsored schools and institutes will be held during July and August. Forty schools have already been held this year.

Seventy percent of the institutes will be held on a college or university campus. Sponsors include international unions, state central bodies and, on a limited basis, the AFL-CIO itself. One of the AFL-CIO projects is a series of three industrial engineering institutes held at the University of Wisconsin by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

The typical student at a labor-sponsored summer school is a local officer or shop steward who is active in his union but not on a union payroll.

In addition to such standard courses as labor history, parliamentary procedure and public speaking, institutes held this summer will be concerned with automation, relocation of industry and international issues, Rogin said.

Teachers in New York Vote for Bargaining

New York—Public school teachers and allied workers have voted by a 3-1 margin in favor of collective bargaining for more than 40,000 school employes here.

With fewer than 500 ballots uncounted, the vote in a system-wide referendum conducted by the Honest Ballot Association was approximately 27,000 yes, 9,000 no.

Pres. Charles Cogen of the United Federation of Teachers—Local 2, American Federation of Teachers—said the result was a "UFT victory all the way." The union was the only teacher organization, he said, that endorsed collective bargaining and campaigned for a "yes" vote.

School Board to 'Study'

Board of Education members would say only that they will "study the results."

Said Cogen: "When schools reopen in the fall, the union expects the board to hold a genuine collective bargaining election forthwith to choose a bargaining agent for all who took part in the referendum — teachers, school secretaries, guidance counsellors, social workers and psychologists."

The question on the ballot was:

"As you now understand collective bargaining in the way defined by the statement of June 12, 1961, issued by the Committee on Professional Status, Board of Education, do you favor collective bargaining for the employes licensed by the Superintendent of Schools?"

The board's June 12 statement, issued shortly before the referendum, asserted that "understandings arrived at as a result of collective bargaining must contain a provision that they are terminable at will by the Board of Education."

The UFT described the board as insisting on the "right to welsh" and called for true bargaining agreements.

Wants One Organization

The union has been trying for more than a year to get the board to permit an election and to unite all teachers in one bargaining organization. Its campaign has been supported by the AFL-CIO, the AFT, and the New York City Central Labor Council.

Last Nov. 7, union teachers walked out and posted pickets at 267 schools to protest the school board's failure to arrange an election. They returned when Mayor Robert F. Wagner agreed that no teacher would be penalized for striking and that a committee of three respected union leaders would work with UFT and school officials to prepare a formula for meeting the problems of New York City teachers.

The three who served as volunteer mediators were Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Pres. Jacob F. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the Central Labor Council.

Later a five-man citizens commission gave the board a series of recommendations on election procedures, and resigned when board members followed one of its recommendations but ignored the others.

BCW, 8 Officers Guilty Of Contempt of Court

A federal judge has found eight officers of the expelled Bakery & Confectionery Workers, and the union itself, guilty of contempt of court for punitive action taken against supporters of the Local Union Reunification Committee, a group which has lodged corruption charges against the dominant faction in the executive board.

District Judge Edward A. Tamm in Washington imposed a $25,000 fine on the union, saying it would be cancelled if the union purged itself of contempt by reinstating a dismissed staff employe and withdrawing a warning that members and locals supporting the reform group would be subject to disciplinary action.

He based his action on an injunction issued last August by District Judge George L. Hart, Jr., which barred the union from reprisals against officers or members seeking the ouster of then-Pres. James G. Cross. Cross has since resigned on a pension from the union, which was expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of corrupt leadership.

James Landriscina, who succeeded Cross as president, was ordered to reinstate David Gefter, an administrative assistant who asserted in an affidavit that he was fired after he had given attorneys for the Local Union Reunification Committee sworn information about a conspiracy on the part of officers to defraud the union. Landriscina said he had discharged Gefter because there was no further need for his services.

The AFL-CIO American Bakery & Confectionery Workers earlier this year had entered into a short-lived "truce" with the BCW, preparatory to merger negotiations. ABC dissolved the agreement after BCW leaders favoring merger charged the majority of the executive board with having covered up alleged misuse of union funds.

Meany Asks Foreign Aid Bill Backing

Letter Drive Advocated In Support

The American trade union movement places "the preservation of world peace before a larger paycheck," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in a nationwide radio appeal for passage of the Administration's $9.9 billion foreign aid bill.

In a major address over the American Broadcasting Co. radio network, Meany pointed to the fact that the measure is under considerable fire on Capitol Hill and called on the American people for a massive letter-writing campaign in support of Pres. John F. Kennedy's proposals.

"Congress needs the help and guidance of the American people," the AFL-CIO president declared. "It cannot truly judge the temper of the nation if its citizens remain silent on such an important matter."

Both the House Foreign Affairs and the Senate Foreign Relations Committees have completed hearings on the mutual security measure and are meeting in closed-door sessions to put finishing touches to the bill.

The measure is due to reach the Senate floor the week of July 17, while House debate is expected to open the following week.

Meany declared that Soviet saber-rattling over Berlin and Premier Nikita Khrushchev's announcement of stepped-up military spending call for a review not only of military defense but also of economic aid programs.

"The peace of the world and the security of our own country depend upon people as well as weapons," he asserted. "To strengthen our own people for the tests to come, the government has initiated various programs for the stimulation of the national economy. To strengthen the people of other countries, outside the Communist orbit but threatened by it, Pres. Kennedy has proposed and Congress is now debating an unusually broad program of economic aid."

Argument 'Persuasive'

Some of the bill's opponents, he pointed out, contend that the billions in foreign aid funds "could be better spent right here at home, for the direct benefit of the American people." He said such an argu-

Labor's Berlin Stand Hailed by Adenauer

West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer has conveyed the "wholehearted thanks" of the German people to the AFL-CIO for the federation's firm stand against surrender to Soviet threats on Berlin.

In a cable to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Adenaure expressed "delight and special satisfaction" with the statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council "in which your great organization representing the working people of your country stands up in very clear language to Soviet threats against Berlin and comes out resolutely for the preservation of the position of the West in Berlin and the right of self-determination of the Berliners." He added:

"The German people wholeheartedly thank you and the AFL-CIO for this position."

Gains in State Legislation Far Short of Labor's Goals

TEENS FOR LABOR CORPS is what the Greater Louisville Central Labor Council calls the young people who have volunteered to work with the Jefferson County Committee on Political Education and its Women's Activities Division. Survey Shows Few Advances

By David L. Perlman

A handful of states have made major strides in social legislation this year but the overall record of 36 legislatures which have adjourned and 11 still in session falls far short of labor's goals.

A survey by the AFL-CIO News shows that:

- Four states enacted or improved minimum wage laws but only Connecticut and Washington matched the federal government's two-step increase to $1.25 an hour. Two labor-backed minimum wage bills were vetoed by Republican governors.
- Ten states adopted anti-discrimination legislation or strengthened existing laws dealing with race or age bias in employment or housing. However, only 20 of the 50 states presently have enforceable fair employment laws and fewer have laws against discrimination in housing.
- Despite the recession level of unemployment, most states did little or nothing to improve inadequate levels or duration of benefits. Many minor improvement bills also carried new restrictions on eligibility and made it more difficult for jobless workers to qualify for compensation. Four governors, at labor's request, vetoed bills which would have seriously weakened jobless aid programs.
- Workmen's compensation laws were improved in many states but in most of them the maximum benefits—although higher in dollars—still represented a smaller proportion of wages than was the case 20 years ago.
- Battles over tax policies raged in a number of states. Only slight progress was made in checking the spread of consumer sales taxes and

Labor Policy Group Maps 5 Key Studies

The President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy has created five subcommittees to make intensive, summer-long studies in five key areas, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, chairman of the tripartite White House body, has announced.

The subcommittees will prepare reports on free and responsible collective bargaining and industrial peace, economic growth and unemployment, automation and technological advances, competition in world markets and sound wage and price policies—the five main areas of interest assigned to the committee by Pres. John F. Kennedy.

Meeting with reporters after the fourth monthly session of the labor, management and public advisers at the White House, Goldberg said the committee held a "very frank and constructive discussion" on wage and price policies.

The Cabinet official said the six-hour closed-door meeting produced "a wide variety of views as to appropriate" policies in this area, and added that "this is very understandable since this is a big and complex country."

The subcommittee reports are scheduled for presentation to the full advisory committee when it meets again on Sept. 11, and will

New Unit to be Formed:

Business Advisers Bolt Commerce Dept.

The big-business-dominated Business Advisory Council to the Commerce Dept. has severed all ties with the government rather than submit to Administration directives to open its operations to public scrutiny and supervision.

The Commerce Dept. indicated the secessionist business leaders had lost their right to the advisory council name, and had forfeited their quasi-official status and its accompanying tax exemption.

Commerce Under-Sec. Edward Gudeman also indicated that the business leaders would promptly be replaced by a new advisory unit, presumably with a completely new roster of members.

The disaffiliation anouncement was made in New York by U.S. Steel Chairman Roger M. Blough, who has headed the 165-member advisory unit since last February when Board Chairman Ralph E. Cordiner of the General Electric Co. quit under fire in the wake of the multi-billion-dollar price-fixing scandal involving GE.

Several other companies indicted and convicted in the price-rigging case—including Westinghouse Electric Corp.—also were represented on the advisory body either by officials or board members.

Hodges' Demands

The business leaders' secession followed an open rift with Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges. The Secretary had demanded that:

- BAC meetings addressed by government officials be open to the press.
- All sessions be attended by government officials, with meeting agendas approved in advance by the government and with minutes of all sessions made available to the Justice Dept. In the past there have been no minutes of proceedings.
- The Commerce Secretary

Seniority Rights Vested, Court Tells 'Runaway'

Detroit—A federal judge has ruled that a Detroit company in the process of "running away" to another state must offer jobs to its current workers.

In a decision of major significance to workers, employers and communities seeking to lure "runaways," U. S. District Judge Fred W. Kaess wrote that union-won seniority rights become "vested" in the job, survive a contract expiration and apply regardless of where the plant is moved.

Therefore, Kaess ruled, the Gemmer Manufacturing Co., a division of Ross Gear & Toll Co., "has an obligation and duty to rehire on the basis of seniority those employes laid off in Detroit when that plant's operations are removed to Lebanon, Tenn."

The Auto Workers, which brought

Tractor Fund Gift Rebate To Be Made

Thousands of Americans who contributed funds to the Tractors for Freedom Committee will receive their money back under an arrangement between the committee and the Post Office Dept.

The committee—headed by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, and Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther—had been set up to purchase tractors with which to buy the freedom of 1,200 imprisoned Cuban rebels.

The project collapsed when Cuban Premier Fidel Castro changed his original demands, which had called for 500 agricultural tractors, and insisted on $28 million worth of miltary-type bulldozers or the equivalent in cash.

Under the arrangement with the Post Office Dept., contributions which were sent to P.O. Box Freedom, Detroit, will be returned unopened and will bear a printed message of regret that the tractor deal "could not be consummated."

Contributions with no return address will go to the Post Office's dead letter office where they will be opened and, if there is an indication inside of the identity of the sender, will be returned. Where such identity is lacking, the contributions will go to the U. S. Treasury.

NLRB Issues Complaint in Sears Case

Seattle—The National Labor Relations Board has issued a complaint charging Sears, Roebuck & Co. with unfair labor practices in dealings with Retail Clerks Local 1207 here.

The NLRB regional director signed a complaint accusing the giant retail chain of refusing to bargain with the union. A hearing was set for July 19 in this city.

The complaint lists these charges:

- Sears' refusal to meet and negotiate with duly designated union representatives Apr. 20, 1961.
- Sears' refusal to use normal contract provisions to solve pending grievances.
- Statements by Sears officials that even if an agreement was reached on such issues as union security, they would not put the agreement into writing.

In the nation's capital, RCIA Pres. James Suffridge called the complaint a vindication of the union's position in a long fight with Sears and urged consumers not to shop at Sears until the company "stops interfering with its employes' right to organize."

The NLRB complaint was the first issued since the RCIA last year called for a consumer boycott of Sears. The call was backed by the San Francisco Labor Council and the AFL-CIO Executive Council after Sears laid off 262 members of several unions 14 months ago for honoring a Machinists' picket line at two San Francisco Sears stores. The workers were returned in arbitration proceedings but the RCIA has charged repeated harassment.

May Strike Time Loss at Low Ebb

Work time lost in strikes in May was at the lowest percentage for the month since the end of World War II, the U.S. Dept. of Labor has reported. The number of workers involved and total time lost for the first five months of 1961 also were below the levels for any corresponding five-month period since 1946.

With 620 strikes in May, 165,000 workers were idled, an increase of 39,000 over the April figure but the lowest May figure in 15 years.

'Work' Sponsors Again Distort FDR, Gompers

Sponsors of so-called "right-to-work" legislation are still trying to distort statements by Samuel Gompers and Franklin D. Roosevelt to make it appear that the pioneering labor leader and the New Deal President were opposed to the union shop, the National Council for Industrial Peace has charged.

The same distortions were used during the 1958 election campaign and have popped up again in Oklahoma, where the National "Right-to-Work" Committee has been trying—without success—to enact a compulsory open-shop law.

Two years ago, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany denounced as a "tawdry device" the lifting of a Gompers quotation dealing with the principle of "voluntarism" from a speech on the relationship among unions affiliated with the former AFL. Meany pointed out that Gompers "devoted his life to establishment of the union shop for the welfare and protection of working people everywhere."

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, co-chairman of the Council for Industrial Peace, called the allegation "a shameful fraud on the public." She said:

"A check of my husband's papers, in his library at Hyde Park, will show that no tortured phrase or out of context quote can substantiate such an allegation . . . the American public understands well that Franklin Delano Roosevelt would never have supported such a reactionary doctrine."

'Right-to-Work' Forces Routed in Legislatures

The National 'Right-to-Work' Committee and its allies took a licking in the state legislatures this year.

Every attempt to outlaw union shop agreements has been unsuccessful. So-called "right-to-work" bills have been defeated in New Mexico, Maine and Vermont. An "agricultural right-to-work" bill was rejected in Idaho. An Oklahoma bill remains buried in committee despite repeated efforts by "work" supporters to force it to the floor.

Kansas and Florida rejected so-called "implementing" bills to supplement constitutional amendments banning the union shop. Only in Nebraska, where the legislature banned agency-shop contracts, was an existing "work" law made more stringent.

In other states, "right-to-work" bills were killed outright, pigeonholed in committee or failed to find a sponsor. Indiana remained a standoff—with both a bill to repeal the existing "right-to-work" law and a bill to outlaw the agency shop meeting defeat in the divided legislature.

Most other major anti-union bills introduced in legislatures were defeated.

This brought from the Arkansas State AFL-CIO the wry comment that the 1961 legislature held "probably the most successful session for working people in Arkansas since 1951. . . . Not one piece of anti-labor legislation was passed."

"Sue-and-Be-Sued" Bill Beaten

While virtually no labor-backed social legislation was enacted, the legislature defeated a "sue-and-be-sued" bill which would have opened the door to harassment suits against unions. A similar bill had been passed in the 1959 session but was vetoed by the governor.

Also killed in Arkansas was a bill which would have given state circuit courts power to require international unions to grant a charter to any group of 25 or more members who petition for their own separate local. If the international union refused, it would have had to forfeit all rights to do business in the state and all of its contracts could have been declared invalid.

Both the Kansas and Florida bills were "rippers" which would have gone far beyond enforcement of the union shop ban.

The Kansas bill, as approved by the GOP-controlled House Labor Committee, would have banned so-called "mass picketing," would have made it unlawful for strikers to use "insulting language" when addressing strikebreakers or speaking about them within their hearing and would have set a minimum penalty of one year in prison for using "force" or "threats" to keep strikebreakers from crossing a picket line.

The Florida bill, which died in committee, would have outlawed both the agency shop and dues checkoffs, and would have emasculated the state apprenticeship training program. It was introduced with 29 co-sponsors.

While the Oklahoma legislature is still in session, "work" law supporters appear to have shot their bolt since meeting a one-vote defeat in an effort to force a constitutional amendment referendum bill to the floor.

Companion Bill Killed

In the latest move to dislodge the bill from the Senate Labor Committee, the "right-to-work" advocates were unable to muster enough votes to compel a roll call. A companion bill died in the House when that body cleared its calendar of legislation not yet acted on by the Senate.

Republicans joined with Democrats in defeating "work" bills in Maine and Vermont. The GOP governors of both states had publicly opposed the measures. In New Hampshire the sponsor of a "work" bill withdrew it after the governor spoke out strongly against it.

The closest call came in Idaho, where the Senate passed a bill barring the union shop in "agriculture" and defining agricultural labor as including persons working in food processing, packaging, freezing or in the transport "of any agricultural or horticultural commodity." The House killed the bill, 29-25, shortly before adjournment.

The Montana legislature killed two anti-union bills, including one which was labeled as a "bill of rights" for union members.

An attempt to weaken state anti-injunction laws was defeated in Massachusetts. However, the New York legislature opened the door to injunctions in labor disputes involving perishable farm crops.

In the Legislatures:

Jobless Benefits Increased Slightly

An unusually small number of legislatures improved unemployment compensation benefits this year and in some states moderate improvements were balanced out by new and harsh disqualification provisions. Vetoes of labor-opposed bills by four governors kept the record from being considerably worse.

Legislation to improve workmen's compensation laws fared somewhat better, although most of the increases were on the modest side.

Two states, Montana and West Virginia, increased the duration of benefits to 26 weeks. West Virginia previously had a 24-week limit, Montana 22 weeks. However, the Montana bill also included amendments which the State AFL-CIO reports "changes our law from the most liberal act in the nation to one of the most restrictive."

Hawaii, which already had one of the country's broadest laws, moved further ahead by raising the maximum benefit to $55 a week, which is nearly 75 percent of the state's average weekly wage of workers in covered employment.

Idaho and South Carolina joined the list of states setting maximum benefits as a percentage of the state's average weekly wage, thus establishing an escalator which automatically raises the benefit ceiling as wages go up. In both cases, the percentage was lower than labor has sought—52.5 percent in Idaho and 50 percent in South Carolina.

Democratic governors of Michigan, Ohio and Wyoming vetoed restrictive unemployment compensation bills.

Wyoming Bill Vetoed

The Wyoming bill, killed by Gov. Jack R. Gage, would have scrapped the state's flexible maximum benefit geared to 55 percent of the average wage, cut existing benefits, doubled the disqualification penalty and cut six weeks from the duration of benefits for unemployed persons who were not actually laid off from their last jobs.

Ohio Gov. Michael V. DiSalle vetoed a bill coupling a 13-week extension of benefits when unemployment exceeds 6 percent with harsh eligibility restrictions. He accused the Republican-controlled legislature and "Scrooge-like" business lobbies of trying to "take advantage of the misery of the people."

Gov. John B. Swainson of Michigan vetoed a bill which would have overturned a state supreme court decision upholding the right of workers to receive benefits if they are idled as the result of a strike at another plant. The bill also would have forgiven a $162 million debt owed by employers to the state unemployment compensation fund.

One Republican governor, South Dakota's Archie Gubbrud, also vetoed a labor-opposed bill imposing harsh disqualification provisions.

The Maryland legislature bowed to employer pressure and passed restrictive amendments over labor's opposition. The State AFL-CIO, through a petition campaign, has forced the issue to a statewide referendum.

Agreed-on Bills Beaten

One of the better laws enacted this year was in Illinois, where the unanimous recommendations of a tripartite advisory board of labor, management and public representatives won bipartisan support in the legislature. Maximum benefits for single unemployed workers were raised $6 a week—to $32—and dependents' allowances were likewise raised with the maximum for a worker with four children going from $50 a week to $59. Another significant gain was in Missouri, where the maximum benefit was raised $7 to $40 a week.

A joint labor-management committee presented an agreed-on bill in Colorado, also, but the outcome was different. The bill passed the House without difficulty but the Senate stripped it of all provisions raising benefits, leaving in only the amendments favoring employers. The House then killed the emasculated measure. An agreed-on bill was also killed in Nebraska.

On any chart, a $15 increase in New Jersey's maximum benefits—from $35 to $50—looks impressive, but severe restrictions were written into the law and Gov. Robert B. Meyner (D) said he signed the measure with reluctance.

A Maine law also contained restrictive provisions as the price of a $1 increase in benefits.

Other states which increased maximum benefits include New Hampshire, North Carolina, North Dakota and West Virginia. California raised benefits for workers receiving less than the maximum.

In a related area, California raised benefits under its state disability insurance program—a form of sick and accident insurance—by $5 to a weekly maximum of $70. Also enacted was an escalation formula aimed at establishing a maximum of two-thirds the average state wage in covered employment.

Disability Benefits Upped

California further enacted a $5 increase in both the minimum and maximum weekly benefits for temporary disability under the separate workmen's compensation program.

Connecticut, Illinois and Washington made major improvements in workmen's compensation benefit schedules. Benefits were raised and laws improved also in West Virginia, Kansas, Missouri, Montana, New Hampshire, Utah, Massachusetts and Wyoming.

Vermont enacted an occupational disease law and lifted the ceiling on medical care allowances under workmen's compensation, while New Mexico established a second injury fund.

The Oregon legislature rejected an attempt to open the door to private insurance companies in the workmen's compensation field by eliminating the exclusive nature of the non-profit state fund, through which benefits are paid and rehabilitation programs carried out.

In Alaska, the legislature authorized a full-scale study of the feasibility of establishing a "non-profit exclusive state fund" for the workmen's compensation program.

Upholsterers Pick Priest for Appeals

Philadelphia—A St. Louis clergyman has been chosen to head the independent citizens appeal board set up by the Upholsterers union in 1953 to hear and investigate appeals brought by members from union disciplinary actions.

The Rev. Leo C. Brown of the Institute of Social Order of St. Louis University was elected by his fellow board members to succeed Archibald Cox as chairman. Cox resigned after his appointment as U.S. solicitor general.

Sales Levies Still Popular:

Income Tax Laws Passed by 3 States

State legislatures in 1961, faced with mounting expenses and recession-curbed revenue, continued to look to sales taxes as what they considered the least painful way of raising funds—and continued to overlook the fact that the biggest burden of sales levies falls on those least able to pay.

Growing opposition, however, at least slowed the spread.

Labor-backed proposals for graduated income taxes made progress in only three states—Delaware, West Virginia and Massachusetts.

The Delaware legislature defeated a sales tax proposal and voted instead to raise the personal income tax on persons making $30,000 a year or more and to increase the corporate franchise tax.

West Virginia enacted an income tax based on 6 percent of the individual's federal income tax bill, although it also raised the sales tax.

The Massachusetts legislature referred to referendum a constitutional amendment authorizing a graduated income tax. The action followed the successful labor-led battle of recent years to prevent enactment of a sales tax.

A better battle over taxation in Illinois threw the final hours of the legislature into confusion as Senate Republicans killed an increase in the corporation franchise tax, which they had supported in the House and which had been favorably reported by the GOP-controlled Senate Revenue Committee. They rejected the business tax hike after passage of a one-half percent increase in the state sales tax—to 3.5 percent. Both measures had been supported by Democratic Gov. Otto Kerner.

Kerner has named a statewide advisory committee to come up with a proposal for revamping Illinois' revenue structure and may refer its report to a special session.

Battles over sales tax proposals are currently raging in Texas, where a special session of the legislature has been convened, and in Wisconsin, where labor is rallying unprecedented mass support to protest a GOP sales tax plan.

In Texas, the Senate passed a general sales tax bill, 19-12, which came within a hairbreadth of passage in the House. It was temporarily blocked by a 72-72 tie, brought about when House Speaker James A. Truman cast a dramatic vote against it, but the showdown battle is being conducted in a special session opened July 10.

In Wisconsin, hundreds of union members and other opponents of a sales tax turned out for a six-hour committee hearing in the lower house of the legislature. The bill is still pending in committee.

In other states, North Carolina extended a 3 percent sales tax to cover food purchases while California eliminated its tax on prescription drugs; Utah raised its tax one-half percent, but sales tax proposals were defeated in Idaho, Minnesota and New Mexico.

NEARLY 12,000 HOURS of work was donated by Iowa unions for the construction of a 13-building camp for physically handicapped children located near Des Moines. Here members of two Des Moines unions, Plumbers & Steamfitters Local 33 and Pipelayers Local 431, are shown installing a six-inch water main.

3 More States Enact Bans on Bias in Jobs

Idaho, Illinois and Missouri this year became the 18th, 19th and 20th states to ban discrimination in employment through laws enforceable in the courts.

Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Minnesota and New York barred discrimination in housing or strengthened existing laws; Washington and California passed legislation aimed at discrimination because of age, while New York broadened its ban on age discrimination to apply to workers over 40. It has previously applied only to the 45-60 age group.

The Idaho law, strongly backed in joint action by the State AFL-CIO and a statewide Indian tribal council, bars discrimination in both employment and sale or rental of housing. Chief victims of discrimination in the state, which has a small Negro population, have been Indians and Mexican-Americans.

Illinois' law, although falling considerably short of labor's original goal, is the first success in a 15-year campaign for fair employment practices. Initially the law covers establishments with 100 or more employes. Between Jan. 1, 1963, and Jan. 1, 1965, it will cover firms with 75 or more workers and then will apply to establishments with 50 or more employes. It establishes as public policy equal apprenticeship, as well as employment, opportunity.

The Illinois Manufacturers Association and the Illinois State Chamber of Commerce actively opposed the FEPC bill, but several prominent employers joined with the AFL-CIO in support of the legislation. An Inland Steel Co. executive was chairman of the statewide committee pushing it.

The Missouri FEPC law covers establishments with more than 50 employes. The anti-discrimination law is enforceable in court if mediation efforts fail.

West Virginia set up a Human Rights Commission, without enforcement powers, with a mandate "to encourage" equal rights.

Indiana, which with Kansas has a fair employment law without enforcement powers, made some improvements through establishment of a Civil Rights Commission authorized to initiate investigations of discriminatory practices and to hold public hearings and subpoena witnesses.

Pennsylvania's labor-backed bill converted the state's Fair Employment Practices Commission into a Human Relations Commission responsible for ensuring compliance with all of the state's anti-discrimination laws. The new law bars discrimination in sale, rental or financing of housing and permits the commission to initiate investigations without waiting for a complaint to be filed. State AFL-CIO Co-Pres. Harry Boyer heads the commission.

There were setbacks in some states. A California bill to extend the existing ban on discrimination in publicly-assisted housing to virtually all private housing passed the lower house in somewhat weakened form but was killed in a Senate committee.

In both New Mexico and Rhode Island, fair housing bills passed one house but failed of enactment. A similar fate overtook a public accommodations anti-discrimination bill in Ohio. In Maryland, a public accomodations bill failed of enactment.

A Vermont FEPC bill was defeated after "right-to-work" groups had unsuccessfully tried to use it as a vehicle for a back-door "right-to-work" law.

Conservative Coalitions Limit Gains In Legislatures of Most States

winning support for graduated income taxes as a more equitable method of taxation.

Perhaps the most significant area of labor success at the state level this year has been the defeat of virtually all major anti-labor legislation, a sharp contrast with the 1959 legislative year, when half a dozen states passed anti-union laws.

So-called "right-to-work" bills or attempts to tighten existing "work" laws were introduced in 14 states and defeated, withdrawn or pigeonholed in 13. Nebraska amended its "work" law to ban the agency shop. However the same legislature turned down two other union-restricting bills.

Reapportionment Stymied

On the positive side, four states —New Jersey, Washington, Maryland and Delaware—adopted laws restricting the use of professional strikebreakers. Unions in the printing and newspaper trades have spearheaded the drive for "citizens job protection laws" and bills were introduced in more than a score of states.

Legislative reapportionment—the only hope in many states of breaking conservative, rural domination of one or both houses of legislatures—made little headway as incumbent legislators showed stubborn reluctance to vote themselves out of office.

A bright spot was Texas, where reapportionment was hailed by the State AFL-CIO as "especially good in the House . . . should give us an opportunity to elect more friendly legislators."

On the other hand, the South Dakota legislature was reapportioned "to strengthen GOP control," the state central body reported.

The New Hampshire Senate was redistricted for the first time in 45 years, while North Carolina voted reapportionment of the House but not of the Senate.

Passed for submission to the voters was a Pennsylvania constitutional amendment which would permit a governor to succeed himself.

A proposed amendment to the U.S. Constitution to eliminate the income tax actually passed the North Dakota House but was defeated in the Senate. A similar proposal failed totally in North Carolina.

For anyone seeking generalizations, the 1961 legislative year was replete with paradoxes.

Washington, with a Democratic legislature and a Democratic governor, made notable legislative gains.

Colorado and Rhode Island, with the same party lineup, had sessions disappointing to labor and California fell short of pre-session hopes.

Most states with divided control of the legislature ended up with a stalemate or bills compromised to the point of emasculation. However Connecticut, with the Democrats in control of the Senate and the Republicans controlling the House, had probably the best record in social legislation.

Democratic governors vetoed bills which would have crippled unemployment compensation programs—and Republican governors spoke out firmly and effectively against "right-to-work" laws.

Granting exceptions, an analysis of reports from the states show that a chief obstacle to legislative progress has been a coalition between conservative Democrats and most Republicans comparable to the Dixiecrat-GOP coalition in Congress.

In almost identical language, an editorial in the Oregon Labor Press and a report from the Colorado State AFL-CIO points this up.

The "coalition between conservative Democrats and Republicans ran rampant in the 1961 Oregon legislature—and made this session the most disappointing, fruitless and frustrating in recent history."

From Colorado came the comment that the legislature "was affiliated with the same Republican-conservative Democratic coalition that has prevented the passage of labor legislation in past sessions. . . . If the legislative picture is to improve in Colorado, either the legislature must be reapportioned so that a greater majority of members come from urban areas, or a larger Democratic majority must be obtained."

Only 2 States Match $1.25 Minimum Wage

Connecticut and Washington were the only two states this year to follow the lead of the federal government and raise state minimum wages to match the two-step increase to $1.25 provided for workers in interstate commerce.

Illinois enacted its first minimum wage law and North Carolina expanded coverage of its existing law. Labor-backed minimum wage bills passed by the legislatures of Massachusetts and New Mexico were vetoed by Republican governors.

Connecticut's new law raises the present $1 minimum to $1.15 on Oct. 1, 1961, and to $1.25 on Oct. 1, 1963. It covers both laundry workers and retail workers and establishes a special wage floor for workers who receive part of their income in tips, providing a cash wage of not less than 75 cents after May 1, 1962, and 80 cents in 1964.

The Washington legislature raised the state's statutory minimum to $1.15, with a further increase to $1.25 in January 1962.

The veto of a $1.15-$1.25 wage bill by Massachusetts Gov. John A. Volpe (R) cited as grounds the fact that it would have extended coverage to laundry workers and retail workers not protected by the federal law. In a separate bill, the legislature improved coverage somewhat and clarified overtime protection.

Illinois, which previously did not have a statutory minimum, enacted a compromise 75-cent wage bill after a Senate committee killed a House-passed $1 bill. The law authorizes higher minimums to be set for various industries through wage boards.

North Carolina, only southern state with a statutory minimum wage, expanded coverage by applying the law to all establishments with four or more employes. It had previously covered only firms with six or more workers. The rate remains at 75 cents an hour.

The New Mexico legislature voted to raise the 75-cent minimum to $1 but failed to override a veto by Gov. Edwin L. Mechem (R).

A labor-backed bill raising California's minimum wage from $1 to $1.25 and requiring growers to set piece rates of farm workers so that at least 80 percent would earn $1.25 passed the lower house but was killed in the Senate Labor Committee.

In Kansas, a 75-cent minimum wage bill was defeated on a 61-61 tie vote in the House. It would have required 63 votes for passage. The North Dakota legislature also rejected a compromise 75-cent bill.

Still alive is a bill raising the minimum wage in Alaska from the present $1.50 to $1.75. It has passed the lower house and can be taken up in the Senate in the second session of the legislature next January.

JOBS IN TENNESSEE? Raised hands at this meeting of Auto Workers Local 80 in Detroit show how many workers are willing to move with their jobs to Lebanon, Tenn., if their employer, the Gemmer division of Ross Gear & Tool Co., carries out a plan to transfer operations. The local's bargaining committee won court ruling to protect job rights.

Court Rules 'Runaway' Employer Must Offer Jobs to Current Staff

suit on behalf of 716 seniority employes, hailed the decision.

"This ruling establishes without question the responsibility of employers to their employes and families who have helped these companies to prosper and grow," declared UAW Reg. Co-Dir. Ken Morris.

"Employers now must realize they do not live in a social vacuum, that their decisions to close and move plants are not just private decisions but affect profoundly the lives and fortunes of the workers and the communities."

Willing to Move

Pres. James G. Oddie of UAW Local 80, which has represented the Gemmer employes for 27 years, said most of the members intend to exercise their recall rights and claim jobs at Lebanon.

"The average age of our membership is 48," Oddie observed, "so most of our members feel they will not be able to find new jobs and have really no choice but to move."

Industrial Piracy

Oddie assailed Gemmer's plans to move as "a case of industrial piracy." He said the ruling "may make some of these high-pressure organizations think twice before they attempt to lure plants and jobs from one city to another."

The Gemmer Co., which began operations in Detroit in 1907, gave notice to employes two months ago that it would close down Sept. 2. Except for some salaried and supervisory personnel, the company refused to offer transfers to its workers. They average 20 years in seniority.

The UAW had charged that the company had made commitments to hire only from the Lebanon, Tenn., area. That town of 10,500 near Nashville had floated a $2.4 million bond issue to build the plant for Gemmer. The parent Ross Gear firm has a 20-year lease, the income from which was to pay off the bonds.

John E. Jarrell, president of Ross Gear, which absorbed the Gemmer firm in 1956, made no immediate comment on the ruling. He had said earlier, however, that some 500 workers would be hired for the new Lebanon plant, that the labor would be "non-union" and that the company expected "to save on labor costs."

Separate Suit

The UAW, in a separate suit, is seeking to compel Gemmer to honor the union contract at the new location. The pact expires Oct. 1.

Judge Kaess observed that the question of continued union representation was before another judge. He did note that Sec. 1 of the contract, dealing with recognition, applied to employes "in the greater Detroit area."

Kaess said it might be inferred that this phrase was intended to limit all aspects of the contract to the Detroit area. But, he explained, the phrase developed out of circumstances relating to Gemmer's merger with Ross Gear and the company's reliance on the language to justify a shift of location without hiring rights "goes for naught."

"The Gemmer Division plant is the same plant wherever it is moved, in spite of the fact it might be known by a different name," wrote the judge, adding:

"Mere change of form will not change the substance, nor will mere change of location. This is the same plant, same machinery and equipment, same operation, same officers and supervisors, but in a new climate."

On whether seniority rights survive a contract, Kaess said he felt bound by a precedent case, Zdanok vs. Glidden Co., and its reasoning —that seniority is "vested" or "earned" right and a type of unemployment insurance "earned and acquired by continuous service." That decision, he noted, went on to say that the worker or his union agent could bargain away these rights.

Rights and benefits accruing under the contract, Kaess continued, "persist and cannot be unilaterally denied by the employer without the employes' consent."

Among these rights, he declared, is the right of seniority or, more specifically in this case, "the right to be rehired by the employer after a lay-off, as stated in the contract."

8 Big Firms Agree to Ban Hiring Bias

Eight major manufacturers have signed agreements with the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity pledging action to prevent racial bias on the job.

Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, chairman of the committee, hailed the agreements as "historic." They are similar to one signed six weeks earlier by Lockheed Aircraft Corp., which had been under fire for alleged discrimination against Negroes at its Marietta, Ga., bomber plant.

The eight companies, all of which hold important government contracts, employ an estimated 800,000 workers. Signing the pledges were Western Electric Co., Boeing Airplane Co., Douglas Aircraft Co., General Electric Co., the Martin Co., North American Aviation, Inc., Radio Corp. of America and United Aircraft Corp.

The signing came prior to a day-long meeting of the Equal Employment Committee at the White House. Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, vice chairman, said the group approved revised rules and regulations for hiring by federal agencies to implement Pres. Kennedy's Executive Order establishing the committee and arming it with broad anti-bias powers.

NLRB in Second Ruling:

Labor Laws Applied To 'Runaway' Ships

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled, for the second time in six months, that United States labor laws apply to American-owned ships registered under foreign flags.

A panel of three NLRB members by a 2-1 vote affirmed its jurisdiction over labor relations on the S. S. Florida, passenger cruise vessel and cargo ship plying between Miami and Nassau. The ship is U.S.-owned but flies the flag of Liberia and has a "predominantly alien" crew.

Affirming the ruling Sept. 21, 1959, of NLRB Trial Examiner James A. Shaw, the majority upheld the right of the Seafarers to bargain for the crew and to obtain a signed contract. It rejected the claim of the owners that U.S. labor law does not apply to a foreign-flag ship with a foreign crew.

The ruling was the second NLRB victory won by a maritime union against "runaway" ship operators. The first, on Feb. 16, was won by the SIU and the crew of the car ferry Sea Level.

In the latest case, the NLRB ordered the Peninsular & Occidental Steamship Co., owner of the Florida through a Liberia corporation, to take these steps:

- Stop discouraging membership in the SIU, and stop questioning, threatening, spying on or refusing to hire seamen because they filed NLRB charges.
- Stop refusing to bargain with the union.
- Reinstate eight fired seamen with full reimbursement for lost pay, bargain collectively with the union and put any agreement reached in writing.

NLRB members who voted to affirm the examiner's findings were Boyd Leedom and John H. Fanning. Member Philip Ray Rodgers dissented.

The facts as reported by the trial examiner were these:

Prior to August 1955, the Florida was owned and operated by P & O, a Connecticut corporation, and sailed under the U.S. flag between Miami and Havana.

Claiming a $500,000 loss in 1954 because of a drop in tourist traffic to Cuba and "foreign flag" competition, P & O organized Blue Steamship Co., a Liberian corporation, and transferred the registry for a nominal price to Blue with the approval of the U.S. Maritime Commission.

On Aug. 18, 1955, Blue chartered the Florida "bareboat" to the Green Trading Co., organized also by P & O, and Green on the same day entered into a "time subcharter" with P & O for operation of the vessel. Attorneys for P & O were listed as officers of the two Liberian firms. Later the Florida changed its port of call from Havana to Nassau in the Bahamas.

SIU organized the Florida's "predominantly alien" seamen in the summer of 1957, won an election June 19, 1958, and was certified as bargaining representative of the crew.

The trial examiner in his intermediate report cited an earlier runaway flag case in which U.S. District Judge Frederick Van Pelt Bryan of New York refused an injunction against picketing by the Maritime Union of ships registered by the Afran Transport Co. under the Liberian flag.

Judge Bryan ruled he had no authority to issue an injunction against the NMU and said any complaint against picketing would have to be taken under the Taft-Hartley Act to the NLRB.

Court Extends 80-Day Taft-Hartley Injunction Against Marine Unions

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—U. S. District Judge Sylvester J. Ryan has extended a Taft-Hartley order enjoining a strike of maritime unions for 80 days, and directed the five striking unions and six company groups involved to keep trying for new contract agreements.

Granting the request of the Kennedy Administration for an 80-day injunction, Judge Ryan ordered his previous temporary restrainer of July 3 to remain in effect until Sept. 21 unless agreements are reached before that date.

Several unions had agreed on new contract terms both before and after June 15, the date the strike started, but Ryan said he was convinced the strike was a "peril to our national health and safety" because 532 of the 842 vessels in the U.S. merchant fleet would be tied up if the restraining order was lifted.

The court rejected the claims of two unions, the Marine Engineers and the Masters, Mates & Pilots, that they should not be restrained because they are unions of officers or supervisors excluded from coverage of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Judge Ryan also denied a motion by the MEBA and Seafarers to modify the terms of his restraining order by limiting it only to those unions and employers who have not reached contract agreement.

Two Groups to Appeal

MEBA and the Seafarers said they will fight the T-H restraining order with an appeal to higher courts.

Other developments in the maritime dispute were:

- Sea traffic resumed almost its normal pace as picket lines were withdrawn on the Atlantic, Gulf and Pacific coasts and seamen returned to their ships. An exception was San Francisco, where the S.S. Flying Eagle was tied up. The NMU and American Radio Association said the employer refused to take the crew back.
- Four unions continued efforts to reach agreement on new contracts. The NMU has concluded four-year pacts with operators of 590 ships.

The ARA has settled with operators of about 400 ships on terms similar to those of the NMU—wage increases of 4 percent this year, and another 2.25 percent on June 16 of the next three years; an employer contribution of another $1.15 per man-day into pensions and welfare, and other benefits. Still unsettled are contracts with the Pacific Maritime Association representing 150 ships.

The SIU has settled with operators of 270 ships and has only a few to go. New contracts provide increases totaling about 4 percent in welfare, pension and vacation benefits; employer recognition of the union's right to board "runaway" ships and seek bargaining rights; and agreement on a joint committee to help solve industry problems.

MEBA contracts have been signed with operators of about 210 ships, with another 295 holding out. The contracts provide for a 4 percent "package" increase in fringe benefits and five days a month vacation. The union also won the right to organize engineers on foreign-flag ships and agreed to work with employers on a program to revive the shipping industry.

"Big Oil" Unsigned

The MMP signed with operators of 550 ships but still has not come to terms with the "Big Oil" group operating 65 tankers. Its agreements call for the same wage boosts as the ARA agreements; a vacation increase from 70 days to 90 days for masters; pension and welfare payments up from $2.50 per man-day to $3.20; a new arbitration clause on grievances, and overtime improvements.

The "runaway flag" issue was referred to a public fact-finding board, to be named by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, for non-binding recommendations.

Morse Defends Labor Missile Site Role

Anti-Union Charges 'Vicious and Unfair'

Efforts to make organized labor the "scapegoat" for the nation's missile gap have been denounced as "vicious and unfair" by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.).

In a major speech on the Senate floor, Morse took sharp issue with Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.), chairman of the Senate Government Operations Permanent Investigations subcommittee, charging that the McClellan hearings on the space lag constituted a "one-sided presentation of the . . . charges against labor."

At the same time he was critical of McClellan's conclusion that "wildcat strikes, work stoppages, slowdowns, featherbedding, and a deliberate policy of low productivity on the part of some unions and workers" were responsible for any Russian lead in space exploration.

Morse said there is abundant evidence to show that the missile program has been delayed "primarily" by "changes in plans, delays in decisions, uncertainty in approach" and the cancellation of one program in favor of another.

The Oregon Democrat declared it was "unfortunate" McClellan suspended his hearings, after listening to charges against unions, without giving C. J. Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., an opportunity to answer labor's critics.

SEN. WAYNE MORSE
Gives facts on missile bases

As a result, Morse said, "a great deal of ink (was) spilled across this land smearing labor."

He placed in the Congressional Record the full text of the statement Haggerty had been prepared to read to the McClelland subcommittee placing responsibility for delays in the missile program on management decisions and an "inordinate number" of changes in construction plans.

Morse assailed McClellan for stating on the Senate floor that "we would be at least many months ahead of our present man-in-space timetable had it not been for an incredibly low work-production output . . . at Cape Canaveral, Fla., and a loss of 87,000 man-days of labor there through work stoppages."

The Oregon senator said this conclusion was based on the testimony of B. G. McNabb, base operations manager in charge of Convair-Astronautics Co. at Canaveral, but added that the testimony was taken out of context. He noted that McNabb also declared:

"I am not trying to blame unions for this. There are other problems in this kind of program. There is the lack of decision on the part of the government, the lack of decision on the part of the Dept. of Defense, the lack of decision on the part of our own management. I am probably as guilty as anybody sometimes."

Morse also criticized the fact that "no testimony was produced at the hearing from any official of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration," which coordinates the man-in-space program for the federal government.

He produced a letter from James E. Webb, NASA administrator, which stated there had been only two major instances of work stoppages. In the letter Webb declared:

"These did not cause any slippage or postponements in the NASA Canaveral booster program. The Saturn launch program, for example, is on schedule and . . . the Mercury man-in-space shot was not delayed by labor troubles."

Morse urged members of the Senate not to "make the mistake of assuming that the labor disputes which have existed on the so-called missile bases represent 100 percent wrongdoing on the part of the unions and workers involved," adding:

Proof Held Lacking

"Out of all the facts which are available it seems clear that the critics of the workers in the missile establishments have not sustained the burden of proof that the missile lag is caused in any considerable measure by labor disputes at the bases."

He hailed the BCTD for its action last February in voluntarily adopting an unprecedented peacetime policy of using the full power of the department and its 18 affiliated unions to prevent disruption of the missile program.

He also praised Pres. Kennedy for his Executive Order, issued in May, setting up machinery for a joint labor-management-government program to resolve on-the-job disputes amicably. He called the program "an appropriate blending of governmental and private action within the framework of our system of free collective bargaining to reduce work stoppages to the lowest possible minimum."

The "great merit" in the Kennedy plan, Morse said, lies in its provision for machinery at both the local and national level to resolve disputes.

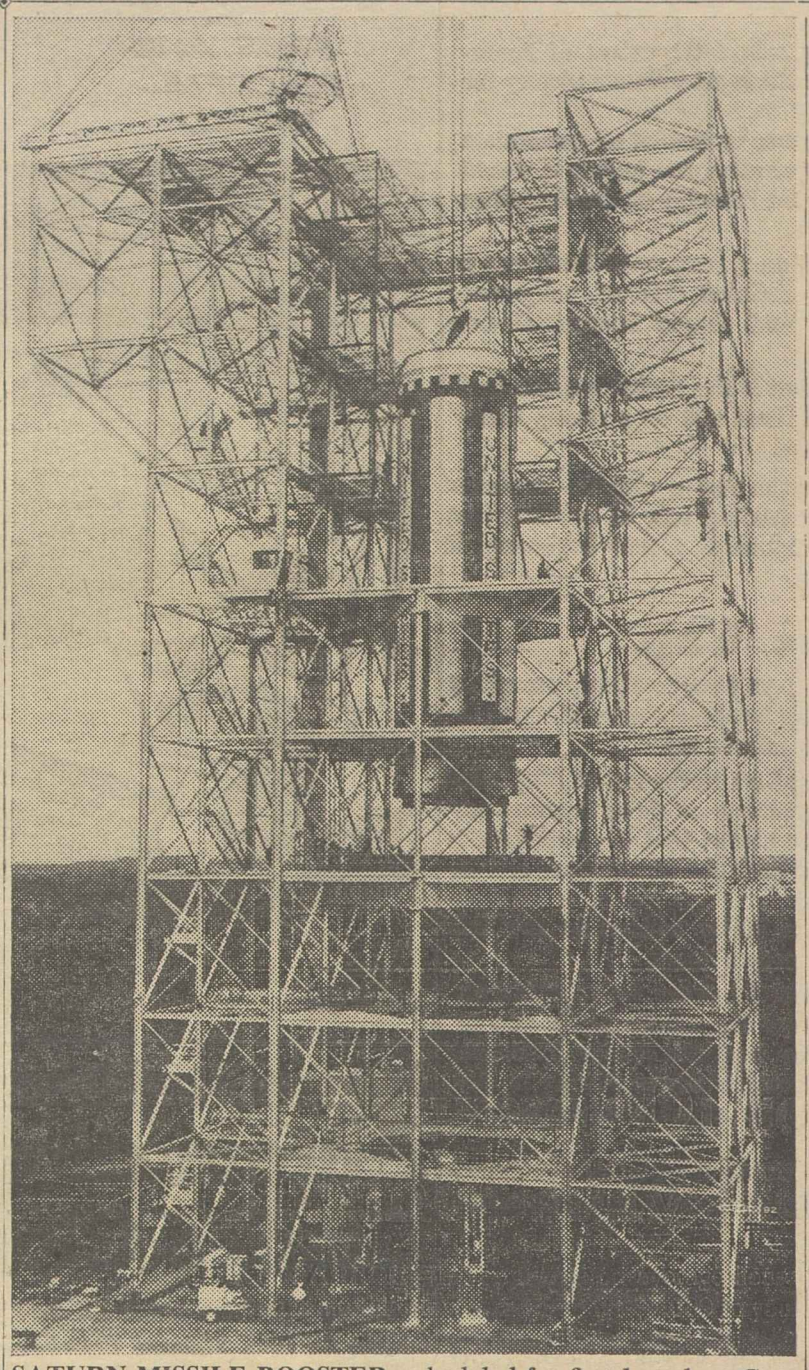
20 Missile Labor Peace Groups Set

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has announced the establishment of 20 missile site labor relations committees throughout the country as part of the federal machinery to insure uninterrupted operation of the nation's $3 billion space program.

Provision for the local committees was contained in Pres. Kennedy's Executive Order creating a national Missile Sites Labor Commission.

The local committees are charged with anticipating labor problems and attempting to dispose of them through voluntary settlement procedures. In addition they will encourage the establishment of adequate grievance and jurisdictional machinery where it does not now exist.

The committees, made up of labor, management and government representatives, will operate under the direction of Julius E. Kuczma, executive secretary of the Missile Sites Labor Commission.



SATURN MISSILE BOOSTER, scheduled for first launch at Cape Canaveral, Fla., toward end of this year, is lowered into what National Aeronautics & Space Administration calls its new "dynamic test stand" at G. C. Marshall Space Flight Center, Huntsville, Ala. Above booster for first launch will be two dummy upper stages.

Labor Day Safety Drive Under Way

Organized labor for the third year has launched a major attack on the toll of deaths and injuries from traffic and other accidents during the annual Labor Day period.

The long 1960 Labor Day holiday, at least in part because of the efforts of the AFL-CIO and other organized workers, was one of the safest in 10 years.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building Trades Dept. has been named chairman of the 1961 Labor Day Safety Campaign by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

The drive is sponsored by the AFL-CIO Safety & Occupational Health Committee, of which Vice Pres. Richard F. Walsh is chairman and John D. Connors executive secretary; the Labor Conference of the National Safety Council, and other labor bodies.

"Our national holiday was never intended to be desecrated by the injury and death of thousands of men, women and children," Meany said.

"Every union organization has an obligation to eliminate the suffering and heartache from collisions between cars, drownings and other accidents by participating in our nationwide Labor Day Safety Campaign."

A free kit of campaign materials may be obtained by local unions or central bodies on request from the National Safety Council's Labor Dept., 425 N. Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

It includes a list of suggested activities, a 5-minute safety talk, a news release, a poster, suggested spot radio announcements and other material essential to a successful campaign.

Answer to Insecurity, Joblessness Asked of Industry by Auto Workers

Detroit—The Auto Workers have served on four major auto firms a series of proposals reflecting what the UAW called its determination to "find an answer to the insecurity and unemployment" plaguing union members and their families.

The proposals were laid on the bargaining table in negotiations with General Motors, Ford, Chrysler and American Motors. The four firms employ some 600,000 UAW members.

Based on the program adopted by the union's special collective bargaining program here in April, the proposals call on management to join the UAW in seeking ways to provide more job stability for the employed, and jobs for the unemployed.

The first public response of an industry spokesman came from General Motors Vice Pres. Louis G. Seaton, who charged the union with presenting its demands in "piecemeal" fashion to get the "most public mileage."

Industry Reaction

Complaining that the UAW has "had a lot to say" about unemployment, plant relocations and other problems, Seaton acknowledged GM employment has decreased since 1955 but said it had climbed from 1947 to the present. The 1955 employment figure was reached during the industry's peak production year, he said.

Seaton asserted the average UAW worker got $122 a week last year compared with $57 in 1947.

Major features of the UAW proposals are these:

- A shift of hourly-rated wage workers to a weekly salary basis, with a "continuing committee" meeting on problems that may arise.
- Elimination of overtime periods for employed workers while others are unemployed.
- Recognition of the right of a worker to move with his job and the union's right to a voice in plant relocations.
- Major improvements in supplemental unemployment benefits, vacations, holidays and retirement provisions.
- Fair production standards.

At the first meeting with American Motors, UAW Pres. Walter Reuther cited "tremendous progress" by the firm entitling it to rank with Ford, GM and Chrysler as part of industry's "Big Four."

Pointing out that the UAW had taken account of American's individual needs in the past, Reuther said the company was now profitable, and he invited it to set a pattern for contract settlements this year. The company has 25,000 workers in Michigan and Wisconsin.

American's negotiators responded with a warning against "inflation" and called for a permanent labor-management conference to "change labor negotiations from a slugging match" to a cooperative effort.

In talks with the four managements, the union developed its major points as follows:

Salaries for Production Workers—It is time, the UAW argued, to end a system of pay that forces one group, the blue collar workers, to "bear the brunt of insecurities." It said the "rental of men and women" by an hour or fraction of an hour mocks our belief in the "individual worth of human beings."

Workweeks—The union asked an end to "short workweeks and short paychecks." Whenever production slows down, it said, only the "low man on the totem pole," the hourly wage worker, now "feels the pain."

Overtime—The union demanded that no overtime be scheduled in periods of heavy unemployment, except in emergencies and with the union's consent.

Hours of Work—Eight suggestions were made for providing more jobs by reducing hours, including shorter hours by the week, day or year, plus vacations, holidays, sabbatical leave and early retirement proposals.

SUB improvements—The union proposed that supplemental unemployment benefits be raised to 65 percent of gross pay, rather than take-home pay, and $2 for each dependent; elimination of the benefit ceiling, extension of benefits to 52 weeks.

Pensions—The UAW asked a flexible plan geared to the cost of living, with benefits going to the widow after a retired worker dies. It called also for retirement at 60, with "augmented" rate benefits until the worker reached 65, and a lump sum payment on retirement.

American Commitment

THE CONGRESSIONAL hearings on the President's foreign aid program are nearing conclusion and what may well become one of the most critical decisions of our times will be reached in the next few weeks.

That decision will fundamentally reflect the extent of America's commitment to lead the free world to an ultimate victory for peace and freedom.

To undercut the President's program, to restrict or emasculate the long-range planning and funding or otherwise impair it, would be to dilute in the eyes of the world the intensity of the American commitment.

The need for foreign economic aid on a long-range basis can be argued from many points of view—national defense, enlightened self-interest, opposition to tyranny and simple humanitarianism and brotherhood.

But basic to all of these approaches is the unchallengable fact that the structure of the free world must rest on a strong foundation of mutual economic assistance.

As the leader of the free world, as the nation with the resources to do the job, America must take a leading role in building that foundation. The Administration's program is a new beginning; it must be enacted without impairment.

The News Gap

A couple of months ago the newspapers were recklessly assaulting the building trades unions with big headline stories charging labor with responsibility for America's missile lag.

These stories supposedly were based on testimony at McClellan committee hearings. Yet the leading witness at those hearings testified flatly that the unions were not to blame, that the responsibilty lay in lack of decision on the part of both the government and industry.

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), in a major address to the U.S. Senate, has placed the facts in their proper focus.

Without condoning the strikes that did occur, he said that an exhaustive investigation clearly proved the missile lag is due to non-labor factors, such as confusion and changes in Pentagon plans, inability of our scientists to match Soviet Russia in developing missile booster power and lack of sufficient appropriations.

This is the unchallengeable truth. Yet to the best of our knowledge the newspapers that ran the original attacks have not carried a line of Morse's speech.

Youngsters in Louisville

THE LABOR MOVEMENT in Louisville, Ky., will probably be able to boast of the best registration files in the country this fall, as well as a group of teenagers who know what trade unions are all about.

The Teens for Labor Corps set up by the Women's Activities Div. of the Jefferson County COPE is an outstanding development.

Here's an approach that can and should be put into operation by COPE groups throughout the nation. More trade union members eligible to vote means a stronger labor movement; more youngsters who get a first-hand knowledge of trade unions in action will help insure the continuation of free, strong, democratic unions.

Jobs are Vanishing:

Automation in Offices Ending Clerk's Close Tie to Employer

Excerpts from an article on the effects of automation by Pres. Howard Coughlin of the Office Workers are given below.

By Howard Coughlin

OFFICE AND CLERICAL employes . . . either know of or have heard of office and clerical employes permanently displaced by automation. In some instances companies have completely disregarded seniority and have laid off older workers who had, because of years of service, achieved higher incomes.

Further, the unorganized have noted the change in character of the automated office and clerical staff. The manual and routine clerical workers who exhibited a certain amount of independence in thinking and judgment in the every-day use of their skills have faded or are fading from the picture. Machine operators are taking over.

Organizational leads brought to the attention of our office will, for the most part, be from those operating some type of mechanized equipment. They no longer feel the sense of proximity to the employer as did their predecessors. More important, because of this loss of proximity, they no longer absorb, nor are they vulnerable to, the usual employer propaganda which, in effect, states that they individually can do better than if they were represented by a union through collective bargaining.

Our local and international union representatives have been reporting this change of attitude on the part of the mechanized office employe for the past two years. The number of those feeling this way is swelling. Our full-time staff is busy handling numerous calls and communications from those indicating an awakening interest, in addition to their regular organizational assignments.

In addition to the protection that the Office Employes Intl. Union is able to afford to the organized office employe, it is the belief of our international union that the federal government has a prime responsibility to all office workers, organized and unorganized, to aid in the training and retraining of these workers who are replaced because of technological advances, commonly referred to as automation.

Although unemployment roles are currently the highest since the Thirties, there is still a shortage of qualified technical office employes.

We believe the federal government should institute a program in connection with our current unemployment insurance program to provide higher benefits and an additional 13 weeks of duration for all unemployed workers who are entitled to these benefits.

In addition, we believe the federal government should establish training centers where recipients of unemployment compensation would be trained or retrained in fields related to their normal occupations so they may be employed in jobs which are now going wanting for lack of qualified applicants.

WE BELIEVE the revised unemployment set-up should provide that the government pay transportation and subsistance allowances to unemployed workers during their training period. Also unemployment benefits should be increased by 50 percent to any worker actively studying in the training program outlined above.

Further, the requirement that in order to be eligible for unemployment compensation a person must be actively seeking and able to work should be waived. This would allow unemployed workers to immediately begin retraining themselves for jobs that are and will be available. This, in the long run, would cost less money.

When a worker is displaced in an office because his classification has encompassed manual procedures which are replaced by electronic equipment, it will be very difficult for such an employe to find work since the general trend is to discontinue this type of manual operation.

Office workers who are replaced by electronic data processing equipment are not merely being laid off because of a temporary recession but are the victims of technological advance in a method of revolution brought about by the ever-continuing search of management to replace manpower with machines.

Although we wholeheartedly believe in unemployment compensation as temporary relief in a period of recession, we believe it must be expanded as outlined above to minimize the effect of technical advance, which our country needs desperately at this time, and simultaneously provide the enlarged pool of technically trained operators that is continuously increasing as electronic equipment takes over more and more of the manual operations normally being performed by clerical employes.

Morgan Says:

Let's 'Keep Our Shirts On' Seen First Lesson of the Cold War

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

A KIND OF LONG-DISTANCE ping-pong game is now in progress between Moscow and Washington in which the balls of propaganda are loaded with dynamite. Before the whole shebang explodes in our faces everybody—including the pundits, the public, the politicians and the experts in the Pentagon—should realize that this is not necessarily a spectator sport. One false serve and we're all in it as what might be called participating victims. Already there is entirely too much irresponsible coaching from the bench, the grandstand and the press box.

Morgan

One day Khrushchev announced a suspension in the reduction of the Red armed forces and a simultaneous increase, by approximately 35 percent, in military spending. His excuse: the alleged western military build-up over the Berlin crisis.

The next day, at a huge and thunderous Moscow air show, the Russians displayed a dozen or so new kinds of aircraft, including big and supersonic jet bombers and fighters and a helicopter hefty enough to lift a house. The dispatches said the show was keyed to the crisis in Berlin.

On the following day, Defense Sec. McNamara revealed that Pres. Kennedy had ordered a review of our defense posture in the light of these developments.

Then, the clamor rose in Congress for vast new military expenditures, especially in heavy bombers, to match the Russian threat. Everybody and his brother, or so it seemed, had his own idea of how the problem should be met.

There very likely is no harder decision for a Secretary of Defense to make than what level of military power to recommend to support the government's foreign policy. He can apply no stock recipe here; he must instead apply judgment. The Administration's judgment still is that our conventional forces need more strengthening than our strategic bomber forces do. Its judgment still is that some 70-odd military bases around the world should be closed. And yet such a flap as the one created by Khrushchev's announcement and the air show sequel vividly illustrates how hard it is to stick to policy and how easy it is to stray from basic points.

On Capitol Hill, the big bomber boys, encouraged by like minds in the Air Force, lost no time in seizing on these developments to pressure for the revival of the controversial B-70 project which the Administration is continuing in a low key but not—at last reports—making operational. The pressure to keep bases open, especially where some congressman's constituents are involved, is likely now to increase.

In the view of some civilian sources in the Pentagon, the press is guilty of some "loose reporting" on the issue. Two fresh instances are cited. A military analysis published in the New York Times questioned the reliability of missile delivery of a nuclear warhead over manned-bomber delivery because, according to experts, "no nuclear warhead for an ICBM has ever been tested, as far as is known, after a complete flight." What the article didn't point out, according to other experts, is that none of the newly operational nuclear warheads for bombers has been similarly tested either.

The Washington Post reported that the Moscow air spectacular showed that "Russia has several types of new bombers and fighters in development whereas the United States has none." At a news conference, Deputy Defense Sec. Roswell L. Gilpatric denied it but wouldn't say what we were developing.

One lesson of all this, as one high Administration source put it, is to "keep our shirts on." Although it was issued before the Russians staged their air show, the President's order to review our defense posture came after Khrushchev's speech and it did have some elements of a propaganda play in it as a sort of warning reply to Moscow's threatening bid.

Assuming Berlin is, as advertised, an impending and not a remote crisis, it is hard to see what effect huge new expenditures could have immediately upon it and yet that is the way air power people were talking. It was almost as if they had forgotten Pres. Kennedy's words that there was nothing more urgently important before this Congress than his long-term foreign aid bill.

SOMETHING IMMEDIATE that may well impress Khrushchev is the Administration's decision to increase the Strategic Air Command's ground alert to 50 percent of the bomber force, instead of the present 30.

So woefully complicated is the whole subject of military policy, so shot through with inter-service rivalries and the interplay of those jealousies on not always selfless politicians and the press, that two developments in the Pentagon are particularly encouraging. The assistant secretary for public affairs, Arthur Sylvester, is being given additional authority to discourage the military brass from expounding foreign policy on their own and McNamara has decided to make some public speeches himself to put Pentagon policy and problems in clearer perspective from the top.

Washington Reports:

Congressional Experts Explain Operations of House, Senate

THE SENATE'S RULES can be amended any day the Senate is in session, Senate Parliamentarian Charles L. Watkins declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 450 radio stations.

Contrary to the popular impression that the rules can be changed only on the first day of each new Congress, Watkins said the sole requirement is one day's notice.

A senator "can move to amend any rule of the Senate or he can offer a complete new set of rules every day in the session if he gives a notice every day, notwithstanding the contentions that have been made," Watkins asserted.

Major recent controversy has been the efforts of liberals to amend Rule 22, so that "unlimited debate" or filibuster can be prevented.

Dr. Martin Sweig, secretary to House Majority Leader John McCormack (D-Mass.), remarked on the same program that the House rules, on the other hand, cannot be changed once they have been approved and fixed at the beginning of the session.

"I would be of the opinion that you would have to have special legislation to change the rules," he said. "You can ask for a suspension of the rules, which require a unanimous consent."

IN A DISCUSSION of Senate and House procedures, Sweig pointed out another difference in that House bills must go from a legislative committee through the Rules Committee to reach the floor, while on the Senate side, as explained by Watkins, bills go from legislative committee to the Senate calendar. He said the majority Policy Committee then arranges the schedule.

"At an appropriate time, usually the majority leader of the Senate will announce the schedule or ask for uanimous consent for a bill to be considered," Watkins explained.

Sweig took the opportunity of the interview to ask voters to write their congressmen.

"If I were a constituent," he said, "I would write a letter, as a rule not longer than a page. I would express my views on a certain piece of legislation.

"I would not make the letter completely critical. To get my views across, it would be best if I were constructively critical. Such letters tell a congressman how his constituents are thinking. They guide him in making his decisions."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE SCHOOL AID BILLS are so entangled in emotional issues, largely involving the question of assistance to private and religious schools, that they are tightly stoppered in the House Rules Committee. It is well to have the reminder from Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.), a spokesman on the committee for the majority Democrats, that the basic opposition still arises from conservative resistance to the "federal tax system, based on ability to pay."

Three bills are now resting in the Rules group. Bolling says he thinks "eventually" they will be cleared, because "this issue is important enough for the House to have an opportunity to vote."

As of now, however, the bills have not moved after they were cleared by the House Education Committee and sent to the 15-member Rules unit. An unusual coalition of two southern Democrats, all five Republicans and two northern liberal Democrats has blocked action. The two northern liberals—Representatives James J. Delaney (N. Y.) and Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (Mass.)—come from districts with large groups of Catholic voters.

The Education Committee's bill to extend the National Defense Education Act includes a section authorizing construction loans for specific limited purposes to private and parochial schools. Delaney originally said he wanted two bills—the NDEA measure and the bill for grants to public schools—to be cleared simultaneously, but now suggests that he may prefer a single bill encompassing both public school grants and aid to parochial schools.

THE QUESTION OF FEDERAL funds to religious schools obviously involves intense feelings. Pres. Kennedy, a Catholic, expressed strong opposition on constitutional grounds. Other Catholics disagree vigorously. Many Protestants see no constitutional bars to limited assistance. In fact, federal funds actually have gone to church colleges for construction purposes under the existing aid to higher education program.

In any case, it is not the religious issue fundamentally that is at stake in the Rules Committee. The issue is economic. The seven conservative members—the Republicans and two southern Democrats, Chairman Howard W. Smith (Va.) and William M. Colmer (Miss.) are opposed to school aid, both public and parochial, just as they are opposed to other federal welfare and social programs that involve the spending of federal funds.

The conservatives talk in terms of "states' rights." But they serve the purposes of groups that prefer social programs to be financed by the states on purely monetary grounds. No state revenue system puts the same emphasis on a graduated income tax that the federal revenue system does.

As Bolling said on a nationally televised program, "People who have a great deal of money obviously don't like to pay on the basis of ability to pay. And this is the reason that every federal program —not just education—is bitterly opposed" by powerful business lobbying groups and legislators who agree with these lobbies.

IN THE VIRGINIA DEMOCRATIC PRIMARY, the Byrd organization beat down the first serious challenge in many years to its tight control of the state. This is a misfortune for the people and for the whole South, for a crack in the monolithic machine that has run Virginia would mean that liberals in other southern states would take courage to fight again to reform their own political systems.

The organization's major sin against the people may be that it has trained the voters to lassitude. It has trained the poor and lowly not to use the political weapons in their hands, but to leave government to a self-chosen few. Most veteran Virginia officeholders do not face real contests; the accolade of the Byrd organization is on them, and the people lack experience in politics.

Even in the primary contest this year, where well-known candidates ran openly against the organization, fewer than one-third of the registered voters bothered to go to the polls, even after having paid their poll taxes. Only about 15 percent of the state's adult citizens voted.

"WRITE YOUR CONGRESSMAN," Dr. Martin Sweig, secretary to House Majority Leader Rep. John McCormack (D-Mass.), left, urged during an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. On the same program, Senate Parliamentarian Charles L. Watkins said Senate rules, such as Rule 22 that permits filibusters, could be amended on any day of a session.

How to Buy:

Buying Larger Sizes Among Best Money Saving Techniques

By Sidney Margolius

BECAUSE OF CURRENT complaints that some large packages of detergents offer little or no savings over the small ones, you might get the impression that larger sizes don't save you money.

This is not true. Buying larger sizes of foods and cleaning supplies still is one of your best money-saving techniques.

This department has just completed a comparison of the cost of small and large sizes of 139 food and cleaning products. The results are revealing:

● Average savings by buying the large sizes of packaged foods against the smaller sizes were found to be 17 percent. This shows that careful shopping, and planning menus to make use of large sizes, can save a family an important slice of its food bill. It now costs $147.60 a month to provide adequate meals for a family of four (boy of 13 and girl of 8). A saving in the neighborhood of 17 percent by this and other devices means a family would have as much as $300 a year to use for other needs. Putting aside $300 a year for 18 years, at an interest return of 3.5 percent, can build up a fund of over $7,500—enough to help a couple of kids through college.

● The savings on larger sizes of cleaning aids and detergents averaged 15 percent—also an important economy. However, there were several examples of larger sizes giving you no worthwhile savings and in fact, a couple actually cost more per ounce that the small.

BIGGEST DIFFERENCE in costs is in dry cereals. Cereals packaged for individual servings actually cost you a little over 4 cents an ounce. But the so-called "king" size box costs less than 2 cents—a saving of over half the cost. Thus you can earn good money by having your family pour its cereal out of a large box.

It's also important to go for the big boxes in buying crackers and cookies. They average 33 percent less per ounce than small versions of the same brands. Big jars of peanut butter also give you unusually large savings over their little sisters.

The detergents are what are really confusing the public. The savings are there—on the average. But our survey found practically no savings in the medium and large packages of Tide over the 3 lb. container, very little in Blue Cheer or Fab, while the large box of Rinso Blue actually costs a little more than the small one, at least the day we shopped. Prices fluctuates as manufacturers offer 7 cents off one on another of their brands.

On the other hand, there are sizable savings on Surf's large box, making it one of the most-reasonable detergents in the large size, but one of the most expensive in the small. When it comes to AD, the small package, at this particular shopping, was priced so low that it cost less per ounce than the medium size.

Complaints that manufacturers have made it difficult to compare costs are justified. Soap manufacturers just don't talk the same language as the rest of us. What Vel calls its "large" package is really the small box. Dash has a "regular" size, which is really its small size, a "giant size", which is its medium size, and a "jumbo" box which is smaller than the "home laundry" size.

Trying to figure out the cost per ounce is almost impossible in some cases, as witnesses at recent Senate hearings complained. Tide has one package which is 3 lbs., 1.25 oz.; another, 5 lbs., 3.75 oz., and a third, 16 lbs., 1 oz. In the example of Tide save your time—all three came to approximately the same cost per ounce in our survey. Or try to compare costs of Dash. One box has 1 lb., 8.5 oz., another has 3 lbs., 2.5 oz. and the third has 9 lbs., 13 oz. Peculiarly, while the biggest size costs less per ounce than the small, the medium size costs more than the small box.

Both Tide and Dash are Procter & Gamble products. This largest soap manufacturer seems to make it especially hard for people to figure out the cost per ounce. P & G's "Mr. Kleen" looks to be the same size as Handy Andy, Co-Op Glow, Rose-X and Bon Ami liquid cleaners. But Mr. Kleen has only 28 ounces compared to a full quart (32 ounces) for all the others, and costs the same 69 cents as Handy Andy and almost twice as much as the 35-39 cents charged for the others.

In general, our survey found Procter & Gamble content listing difficult to find. Perhaps Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), who recently held hearings on confusing packaging, ought to invite the president of Procter & Gamble to testify on how to kleen up this situation.

Good Chance of Rise:

Consumer Durables Buying May Boom

ANN ARBOR—If you live in an average household, your family has a total investment of about $7,000 in your car, refrigerator, and other consumer durable goods.

If you tried to sell them today, you'd probably get about $3,300, allowing for normal wear and tear.

If you followed the national pattern, your spending for these durable goods increased at a phenomenal rate—8 percent annually—from 1946 through 1955.

Then, having satisfied many long deferred needs from World War II, you leveled off your spending for cars and the like. For the past five years, your investment in consumer durables has increased only 1 percent annually.

Should you decide to step up this investment rate to only 2 or 3 percent in the years ahead, the automobile industry and other durable goods producers would face a glowing future.

And, since your replacement needs will grow and there'll be quite a few more new families being formed next year, there's a good chance this 2 or 3 percent increase will be realized.

These are some highlights of an analysis of "Consumer Durables: Stocks and Expenditures," just published by the Foundation for Research in Human Behavior, an independent organization with headquarters on the University of Michigan campus.

The relative size and condition of consumer goods naturally is an important factor bearing on future purchases of these goods. But it's not the only one: how much income people receive, how they think and feel about the economy, their cash and debt position all influence buying decisions.

The average American household today has a net investment, after allowing for normal wear and tear, of about $900 in autos and $2400 in other durable goods.

NATIONALLY, the net value of consumer durables is four times as great as the total amount of consumer installment credit outstanding. It's more than half the value of business investment in plant and equipment, and probably greater than the entire Soviet investment in plant and equipment.

Historically, the net value of consumer durables per household more than doubled between 1945 and 1957. Heavy spending for this purpose worked off the war-accumulated backlog just four years ago.

Since 1957, durable goods spending has slumped to "an abnormally low rate." Two major factors have contributed to this trend:

● A sharp decline in new household formation from an average of 1.5 million between 1947 and 1950 to 770,000 in 1960.

● A modest but accelerating increase in the average age of durable goods kept by American families.

As more new households are formed, and as replacement needs for durable goods increase, the 1957-61 trend will be reversed. The question is not whether but when this will happen—and how great the shift will be.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Modern Woman's Aptitude Test Gauges Her Chance of Survival

By Jane Goodsell

THE MODERN American housewife needn't fight Indians like her pioneer ancestors, but modern civilization presents her with plenty of challenges. It takes skill, resourcefulness and courage to survive in this day and age, too. The 20th Century has pitfalls aplenty, and a lady has to keep her wits about her to survive.

The following aptitude test may prove helpful in gauging a modern woman's ability to cope with her environment.

Manual dexterity: Can she remove one box of soap chips from a towering pyramid of cartons at the supermarket without sending the whole structure tumbling to the floor?

Ability to think in the abstract: Can she tell time by looking at a wristwatch that has no numbers on its dime-sized face?

Sense of direction: Can she pilot a car through a cloverleaf traffic maze without losing her head?

Adroitness: Can she get in and out of a sports car in a short, tight skirt without running a stocking or splitting a seam?

Resourcefulness: Can she whip up a costume on overnight notice for a grade school child who is playing the part of Tommy Toothbrush in the health pageant?

Vigilance: Can she smoke an entire carton of filtered cigarettes without once lighting the wrong end?

Intelligence: Can she figure out whether it is cheaper to park the car in a lot that (a) charges 35 cents the first hour and 25 cents for each succeeding hour; or (b) a lot that charges a straight 30 cents an hour; or (c) a lot that is free the first hour if a purchase is made at a certain department store; or (d) a lot that gives trading stamps?

Powers of perception: Can she recognize a genuine ranch mink at 60 paces?

Ability to think ahead: Does she remember to take the turkey out of the freezer the day before?

Fingertip sensitivity: Can she find her lipstick in a purse the size of a horse's feed bag, containing 46 other objects?

Visual ability: Can she read the menu in a dimly-lit restaurant without lighting a match?

Efficiency: Does she remember to turn off the electric blanket when she gets up in the morning?

Bravery: Will she risk walking across a sidewalk grating in spike-heeled shoes?

In Federationist Article:

AFL-CIO Calls For Rejection Of Tax Boon for Business

The Kennedy Administration's proposal to grant $1.7 billion in tax relief to business firms to spur investment should be rejected, the AFL-CIO has declared, adding that income tax cuts for lower income families should have priority if taxes can be reduced in any form.

Labor's argument against the investment tax credit proposal is detailed in an article in the July issue of The American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's monthly journal.

The article, produced by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and entitled "Priorities of Tax Relief: People or Property," reviews the quest of business groups for tax relief, the issue of alleged obsolescence of plant and equipment and the rising cash flow to corporations.

"The conclusion that the tax credit proposal should be rejected is inevitable," the article states.

"Neither this device, a corporate tax cut, nor a further step-up of depreciation write-offs can be justified as necessary on the basis of any valid claim that American business would otherwise be unable to obtain money for investment.

"Even if the stock of business plants, machines and equipment was, indeed, critically obsolete—which, clearly, is not the case—there are ample available funds to finance rising business investment."

The Dept. of Research contends that the proposed tax credit for business could not assure a substantial addition to scheduled investment and that the "unneeded handout" to business firms would not encourage the kind of investment required by national priority needs.

"If federal taxes can now be reduced," the AFL-CIO said, "basic national needs as well as recognition of the heavy tax burden on low and moderate-income families clearly indicate that a reduction of the individual income tax should receive first consideration."

Proposal Broken Down

The Kennedy Administration proposal would grant business special deductions from taxes for new investment, in addition to current depreciation allowances.

Specifically, it would grant a tax credit of 10 percent of the first $5,000 of new capital investment; a 6 percent credit on investment in excess of one-half of a company's depreciation allowance for the year; a credit of 15 percent of investment in excess of 100 percent of the yearly depreciation allowance.

There would be a ceiling of 30 percent of the tax liability of a corporation or individually-owned firm with, however, a five-year carry-over of unused tax credit.

The cost in lost revenues to the federal government, according to government estimates, would be about $1.7 billion in 1961, the AFL-CIO article said.

The article points out the AFL-CIO has testified before Congress in opposition to such proposals for business tax relief, arguing that they are unnecessary at this time.

The article examines what it calls a major argument of investment tax credit advocates—that a crisis of old age has overtaken America's plants, machines and equipment.

Much attention has been given, the AFL-CIO says, to a 1958 survey of the McGraw-Hill Publishing Co. which asked businessmen: "What would be the cost to replace all obsolete facilities with the best new plant and equipment?"

'Far from Crisis'

The AFL-CIO notes that despite the failure to define the key word "obsolete" and despite the vague question, business executives offered a total estimate of $95 billion to replace "obsolete" plant and equipment. This amounted to 14 percent of the nation's $683 billion estimated capital stock at that time.

"This is far from crisis proportions," the AFL-CIO declares.

Looking at the age of the nation's privately-owned machinery and equipment, the article says the average age was 9 years in 1959, compared to 8.5 years in 1955, 10.9 years in 1944, 9.6 years in 1930 and 9.8 years in 1920. The increase in age in recent years it attributes to the economic slowdown.

In examining the downward trend in equipment five years old and less group—50 percent of machinery and equipment in 1950 and 37 percent in 1959—the federation's economists say this was due in part to the investment "bunching" after World War II to make up for the lag of the depression and war years. The three post-1950 recessions aided this decline, it says.

A similar "bunching" occurred abroad as the war-devastated economies of Western Europe, Russia and Japan were rebuilt, leading to a superficial impression that America is being outproduced, the article observed.

While a few industries may be suffering technological lags for special reasons, the article continues, there is no evidence that technological decay has overtaken the nation. As the country recovers from the recession and the "bunched" investments of competing nations grow older, America's machines and equipment will grow younger in average age while those of other nations will level off or rise.

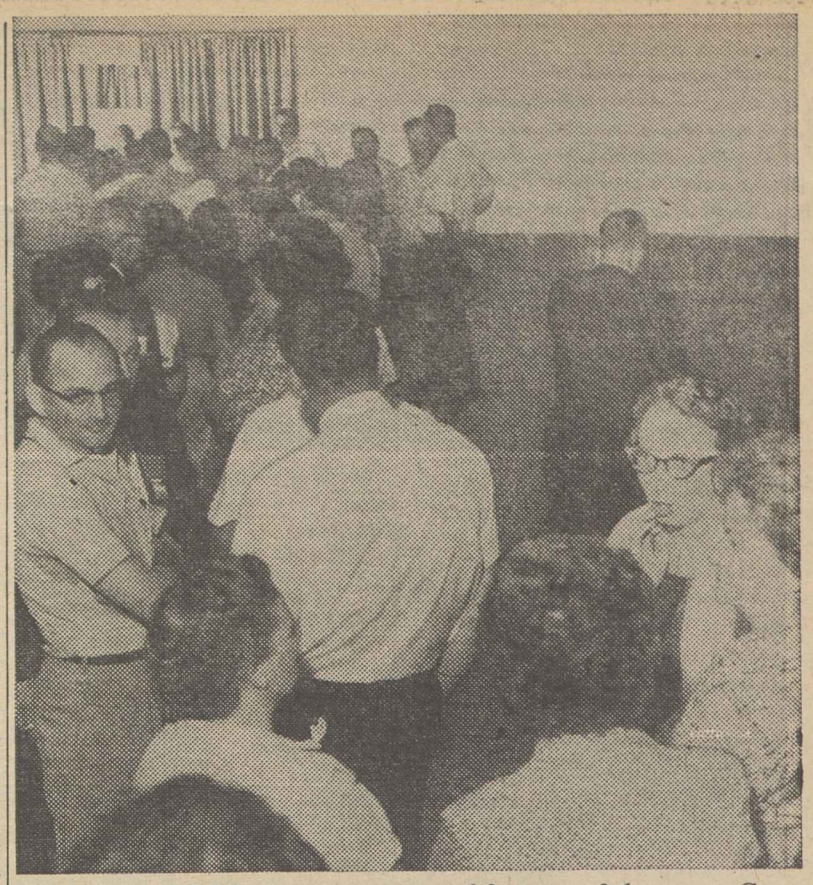
Investment High

On the question of whether business needs the $1.7 billion annual subsidy, the AFL-CIO observes that corporations invested $313 billion in new plant and equipment from 1946 through 1959. Only $34 billion came from outside sources such as stock issues, while the great bulk came from internal sources.

Profits and depreciation allowances account for almost all the outlay for investment in new plants, the article declares. Depreciation allowances have been rising "spectacularly," the article noted, comparing the $12 billion total for 1953 with the $23 billion set aside in 1960.

The AFL-CIO points to testimony by the Secretary of the Treasury that 14 percent of the benefits would go to agriculture, already "heavily subsidized"; 22 percent to "commercial and other" businesses, presumably including bowling alleys and so on; and only 42 percent to manufacturing. This would include things like juke boxes, the article adds.

"High-level operations and the expectation that sales will continue to rise" are the soundest bases for rising investment, the AFL-CIO declares. Income tax cuts would stimulate consumer demand and meet national needs, it concludes.



SECRET BALLOT election was one of features of the recent Communications Workers convention in Kansas City, Mo., where a contest for office was settled as delegates went to assigned voting booths, showed their credentials and marked their ballots. Ballots were tallied and the results certified by Ernst & Ernst, Cleveland firm of certified public accountants.

'Truth-in-Lending' Bill Hearings Start July 17

A Senate Banking subcommittee will open hearings July 17 in a second attempt to push through Congress the labor-backed "truth-in-lending" bill sponsored by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.).

In hearings last year the AFL-CIO and the federation's Industrial Union Dept. strongly supported the bill, but after the measure was approved in subcommittee, it died without action in the full Banking Committee. Douglas re-introduced it in substantially the original form when the new Congress convened.

Douglas has described the bill as designed "to strip the disguises and camouflage that hide or distort the true price of credit."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its midwinter meeting a few weeks earlier had endorsed it with a declaration that passage "would do much to alert consumers to the high prices they now pay for money."

The bill would impose two obligations on the seller or lender in every transaction involving interest:

- To give a clear statement of the finance charges as differentiated from the sales price of the article.
- To disclose the simple annual interest rate on the unpaid balance of the debt, not the rate on the original principal.

The bill will gain new impetus if, as expected, Pres. Kennedy's Council of Economic Advisers issues a report strongly backing the measure.

The CEA report, due to be made public soon, is said to laud the bill for its stabilizing effect on the economy and to stress that it would increase competition.

When the bill was before the subcommittee last year, the AFL-CIO declared the federal government has an "obligation" to protect the user of credit just as it safeguards him against deceptive advertising, bad food and medicine, and incorrectly-labeled clothing, furniture, etc.

The bill, the federation said, "does not attempt to regulate the terms of any consumer financing contract."

"It does attempt," the testimony continued, "to simplify consumer finance contracts by requiring full cost disclosure in such a way that the consumer himself can make an intelligent choice regarding the credit that is being furnished him."

During the same hearings L. S. Buckmaster, then an IUD vice president, denounced the "back-alley business practices" of some finance agencies and called for legislation to "help protect . . . trusting consumers against glib-tongued" lenders. To require a consumer "to examine the fine print with the eagle eye of a Sherlock Holmes," he added, is "degrading to all concerned."

Price Rigging Plot Detailed in IUE Booklet

"The Public Plunderers" is the title of a recent 68-page booklet which recounts the price-fixing, bid-rigging conspiracy of 29 of the nation's leading electrical equipment manufacturers and raises a skeptical eyebrow to the claim that the industry has learned its lesson.

The booklet is published by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, which has had first-hand experience with most of the companies involved.

It is based in large part on an article by IUE Pres. James B. Carey and it also includes the text of Carey's remarks to a recent General Electric stockholders' meeting in which he called for a far-reaching house-cleaning to restore GE's tarnished reputation.

More than half the booklet is made up of newspaper, magazine, church and congressional comment on the immorality of the corporate conduct, the threat to the principle of competitive enterprise and the continued quotations of identical prices.

In a letter to Carey, Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, praised the booklet as "a unique public service" and said the IUE "deserves the heartfelt thanks of all who believe that the preservation of our American way of life depends on the maintenance of business morality and competitive free enterprise."

Single copies of "The Public Plunderers" may be obtained without charge from the IUE, 1126 Sixteenth Street, N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Management Costs Cited in High Prices

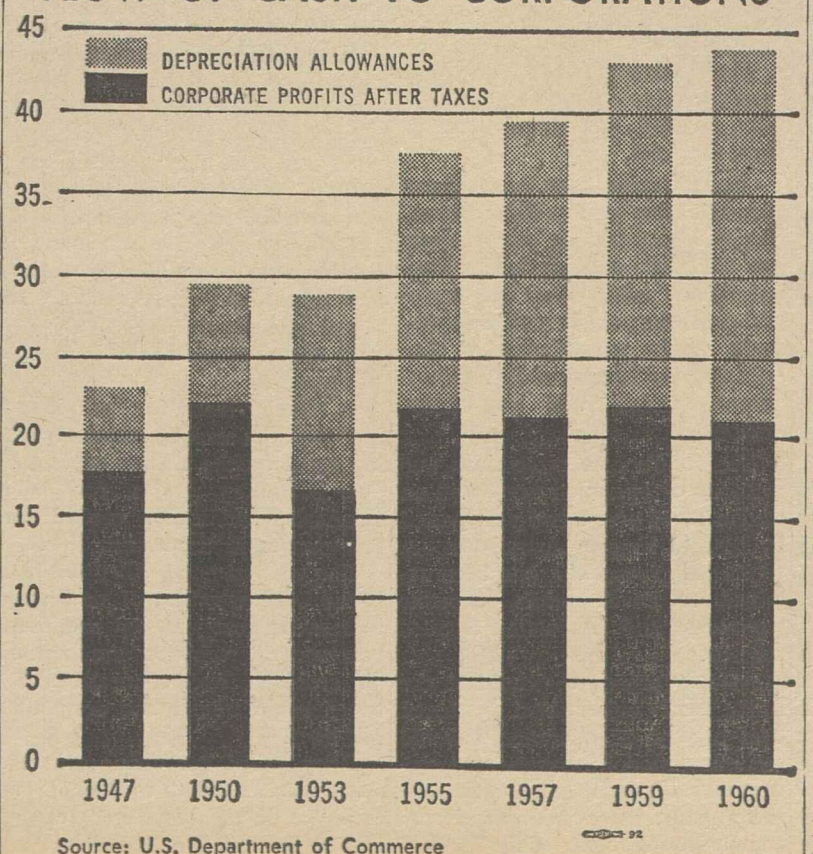
Winnipeg, Man.—The head of the Montreal Stock Exchange, Eric W. Kierans, recently told the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce that Canadian industry is over-administered and over-managed and that this, far more than decent wages, is responsible for the high cost of Canadian goods.

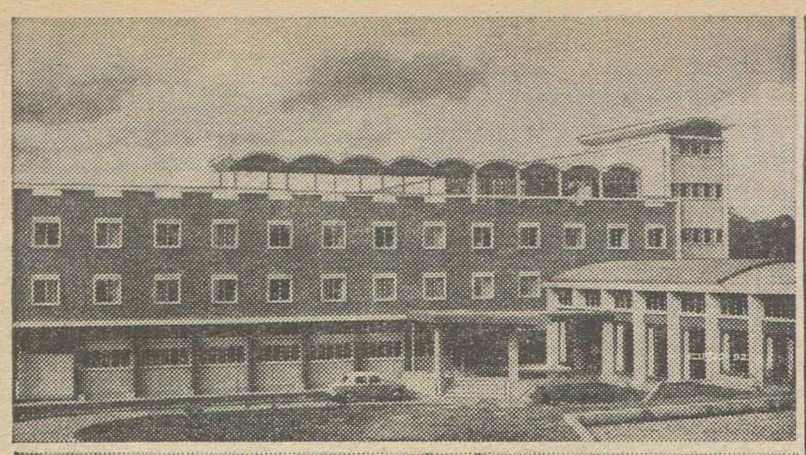
"There is a recurring tendency," the Montreal businessman said, "to blame the cost of labor for our inability to compete successfully in many world markets. In point of fact, a great deal of this criticism is unfounded and industrial leaders, who frequently reiterate this charge, would do well to check their statistics."

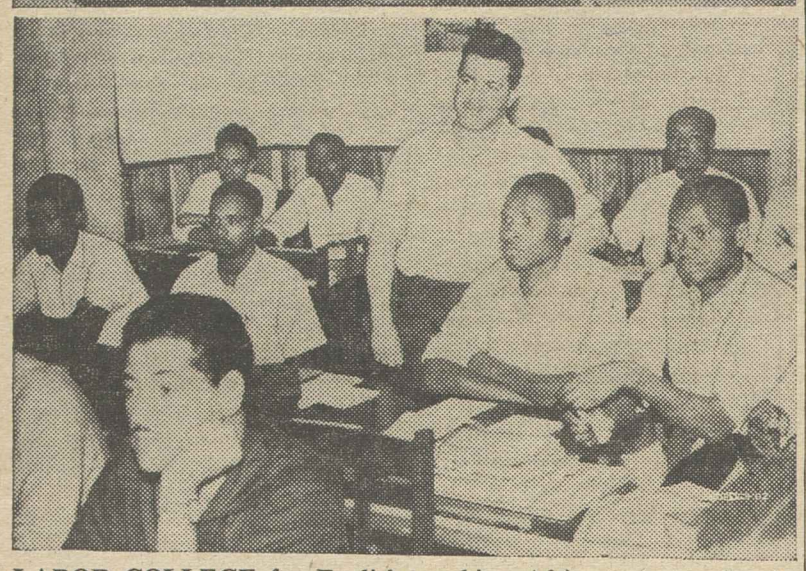
The most obvious change in the structure of costs, he said, has been overwhelming increases in the number of office and administrative workers.

He suggested that Canadian businessmen who are fond of comparing Canadian wage-rates with Japanese wages might also compare administrative and selling costs.

"Expanding management and administrative functions . . . would seem to be more responsible for higher costs than wage increases," Kierans said.







LABOR COLLEGE for English-speaking Africans set up by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions at Kampala, Uganda, and dedicated recently is shown at top. Below is a scene in one of the classrooms in the $350,000 building, which was paid for by gifts from workers and their unions all over the world.

African Labor College Dedicated by ICFTU

Kampala, Uganda—The permanent home of the African Labor College of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the center of widespread trade union educational activities extending over all English-speaking Africa, has been dedicated and has embarked upon the training of its first class of 40 students.

The $350,000 building was paid for by contributions from unions and their members in all parts of the world who also donated funds for books, furniture and equipment. The plant stands in six acres of woodland on a hill about two miles from the center of Kampala and provides residential accommodations as well as educational and recreational facilities for each class of 40 students.

Attending the dedication were ICFTU Pres. Arne Geijer, Assistant Gen. Sec. Herbert Tulatz and Albert Hammerton, chief of the ICFTU Education Service. Irving Brown, AFL-CIO European representative, brought greeting from the federation as representative of Pres. George Meany. Members of the executive board of the ICFTU's African Regional Organization also attended.

The idea of an African labor college was first advanced in 1951 by an ICFTU delegation attending a conference at Douala, in the Cameroons. The college was opened, after much preparation, in temporary quarters in Kampala in 1958 and has since given four-month courses to about 200 union officials and staff members who have returned to their homes all over Africa to share the knowledge they gained with fellow members.

The faculty is headed by Sven Fockstedt, a trade union educator from Sweden, with Odero Jowi, an economist from Kenya, as vice principal. Lecturers include George McCray, a member of the State, County & Municipal Workers from the United States; Don Taylor, of the Steelworkers in Canada; Robert Plant, of Great Britain's National Union of Journalists, and Udok Poro, from Nigeria.

The college gives basic training in economics, trade union administration, democratic procedures, the international labor movement and special African problems.

In addition the students hold debates, write essays, conduct mock parliaments and, splitting into workers' and employers' "representatives," practice collective bargaining.

The facts that Africans from different nations live and work together at the college, developing friendships beyond their own national borders, and that the school offers extension courses in other countries, are credited as making a major contribution to African unity.

The ICFTU now is formulating plans for a training center for French-speaking African union members.

Indignant Housewives Belabor Markets' 'Planned Confusion'

More than 350 housewives throughout the nation have written Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) to back up his complaint that American shoppers "day by day pay more and more for less and less in bigger containers bearing smaller and smaller type."

The letters, which followed recent hearings by a Senate Anti-trust subcommittee into misleading labeling and packaging, blistered manufacturers who claim odd-size "giant, super economy, giant economy and super king-size" containers. Nearly half the letters contained labels from cans and box tops from cartons as examples of deceptive practices. One writer sent in 25 labels compiled from a single trip to the market.

During the two-day hearings, which will be resumed this fall, the Hart subcommittee heard from organizations including the AFL-CIO, Consumers Union and the National Consumers League, experts such as Persia Campbell, former New York State consumer counsel, and individual witnesses including Writer Marya Mannes and Sen. Maurine Neuberger (D-Ore.).

Witnesses described the frustration of the budget-conscious shopper pushing a cart through the "planned confusion" of the modern supermarket.

The AFL-CIO statement suggested that the shopper would need a pocket-sized calculator to figure out the best buy among the "giant" size box of four competing brands of detergent selling at these prices:

- Two pounds, 15 ounces for 82 cents, with "15 cents off."
- Three pounds, 6 ounces for 79 cents with " 10 cents off."
- Three pounds even, for 61 cents.
- Three pounds, 5.5 ounces for 79 cents.

First, of course, the shopper would have to discover the often hard-to-find weight listing on the packages, which are all deceptively the same size.

Mrs. Mannes agreed that the housewife needs to take "a computer, a slide rule and an MIT graduate to market" to be sure of getting the best buy.

"What housewife with a kid inside the cart and one at her heels can spare the time?" she asked.

One brand of soap pads contains four, another contains five. Both sell for 13 cents. But you won't know the difference "unless you turn the box upside down and use your bifocals," she complained.

Mrs. Sarah H. Neuman, a member of the Consumers League board of directors, brought a display of grocery and household products into the committee room to demonstrate her point.

Story on Napkins

"This carton of napkins, marked plainly 80, is a well-known product," she said. Some time ago the label was changed and the number removed. The consumer, if she noticed the change and checked, was reassured that the contents still remained the same.

"Then, without any other change, the number of napkins was reduced to 70."

Consumers Union Pres. Colston E. Warne sharply criticized the use of oversized partially-filled containers to mislead consumers into thinking they are getting more for their money.

Mrs. Neuberger said that because the Food & Drug Administration has never spelled out in detail where on a package or in what type the net contents must appear, the careful shopper "stands in the supermarket aisle, twisting and turning the package, looking over all four sides to try to find a guide to contents and weight."

Mrs. Campbell pointed out that the average housewife should not be expected "to make the computations necessary to divide fractionalized weights into fractionalized prices to find out the best buy."

Referring to the "jumbo full pound" and the "giant half-quart," she said the subcommittee "would serve a useful purpose if it did no more than undertake a jungle rescue operation for the English language."

AFL-CIO Statement

The AFL-CIO statement, submitted to the subcommittee by Legislative Rep. George D. Riley, pointed out:

"The hard-pressed and busy worker's family has little time to spare in outwitting the packaging industry, even though the tax on family earnings from failure to do so may add up to substantial amounts of money over a period of time."

The federation's testimony concluded with the hope "that reasonable manufacturers" will cooperate in developing "ground rules . . . to restrain competition by deception and to halt the victimizing of the consuming public."

While the subcommittee considered legislative proposals to standardize container sizes and require prominent labeling of weight, one dissenting voice was raised.

Declared Paul S. Wills, president of the Grocery Manufacturers of America, Inc.:

"Variations in size are normal developments in order to satisfy consumer preferences.

"This freedom to adjust price and package sizes we believe is basic and must be preserved under our free enterprise system of business and there is nothing wrong with it, legally or otherwise."

N.Y. Bricklayers Set Up Prepaid Drug Program

New York—A plan under which some 7,000 members of seven locals of the Bricklayers and their dependents will have their doctors' prescriptions filled at a cost of 50 cents each has gone into effect here.

The program is sponsored by the Bricklayers Insurance & Welfare Fund, which will pay the remainder of the cost, regardless of the amount, from a special $250,000 appropriation.

Announcement of the program was made jointly by Sec.-Treas. Andrew J. Lawler of the Bricklayers' New York Executive Committee and Joseph Holme, president of the Associated Brick Mason Contractors of Greater New York.

Beneficiaries include the wives and children under 19 years old of the union members, and about 1,000 retired members and their dependents. The program applies to all medical prescriptions signed by physicians, dentists and osteopaths, including those for insulin. It will not cover articles sold without prescriptions, such as vitamins and diet supplements.

The plan will operate through 1,500 neighborhood pharmacies in the five New York boroughs and in Nassau and Suffolk Counties, and according to Lawler and Holme, "will permit union members and their families to obtain all their drug needs close to their homes."

The participating pharmacies have agreed to accept an established price schedule for all the prescriptions they fill.

Beneficiaries have been given identification cards which authorize the participating drug stores to fill their prescriptions. The pharmacy will collect the basic 50-cent charge and mail a duplicate of the prescription to the Bricklayers Insurance & Welfare Fund, which will pay bills monthly.

The fund's cost projections and methods of operation are based on studies made over a two-year period by Harold Faggen Associates. A registered pharmacist has been retained to check prices, expedite payments and maintain detailed records.

Albert Cerussi, chairman of the fund, said information gathered over a year of operation "should serve as a model for more extensive drug benefits for members and pave the way for other unions and consumer groups to adopt similar programs."

Labor Backs Kennedy Traffic Congestion Bill

The AFL-CIO has backed an Administration bill for a study of traffic congestion in big cities but urged a "sizeable improvement" in the $15 million proposed.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. George D. Riley told a House Banking & Currency subcommittee that the Urban Transportation bill of 1961, introduced by Rep. Abraham Multer (D-N.Y.), needs amendments to meet traffic problems he called "critical" and "appalling."

The "urgency" expressed in a message from Pres. Kennedy is not "transmuted" into the terms of the urban transportation bill, which calls for a six-month study of the "proper extent of local cost sharing," Riley told the subcommittee.

Saying that "the patient is sick" and "consultations merely delay his getting well," Riley asked why the bill does not provide for loans, as has been done for airline, railroad and maritime transportation. He urged amendments to provide:

- Guaranteed direct loans for equipment.
- Similar loans for "self-financing" facilities such as metered parking areas on the fringes of cities.
- Matching grants for land, terminals, and other capital improvements in the transit line.

The greatest need, Riley testified, is for demonstration of new ways to move passengers—by monorail, "carveyors," vehicles moving on air cushions, and connections between rapid transit and commuter rail lines.

Riley called for changes in the Administration bill to include all the "pertinent language" of an earlier bill by Sen. Harrison Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), which called for $325 million for planning, demonstration projects and loans. Even that, Riley said, was a "severe watering down" of last year's proposal by the American Municipal Association for a federal corporation to lend up to $1 billion for mass transportation facilities and equipment.

The witness cited as examples Toronto, which levies a tax every year to improve its subway system, and Mexico City, which he said is "boldly grasping" the problem of moving 4 million people by planning a monorail system.

He contrasted the $15 million provided by the transportation bill with $25 million spent by the Bureau of Roads for a six-mile stretch of test road under the Interstate Highway System. Federal money also is involved, he said, in paying for "plush vehicles" intended to move passengers from the waiting room at Dulles Intl. Airport near Washington, D. C., to commercial planes.

Labor Man Named to Samoan Wage Panel

AFL-CIO Special Rep. George J. Richardson has been appointed a labor member of Industry Committee No. 4 which under the Fair Labor Standards Act will recommend minimum hourly wages for industries in American Samoa.

Sponsored by Musicians:

Youngsters Attend Congress of Strings

East Lansing, Mich.—The Congress of Strings, unique free summer school sponsored by the Musicians and Michigan State University, has brought 94 talented young musicians here for eight weeks of close acquaintance with the greatest music of the ages.

Forty-five boys and 49 girls, winners of auditions conducted by AFM locals in 32 states, Puerto Rico and Canada, are here for the musical treat of their lives—daily instruction by noted professional musicians, rehearsal in small string ensembles, and weekly concerts.

High points of the summer session are two programs open to the public—the university's summer convocation, when Congress players are slated to play for the first time an original composition by Dr. Owen H. Reed of the music school faculty, and a performance of Verdi's Requiem, with Robert Shaw conducting.

All scholarship winners get free tuition, room, board and transportation. They study the music of the great composers, ancient and modern—Handel, Bach, Vivaldi, Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Bartok, Riegger, Hovhaness.

The Congress of Strings was originated three years ago as a public service project by the union in cooperation with leaders in the world of music and entertainment. The first free summer school was held at Greenleaf Lake, Okla., in 1959, and the second at San German, P. R., in 1960.

The program aims at developing talented young string instrumentalists and encouraging them to fill the gaps in the symphonic groups that have become a feature of community life in the U. S. and Canada.

Early each morning, 50 musicians aged 15 to 22 begin rehearsing in the big music room of Williams Hall on the campus here under the baton of Thor Johnson, conductor of the string congress and director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

Elsewhere in the hall, the other 44 students receive instructions for violin, viola, cello and bass viol from Rafael Druian, Cleveland Orchestra; Frank Houser, San Francisco Symphony; Mishel Piastro, Longines Symphonette; Warren Benfield, Chicago Symphony; Lorne Munroe, Philadelphia Orchestra; William Lincer, New York Philharmonic; Theodore Salzman, Pittsburgh Symphony; Louis Krasner, Syracuse University; and Hyman Goodman, Toronto Symphony concertmaster.

The sessions include a series of seminars, sectional rehearsals and weekly performances by string ensembles and full orchestras.

Congress supervising directors include AFM Sec. Stanley Ballard; Dr. Clare Taylor, dean of the university summer school; and Dr. Paul Oberg of the University of Minnesota, dean of the Congress.

The school was welcomed on its opening in a message of greeting from Dr. John A. Hannah, university president. It will continue until Aug. 12.

MUSIC IS THE BOND that unites these scholarship winners with veteran players such as William Lincer, seated center, at the Musicians' annual Congress of Strings on the campus of Michigan State University. Lincer is solo violist for the New York Philharmonic and an instructor at the union's summer school of music. AFM locals picked the 94 Congress scholarship winners in auditions held in 85 cities.

Louisville Teens Group Helping WAD Check

Louisville—Something new in COPE activity has appeared on the labor scene this summer—an energetic group of young volunteers known as the Teens For Labor Corps.

Thirty-three youngsters aged 13 and up, mostly the sons and daughters of union members, work one day a week in the offices of the Greater Louisville Central Labor Council in the Henry Clay Hotel here.

Their major job is to help the Women's Activities Div. of COPE —the Jefferson County Committee on Political Education— update and complete a central registration file of union members. Eventually corps members will be introduced to other trade union activities in the community, the sponsors hope.

The call for volunteers went out to affiliated unions late in May. At the first meeting of the proposed corps June 6, CLC Pres. Jerry Thompson announced that Council Sec.-Treas. Richard L. Miller, a teacher at Manly Junior High School, had agreed to work with the volunteers and the ladies of the WAD to get the new enterprise into operation. Mrs. Floyd Rector is WAD director.

As more volunteers appeared on work days and the group grew to its present size after summer vacations started, the corps elected officers and learned the routine of clerical duties with the enthusiasm of youth for a new experience, local AFL-CIO officials report.

With bus fare and lunch provided for every worker, the corps did its job efficiently and still had time for a daily social meeting and one all-day picnic trip.

The corps' schedule finds the teens "working like busy beavers" on jobs like these: checking voter registration, making duplicate cards, looking up precincts, wards and districts, coloring the precinct and ward map, using directories and lists, checking and rechecking.

As unions send in the names of their members, the Teens for Labor transfer the names to cards and then turn them over for a search of voter registration records.

Many of the group showed their interest in labor by attending a meeting of the central labor body. Delegates showed their interest, too, by giving the youngsters a warm welcome.

Directors of the corps, elected by the group meeting on each of four days, are Mary Ann Chuppe, Janet Reichel, Barbara O'Bryan, and A. E. Feldmanis.

Educator Named Aide to Goldberg

Daniel P. Moynihan, until recently head of the New York State Government Research Project at Syracuse University and an assistant professor of political science there, has been named a special assistant to Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg.

In 1954 Moynihan was public relations director for the Intl. Rescue Committee and a member of the Government & Civic Employes Organizing Committee of the former CIO. From 1955 through 1960 he held various positions in the New York State government. A Navy veteran, he has taught in several colleges and contributed to magazines of thought and opinion.

$200,000 in Welfare Benefits Paid Actors

Hollywood, Calif.—More than $200,000 in hospital, medical and life insurance benefits has been paid since Jan. 1, 1961, to approximately 500 actors and extra players under new contracts between the Screen Actors Guild and Screen Extras Guild and the motion picture and television producers.

NLRB Reorganization Plan Backed by Labor

The AFL-CIO, renewing its support for a Kennedy Administration plan to reorganize National Labor Relations Board procedures, has termed the proposal "a step in the right direction" in ending "unnecessary delays" in the processing of unfair labor practices.

Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris told the Senate Government Operations Committee that procedural delays "usually work against the union," because the labor law provides mandatory injunctions against unions but not against management in cases of unfair labor practice charges.

The AFL-CIO spokesman called this "discriminatory treatment" which is "highly unfair" to workers and their unions.

Harris cited statistics showing that in the first six months of 1951, the average time for processing an unfair labor practice case—from the filing of the charge to a decision by the board —was 399 days. By the last half of 1951, this had risen to 406 days, and by 1960 it had inched upward to 426 days.

The reorganization plan, under which the NLRB would delegate to trial examiners authority to make decision in most unfair labor practice cases, will become effective July 24 unless either the House or Senate votes against the proposal.

Under the plan, cases would be subject to review by the full labor board only on one or more of the following grounds:

- If a substantial question of "law or policy" is raised either by the absence of board precedent or departure from precedent.
- If the examiner's decision on a substantial factual issue is "clearly erroneous," prejudicing the rights of any party.
- If the conduct of the hearing has resulted in a prejudicial error.
- If there are "compelling reasons" for reconsideration of an important board policy.

The plan follows the pattern adopted earlier this year by the NLRB in delegating authority to regional directors in most representation proceedings.

The procedure, Harris said, would materially reduce the time required to handle such cases. He said that "no one can conceive of the amount of time now taken by the trial examiners . . . in discussing minute factual issues, and when the trial examiner finishes the board does it all over again." Often, he added, the courts then conduct the same time-consuming review of the case.

Byrd Routs Primary Foes In Virginia

The conservative Virginia Democratic organization dominated for a quarter of a century by Sen. Harry F. Byrd crushed the first major challenge in many years to its control by sweeping the party primary July 11.

A rebel slate running for nomination for governor, lieutenant governor and attorney general was beaten by the Byrd organization candidates by margins of approximately four to three. The vote was light—slightly less than a third of the state's registered voters who had paid their poll taxes and were eligible for ballots.

The anti-organization slate—headed by Lieut. Gov. A. E. Stephens running for governor—directly challenged the Byrd organization's record on "massive resistance" to school desegregation, which has resulted in the closing of public schools in one county, and its record of fiscal parsimony that has resulted in low levels of social services.

Stephens was beaten by 46,000 votes out of approximately 350,000 by former Atty. Gen. Albertis S. Harrison, the organization candidate for governor.

The AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education endorsed the Stephens - Boothe - Boyd ticket, welcoming the primary contest as giving Virginia a chance for "social and economic progress."

The returns showed that the Stephens slate failed to excite the voters in heavily populated areas considered increasingly liberal, while rural areas where the Byrd organization is strong turned out their normal pluralities.

Training Programs Urged:

Job Pickup Seen Sign of Recovery

By Robert B. Cooney

The June pickup in jobs, hours and earnings has moved the economy into a "stage of recovery" where training and retraining programs could effectively deal with recession-peak unemployment, a government manpower expert has declared.

Such training programs—the Kennedy Administration's proposed Manpower Development and Training Act—are now in the committee stage in both House and Senate. The AFL-CIO has strongly backed the legislation.

The stress on training developed as the Labor Dept. reported these gains for June: a boost of 600,000 in non-farm jobs to 53.3 million, double the usual rise for the month, a 24-minute hike in the factory workweek to 40.1 hours, and an all-time high of $94.24 in factory production worker weekly earnings.

"Unemployment, however, remained close to its recession peak," the Labor Dept. cautioned.

The jobless ranks swelled to 5.6 million from May's 4.8 million—and 800,000 jump—"largely" because of June jobseeking by teenagers, the report said.

This left the key seasonally-adjusted rate of unemployment at 6.8 percent in June, a recession-peak level almost unchanged for seven straight months.

Link Stressed

The link between retraining programs and economic growth was stressed by Dr. Seymour L. Wolfbein, director of the Labor Dept.'s new Office of Automation & Manpower. Wolfbein had just returned from Sweden, where he studied the Swedish approach.

In Sweden, Wolfbein told reporters, the jobless rate for May 1961—using U.S. concepts and techniques—was 1.2 percent.

"What really makes the difference," he emphasized, are the training and retraining programs.

He described as a "one-two punch" the Swedish approach of economic growth accompanied by training and retraining of workers.

"The stage of recovery we are in really sets the scene for training and retraining programs," Wolfbein declared.

The Labor Dept. job report pointed out that, in the past three months, about 900,000 workers have been added to non-farm payrolls above the normal seasonal increase. This represented a three-fourths recovery from the job loss suffered during the business downturn from mid-1960 to the spring of 1961, the report added.

Wolfbein pointed out that more than half the "deficit" in lost jobs is in the metalworking sector.

"We haven't come all the way back," he stressed.

"The biggest worry is what is going to happen to the long-term unemployed."

The long-term jobless—those out of work 15 weeks or longer—dropped from 1.9 million in May to 1.6 million in June. This was double the 816,000 total of June a year ago and it about equals the 1.6 million previous high for the month in the 1958 recession.

Serious Problem

Of the long-term jobless total, there were 928,000 jobless for 27 weeks or longer—"a serious problem," Wolfbein stressed.

The long-term unemployed are made up primarily of unskilled non-farm workers, Negroes, those 45 years of age and older and those whose last job was in the durable goods industries.

"About 260,000 have been unemployed for 52 weeks or longer," Wolfbein said, speaking of the worst-off group.

The June report showed job gains throughout the manufacturing sector. All told, factory employment rose by 240,000 between May and June—over twice the usual rise—to a total of 16 million. This still was 470,000 below June 1960. Most industries lagged behind their job totals of a year ago.

In steel, employment rose by 22,000 to a total of 1.1 million, still 85,000 below June 1960. In transportation equipment, jobs rose by 22,000 to 1.6 million, still 47,000 behind June 1960. Machinery went almost unchanged at 1.6 million, a total 79,000 below June 1960.

Construction employment showed a "pretty substantial" rise of 219,000 to a total of 3 million. This total was 46,000 higher than June 1960.

Pamphlet Available On Medical Plans

A new AFL-CIO pamphlet, "Medical Care Dollars for Better Health," explores the various types of health care programs negotiated by unions.

The pamphlet is based on an article in the AFL-CIO American Federationist by Lisbeth Bamberger, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security. The foreword is by Nelson H. Cruikshank, director of the department.

Copies of the pamphlet, Publication No. 118, at 10 cents each, may be ordered from the Pamphlet Div. of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 16th St., Washington 6, D. C. Bulk orders are $8 for 100 and $65 for 1,000.

Meany Greets NAACP, Pledges War on Bigotry

Organized labor's "continued support for the cause of genuine equality for every American" has been pledged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the 52nd convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

In a message to NAACP delegates assembled at the Sheraton Hotel, Philadelphia, Meany called 1961 "a heartening year thus far for all dedicated to the achievement of true equality of citizenship and opportunity for all Americans." He added:

"New assaults have been made upon the evils of segregation; a vastly strengthened mechanism has been set up to eliminate discrimination in federal employment and on government contracts.

"While the citadels of bigotry have not yet crumbled, they are besieged as never before."

Big Business Council Bolts Commerce Dept.

have the authority to name council members, instead of following the past practice of rubber-stamping choices submitted by business leaders.

• The BAC's membership list be overhauled to give better representation to small business. Hodges pointed out that the bulk of the committee's 65 active and 100 "graduate," or honorary, members came from big business.

Hodges also had been critical of the fact that many of the super-secret BAC meetings were actually business-pleasure affairs at vacation resorts such as Sea Island, Ga., and Hot Springs, Va. He had directed the council to end a practice of paying the resort expenses of government officials invited to address the meetings.

In announcing the secession, Blough said the group would function under the new name of the Business Council, and described it as an "independent organization of private individuals."

Field Broadened

Blough said the group would make available "such advisory services as may be requested" by any government agency, including the State, Defense and Treasury Departments, as well as Commerce.

The plan to shift the group to private status, in the wake of Hodges' insistance on bringing the advisory unit under closer government control, was disclosed to Pres. John F. Kennedy at a White House meeting of the business leaders. It was subsequently affirmed by the unanimous vote of 82 of its members at a private meeting in New York.

The council came into being in June 1933, in the early days of the New Deal, to serve as a semi-official link between the business community and then Commerce Sec. Daniel Roper.

Through the years the council's operations have been subjected to mounting criticism because both its sessions and its recommendations to the government were shrouded in secrecy.

The criticism came to a head in 1955 when a House committee headed by Rep. Emanuel Cellar (D-N. Y.) sought to conduct a public investigation of the BAC's activities. The probe was blocked by refusal of BAC officials to testify on the council's affairs and refusal of the Eisenhower Administration to open the BAC's records for public scrutiny.

Two Cancer Groups Agree To Merger

New York—Two national health organizations—the Eleanor Roosevelt Cancer Foundation and the American Cancer Society — have announced plans to merge Sept. 1 to insure a more intensified campaign against this major disease.

The agreement to affiliate the two groups was made, spokesmen said, in order to best serve the public interest "at a time when there is a deep concern over multiple health" organizations.

Organized labor, long a supporter of the ACS, played a key role in the establishment of the Eleanor Roosevelt foundation, named in honor of the former first lady.

Serving on the board of trustees of the Eleanor Roosevelt foundation are AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther, Joseph A. Beirne, David Dubinsky, David J. McDonald and Joseph D. Keenan. Serving on the Cancer Society's board of directors is Ossip J. Walinsky, president emeritus of the Leather Goods Workers.

The merger will combine the program of hospital and medical school construction grants launched by the Eleanor Roosevelt group with the ACS campaign of research and education.

Meany Radio Plea Urges Backing for Aid Bill

ment is "powerfully persuasive—especially at a time when millions of American workers are still unemployed."

"But the international situation is so critical and foreign economic aid is such a key factor for the ultimate victory of the free way of life against despotism," he continued, "that the trade union movement is compelled to reject appeals to narrow selfish interest.

"We put the preservation of world peace before a larger paycheck. We place the protection of human freedom and individual rights ahead of any other consideration . . . We are convinced, in the long run, labor is taking the only practical position consistent with enlightened self-interest for all Americans."

Meany took sharp issue with foreign aid critics who would deny help to the uncommitted nations of Asia and Africa which, while neither Soviet nor Red Chinese satellites, do not always "vote in the United Nations, for example, with the anti-Communist forces."

The argument that this should disqualify these countries from aid "is without merit," Meany declared, adding:

"There is nothing in the experience of these newly liberated people to make them lean toward any particular philosophy of government. What reason do they have up to now for automatically being on our side? It is our job to give them one.

Democratic Institutions

"A democratic society is not created by waving a wand. It must be based upon democratic institutions, slowly and painstakingly built—institutions such as public schools, hospitals, free trade unions, expanding industrial and agricultural production and, of course, government agencies responsive to the people's needs."

Unless these new nations in Africa and Asia, and the underdeveloped countries of Latin America, receive that kind of help from the U.S., Meany said, "they will inevitably drift into the Communist orbit."

"For communism thrives best in an atmosphere of poverty and despair," he added.

To let Asia, Africa and Latin America "fall under the sway of the Soviet Union and Red China," the AFL-CIO president declared, "would be to surrender the fight for human liberty we Americans have waged for nearly 200 years.

"And we would not merely surrender the freedom of others; eventually we would lose our own as well." he said.

Meany acknowledged, as some critics of mutual security legislation have charged, that there have been "examples of waste and bad judgement" in some of the foreign aid programs in the past. He said the Administration was prepared to "profit by experience," and had introduced "a strong, unified program; the strongest and most comprehensive ever proposed to Congress."

Long-Term Planning Backed

Following the pattern of past years, in which the AFL-CIO urged Congress to give the President authority to make long-term commitments, Meany gave labor's support to Kennedy's proposal to place aid on a five-year basis.

Such a move, he said, would assure "a fair opportunity" to develop plans tailored to each country's individual needs. He called long-term commitments "basic to a truly sound approach to the new challenges of our time."

Meany warned that the "creation and preservation of free governments, based upon democratic institutions and a healthy prosperous economy, is as essential to our own security as the maintenance of our military strength."

The U.S., he said, cannot abdicate its responsibility in the struggle for world peace.

"There has never been a more dangerous hour in our nation's history," Meany declared. "Passage of this measure at this time will do more to convince the Kremlin that we mean business more than anything else we can do."

More Involved Than Threats

But, the AFL-CIO president said, "much more is involved" than the mere Communist threats to liberty.

"Hundreds of millions of people in our world today are seeking a better way of life," he pointed out. "They have been oppressed for centuries by colonialism, exploitation, hunger, disease and ignorance. They look forward now to national sovereignty and to a more abundant life for themselves and their children—in freedom, if possible.

"Whatever else may divide the people of the undeveloped lands, they share a common yearning for objectives which can be summed up in one word—progress. We in the trade union movement can understand and sympathize with the aspirations. They are not confined to one country, one area or one race, but are universal among humanity.

"The next 10 years may well decide whether the newly developing nations can achieve real gains with our assistance in an atmosphere of freedom, or whether they will decide that only a totalitarian system like communism can produce the economic growth for which they hunger."

Kennedy Calls on Congress To Salvage School Aid Bill

Kennedy Loses in House:

Coalition Vote Kills Reform of NLRB

A major Administration reorganization plan, designed to speed up the processes of the National Labor Relations Board, has been killed by the House on a rollcall vote of 231 to 179.

A coalition of Republicans and southern conservative Democrats overrode the recommendations of the House Government Operations Committee, which on June 26 reported the reorganization plan after turning down by a straight party-line vote a motion to disapprove it.

The shift of southern Democrats to reflect Republican opposition to the plan, led by GOP Floor Leader Charles A. Halleck (R-Ind.), was in sharp contrast to the committee vote. Seven southern Democrats who are members of the Government Operations Committee did not register opposition in the vote held after committee hearings.

The reorganization plan, which was scheduled to go into effect July 24 unless vetoed by either house of Congress, would have allowed hearings on NLRB complaints of unfair labor practices to be delegated to a panel of board members, a single board member or a trial examiner, with the full board having discretion to grant review.

The AFL-CIO strongly backed the reorganization, pointing out that the long delays caused when the full board was compelled to grant extensive review of trial examiners' recommendations had the frequent effect of frustrating rather than merely postponing an equitable enforcement of the labor relations law.

AFL-CIO Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris emphasized before congressional committees that in 1960 the av-

UAW Plans Suits on Runaways

Detroit—The Auto Workers announced it has under study "a number of cases" of plant relocations, "with an eye toward the filing of legal actions to ensure workers' right to transfer."

The UAW action stems from a recent federal court ruling that union-won seniority rights become "vested" in the job and that a Detroit company moving to Tennessee must offer jobs at the new plant to its current workers.

The UAW said it is planning to file similar suits against three firms which are shutting down plants in this city's West Side and moving to southern locations. They are Lyon, Inc., Scott Valve Manufacturing Co. and Detroit Gasket and Manufacturing Co. UAW Local 174 represents employes of Lyon and Scott Valve; Local 608 represents Detroit Gasket employes.

Douglas Fraser, co-director of the UAW's West Side area, said he

Action Program Adopted:

Mississippi Labor Votes Political Levy

Jackson, Miss.—A special convention of the Mississippi State AFL-CIO has voted a per capita assessment of $1.50 a year to build labor's political and legislative strength in the state.

With 50,000 AFL-CIO members, labor's goal is to build a voting strength of between 70,000 and 90,000, including families of union members, by the time of the 1963 state elections.

In past elections, the State AFL-CIO declared, labor's turnout at the polls has been less than 12,000 votes.

Delegates overwhelmingly approved the earmarked assessment after hearing a blunt report from the state federation's executive board that anti-union big business groups have used their power to impose severe restrictions on unions and have kept the state's per capita earnings at the lowest level in the country.

The special funds will be used to finance a poll tax registration drive, political education programs, a get-out-the-vote drive, a statewide public relations campaign to back up the federation's legislative program and an expanded lobbying program during sessions of the legislature.

Fourteen district offices will be established as operation centers for the political action program.

A resolution adopted by the convention declared that Mississippi "is at the bottom of the ladder in practically every field of economic endeavor. . . . Labor's program of legislative action should be a program of progress for all Mississippians."

Asks House To Reverse Rules Bloc

Pres. Kennedy has personally urged the House to override the action of its Rules Committee and bring the federal aid-to-education measure to the House floor for a vote.

The school-aid bill, he told his press conference a day after the Rules Committee voted to table indefinitely a trio of bills on education, is "probably the most important piece of domestic legislation" at the moment.

Kennedy's call to use all possible procedures to bypass the Rules Committee and bring the measure to a floor vote climaxed weeks of intricate maneuvering in the House by school aid opponents after the Senate had passed, 49 to 34, a $2.5 billion aid bill following two weeks of intensive debate. The Senate turned back major threats to the measure in the form of racial, religious and procedural amendments.

A similar bill was reported favorably by the House Education Committee, along with a measure to extend the National Defense Education Act and broaden it to cover aid in specific areas to non-public schools. The House group also approved a bill for scholarships and loans for higher education.

Opponents of school aid and those who wanted federal funds used for parochial school aid insisted that the Rules Committee act on all three measures at the same time.

When the bills reached the committee all three were tabled by a vote of 8 to 7, with the seven-

Douglas Warns Reserve Board Interest Hike Can 'Choke' Recovery

The decision on whether the revival from the recession will be choked off or whether idle manpower and plant will be put to work rests with the Federal Reserve Board, Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) told the Senate.

In face of overriding evidence of "an extremely high volume of unemployment and a large proportion of idle capacity," Douglas said, the need is to lower long-term interest rates. The problem, he stressed, is not inflation but a failure to utilize existing resources.

Douglas gave the Senate a detailed breakdown of the extent of unemployment, demonstrating that joblessness "is even more serious than commonly believed" because government statistics understate the situation. In June 1960, he declared, the unemployment rate was actually 11.3 percent rather than the 7.5 percent figure commonly used.

On plant capacity, the Illinois Democrat cited figures to show that measuring by the most rigid standards "there is at least 10 to 14 percent of idle and unused" manufacturing capacity.

In face of these facts, Douglas said, "the choice is squarely up to the FRB. If, as output increases slightly the board again takes fright as it did in 1958-59, and again restricts the credit supply so as to raise interest rates, it will once more help to choke off a revival and keep unemployment unduly high."

"I believe the conscience of the country is aroused and cannot again permit the reserve board and the financial world to use an abnormally high ratio of unemployment and idle capital as a built-in stabilizer," he said.

He added that the business community has a direct stake in the situation, for even if it is "not greatly interested in relieving unemployment, then a hard-headed concern for their own self-interest should make them want to expand output."

In analyzing the extent of un-

Dominican Trade Union Training Set

A training program for young Dominican trade unionists in exile —designed to lay the base for a free labor movement in the Dominican Republic—has been announced by the AFL-CIO.

A group of eight Dominican workers, all young and all under exile during the last two years of the regime of the late Gen. Rafael Trujillo, has arrived in Puerto Rico to undergo training at the Labor Relations Institute of the University of Puerto Rico.

The curriculum at the institute, as announced by AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Serafino Romualdi, will include organizing and all other phases of modern trade union tech-hoped these companies would, in light of the court decision, recognize their employes' moral and legal right to their jobs.

"When a man has invested the productive years of his life in a company," Fraser added, "he deserves a better reward than being cast aside in the company's flight to a low-wage area."

U.S. District Judge Fred W. Kaess wrote in his decision on the Gemmer Manufacturing Co., a division of Ross Gear and Tool Co., that the company "has an obligation and duty to rehire on the basis of seniority those employes laid off in Detroit when that plant's operations are removed to Lebanon, Tenn."

The Lyon company, which makes stainless steel wheel covers and has been in Detroit since 1930, has begun moving presses and other machinery to a new plant in Grenada, Miss., the UAW said.

The union said Lyon notified its 400 seniority workers it "agreed to give first opportunity for jobs in the new plant to people of that community in exchange for certain tax considerations." This means, the UAW added, no local taxes for the first five years and low taxes thereafter.

The Lyon workers average 43 years of age. The union said some 150 of the 400 workers with 15 years or less in seniority, have been laid off.

The UAW has had contractual relations with Lyon since 1942. The present pact runs out Oct. 1, although the move southward reportedly may be completed by mid-August.

The UAW after announcing its plan of legal action against Lyon, accused company president George A. Lyon, Jr., of responding with a public relations statement "to gloss over the company's callous evasion of its responsibilities." Lyon had been quoted as saying "only a part" of the plant would move to Mississippi to make room for "even more jobs"—"as many as 1,000 in Detroit."

Fraser said there were only eight persons under the UAW contract working on the "part" of the plant to remain in Detroit.

The Scott Valve firm, which has had a contract with the UAW for 24 years, has nearly completed its move to Blythesville, Ark. The plant was built by the city and will be occupied by Scott Valve rent-free for 10 years, the union said. The UAW pact expired May 31, with the company refusing to negotiate thereafter, the union said.

The 140 seniority workers at Scott Valve average 50 years of age and 25 years or more in seniority.

The Detroit Gasket firm has been moving out over a two-year period to Newport, Tenn., the UAW said. The firm once employed 900 workers but only a few seniority workers, all with 35 years or more in service, remain. The UAW pact expires Oct. 31.

AFL-CIO Asks Passage:

'Truth-in-Lending' Urged As Protection for Consumer

By Gervase N. Love

It is high time that borrowers and buyers on time "be let in on the secret of how much any given credit commitment is going to cost," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared in endorsing the "truth-in-lending" bill sponsored by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) and 20 other senators.

"The great merit of this bill," he told a Senate Banking subcommittee, "is that it will eliminate the semantic confusion over costs in the consumer credit market.

"It will provide the individual with a clear understanding of what costs he is undertaking when he obtains credit and it will, through the uniform statement of charges in terms of annual rate, make it possible for him and stimulate him to distinguish between the various offers on the basis of their cost.

"This, in turn, should make the credit industry more competitive, bring down the cost of credit and release funds for the purchase of other goods and services of actual value to the individual," he said.

The bill would require sellers and lenders to spell out total finance charges and annual interest rates. It was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its meeting last winter.

'Badly Needed'

Biemiller recalled for the subcommittee the fact that union members "are among the most frequent users of installment credit," and noted that while the bill applies to all consumer credit, it is among installment buyers that it "is most badly needed."

Personal bankruptcies, he said, have risen nearly 300 percent in the last decade as the use of credit expanded, and "almost all were filed by wage-earners and resulted from "overcommitments on time-buying."

"The main reasons why consumers have so little comprehension of what their credit is costing them," Biemiller asserted, "have been well developed in previous testimony. In the first place, there is often no specific disclosure of the finance charge in the agreement the individual signs.

"Secondly, there is a wide variety of types of rate quotations for the consumer to deal with. The rate on his mortgage is stated in terms of true annual interest. The interest on his savings account is in true annual interest. But let him apply to an automobile dealer, the rate is so many dollars per $100 of the face amount of the loan. This is in no way comparable to the annual interest rate statements on the mortgage or the savings account, even though it sounds something the same. . . .

"You would be surprised at how few people understand the relation of a monthly rate to an annual rate. Some people think 3 percent a month is the same as 3 percent a year."

Biemiller maintained "there is simply no excuse for a buyer not to be told the cost of his purchase," including interest as so-called service charges for credit.

Has 'Right to Know'

"He has a right to know," the AFL-CIO spokesman said; "and he has a right to be told in terms he can understand and easily compare with the cost of credit from any other source. That's the heart of the matter, and that's the heart of this bill."

Biemiller testified soon after the President's Council of Economic Advisers strongly endorsed the bill and hailed it as a curb on excessive credit by making purchasers more aware of installment-buying costs.

James Tobin, a member of the council, told the subcommittee that the bill's chief contribution would be to make credit buying "more timely," and not to reduce it. Full disclosure of the costs, he said, would induce consumers to buy on time when interests costs are low, as during a recession, and to delay purchases when they are high, as during a boom.

Like Biemiller, he declared there is "widespread" lack of awareness of credit among consumers, and said it is important that buyers have a "yardstick" for the accurate and wise measurement of its costs.

Chairman William McChesney Martin, Jr., chairman of the Federal Reserve Board who in a previous appearance confessed he was baffled by the intricacies of consumer credit costs, declared that informing installment buyers of financing costs is "a commendable social and economic objective."

However, he protested the Douglas bill's provision for administration by the FRB. This is outside the board's operating area, which he said is to promote economic stability by influencing banking reserves.

Edward J. Frey, president of the Union Bank & Trust Co. of Grand Rapids, Mich., appearing on behalf of the Chamber of Commerce of the U.S., said that improved understanding of credit terms "is beneficial to both parties."

However, he maintained, "regulation of credit logically belongs with the states." Enactment of the Douglas bill, he declared, would be a step toward turning the FBI into a "national police force" because it would be involved in any wilful violation.

Trust-Busters Seek To Jail Price Fixers

Two congressional trust-busters—Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) and Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.) have introduced a series of bills imposing mandatory jail sentences for criminal price-fixing and sharply raising maximum fines for violations of anti-trust laws.

Kefauver is chairman of the Senate Anti-Trust subcommittee which recently probed the electrical equipment industry's price-fixing conspiracy. Celler is chairman of both the House Judiciary Committee and its Anti-Trust subcommittee.

The Kefauver-Celler bills would:

- Subject an officer or director of a company who "winks" at violations of the anti-trust law to the same penalty as if he personally had violated the law.
- Raise the penalty for price-fixing or illegal allocation of markets from the present $50,000 maximum to a fine of up to $500,000 for a corporation and a penalty of up to $100,000 fine for an individual, coupled with a mandatory jail sentence of up to one year.
- Increase the maximum fine for other anti-trust violations from $50,000 to $100,000. For a second violation within 10 years, the maximum penalty would be raised to $500,000 for a corporation and $100,000 plus a jail sentence for an individual.
- Require that companies which have quoted identical prices on bids to government agencies on purchases of $10,000 or more submit with each subsequent bid for a two-year period an affidavit certifying that the prices quoted were determined "without collusion, agreement or exchange of information" with other companies.
- Raise the penalty under the Clayton Act for corporate officers who authorize anti-trust violations from the present $5,000 maximum to a maximum of $100,000 for a first offense and $100,000 plus a jail sentence for a second offense within 10 years.

Kefauver and Celler said the bills are aimed at correcting a dual weakness of the anti-trust laws—penalties which are inadequate to deter companies from violating the law and the fact that corporate executives can, with impunity, "wink at criminal anti-trust violations going on right under their noses."

The proposed legislation, they said, "provides a long step towards preventing such calculated ignorance."

Haggerty Raps Powell Situs Picketing Stand

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. has protested a declaration by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell, Jr. (D-N. Y.), chairman of the House Labor Committee, that the situs picketing bill will not be reported "until the building trades unions start practicing common equality for black workers."

Powell also announced early hearings on a bill to prohibit the spending of federal funds for apprentice training programs in which discrimination is practiced.

Haggerty said Powell's proposed action on the situs picketing bill would "substitute autocracy for democracy" and block the legislative processes.

Denying any systematic discrimination in building trades unions, Haggerty said he had "personally contributed to the successful passage" of anti-bias legislation in all its forms, including the training of apprentices.

Not a single international BCTD union, either by constitutional provisions or national policy, refuses to admit qualified Negro members, Haggerty asserted. Local unions which exclude Negroes, he said, are doing so in violation of international union policy and integration has progressed "far more rapidly" in the trade union field than at the official level.

In a speech to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Powell said he intends to "do everything in my power" to prevent legislation favorable to building trades unions, such as the situs picketing bill, from coming out of committee "until these unions get in step with democracy." He named seven unions specifically.

Haggerty said Powell's statement was "not in accord with the facts." It was "exactly the opposite," he said, of two previous Powell statements to Haggerty and the BCTD in March and June of this year.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg said his department hereafter will require specific anti-discrimination agreements in apprenticeship programs of government contractors. It has long followed a policy, he said, of not registering programs with discriminatory provisions.

Flight Engineers Lose United Suit

The U.S. Court of Appeals has refused to upset a National Mediation Board election on United Air Lines in which the Air Line Pilots won bargaining rights for all flight deck personnel including present members of the Flight Engineers. A spokesman for the Flight Engineers said an appeal would be taken to the Supreme Court.

Establishment of a single bargaining unit had been challenged by the Flight Engineers and sparked walkouts by members of the union on seven other airlines.

Royal York Strikers Ask to Sue Big Hotel

Toronto, Ont.—Striking Royal York Hotel employes are asking permission to sue the hotel for unfair labor practices after management threatened to fire any striker not willing to return to work within a specified period.

The striking Hotel & Club Employes local has filed an application with the Ontario Labor Relations Board, citing the Labor Act which forbids management to penalize employes who go on strike.

The hotel ultimatum was contained in two registered letters sent to each of more than 900 strikers. It warned that they must reply they were ready to return to work or have no intention of going back to the hotel, which was struck Apr. 24. Those not prepared to return were told they would be fired.

The hotel claims 500 employes have signed forms saying they want to return to work. No date has been set for rehiring.

The ultimatum prompted the first negotiations since the strike began when the union asked the Ontario Labor Dept. to mediate. The union withheld its application for consent to prosecute until the negotiations collapsed.

A hotel offer, described by union leaders as "unconditional surrender" by the strikers if accepted, was unanimously rejected by a jeering meeting of 650 union members.

The hotel proposed that strikers return to work as jobs become available. Its proposal also scrapped seniority clauses, wanted 250 persons removed from the scope of the agreement and had the hotel collecting 10 cents per member if the checkoff of dues was to continue.

Although the hotel had issued its own press release detailing the proposal, it refused to continue talks with the union because reporters had been permitted to attend the meeting that rejected the offer.

The hotel, scene of the founding convention of the Canadian Labor Congress and the site for many international union conventions, has hired more than 900 strikebreakers to try to beat the walkout.

However, the Musicians have silenced the hotel bands by refusing to negotiate agreements until the strike ends. Bands are also forbidden to sign contracts to play for wedding receptions and other affairs.

Office Union Names Rights Committee

The executive board of the Office Workers has set up a Civil Rights Committee composed of Sec.-Treas. J. Howard Hicks and Vice Pres. Edward Springman and has charged it with implementing the civil rights statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting.

Laundry Union Drops Negotiations on Merger

The Laundry & Dry Cleaning Union announced it is working with AFL-CIO Director of Organization John W. Livingston to set up an organizing drive to bring into membership locals of the laundry union ousted by the AFL-CIO.

The organizing drive was mapped after AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the executive board to terminate all merger negotiations with leaders of the ousted union and to plan a campaign to bring in those locals of the expelled group interested in honest trade unionism.

Pres. Winfield S. Chasmar and Sec.-Treas. Sam H. Begler of the laundry union reported to Meany that the ousted union—expelled in 1957 because it was dominated by corrupt elements—had not met the merger requirements laid down by the AFL-CIO.

"I have never and do not now approve the readmission of the Laundry Workers to the AFL-CIO group so long as the expelled group remains under the domination of corrupt elements," Meany told the union's executive board.

"I do not believe that there has been any significant change in the picture, as far as that organization is concerned, since its explusion."

The AFL-CIO union was chartered by the federation after the 1957 expulsion.

Douglas Says Interest Hike Can Cut Jobs

employment, Douglas pointed out "two inadequacies" in the present method which tend to "understate the actual percentage of unemployment."

The first is that the Census Bureau's sample of 35,000 families includes many self-employed and unpaid workers in family enterprises who rarely can be listed as unemployed. Eliminating this group from the overall work force and adjusting the Census Bureau sample would have brought the percentage of unemployed—not corrected for seasonal factors—to 8.9 percent in June, instead of 7.5 percent.

The second factor is the understatement of part-time work or "involuntary unemployment." Correcting the statistics for this factor would add 2.4 percent more to the rate of unemployment for June, bringing the total to 11.3 percent.

Giving due weight to these two factors, Douglas said, it can be seen "that the total proportion of time lost during this last winter by those who sought wage and salaried labor was 11 percent or more and that in May it was approximately 10 percent and in June 11.3 percent."

Basic Contract Needs Given By Auto Workers

Detroit—Major auto manufacturers can help solve the human problems of their workers without raising prices and without contributing to inflation, the Auto Workers have told the auto makers.

At Ford and General Motors, the UAW has completed its presentation of contract proposals and the companies have begun their own presentations. At Chrysler and American Motors, the union is near completion of its proposals.

The UAW said it has presented each manufacturer with a set of alternative proposals on job security and wage structure and invited them to come forward with proposals of their own. Ford and General Motors charged the UAW's program was "inflationary."

Among the proposals offered GM was one which would set a new formula for wage rates. The union asked GM to transfer 17 cents an hour, currently received by members under a cost-of-living "escalator," to base wages. It also suggested a formula boosting the present annual improvement factor raise to approximately 9 cents an hour, or from the present 2.5 percent to 3.4 percent.

Wage rates in the auto industry have failed to keep pace with increases in worker productivity, the union maintained. Auto workers' wages are 81 cents an hour less than the rise in the productivity rate since 1940, it said.

New Social Security Amendments Raise Benefits, Ease Eligibility

Major changes have been made in the social security system through enactment by Congress of the Kennedy Administration bill lowering the retirement age for male workers, increasing benefits for widows and otherwise adding improvements and maintaining a sound financing system.

Here is an analysis of the more important changes as compiled by the Social Security Administration:

Retirement Age: Under the 1961 amendments, men may choose to retire at age 62 just as women have been able to do since 1956.

Earlier retirement than the normal age 65, however, means a reduction in benefits. The amount of reduction is five-ninths of 1 percent for each month a benefit will be paid before reaching 65. This works out so that a man who takes his benefits at 62 will get 80 percent of the monthly benefit he would have been paid had he waited until he reached 65.

For a worker whose average yearly earnings has been the top $4,800 since 1950 retirement at 62 will bring a monthly benefit of $101.60; at 63 will bring $110.10; at 64 $118.60 and at 65 the maximum of $127.

There is no reduction in the number of quarters of credit needed to make a worker eligible. Thus if a worker needed 13 quarters to retire at age 65 he will still need 13 quarters to retire at age 62.

Higher Benefits for Aged Widows: Most women receiving benefits as aged widows will receive an automatic increase in their benefits, beginning with early September.

Under the new law, an aged widow will receive a benefit equal to 87.5 percent of what her husband received or would have receieved had he lived.

Women 62 or over now receiving widow's benefits, and those who qualify in the future, will receive the increased benefit.

Higher Minimum Benefit: Most retired workers over 65 will receive a monthly benefit of at least $40 under the new law. Women workers who claimed benefits before 65, however, may not get the increase even though their benefit is under $40.

Where total monthly benefits payable to two or more survivors are less than $60, the total will be increased to $60.

Eligibility Reqirements Lowered: A worker must have worked a certain number of quarters to become eligible for benefits on reaching retirement age. Under the new law, these requirements have been lowered so that most people can now become eligible more quickly than in the past.

The older you are, the fewer number of quarters are required. Workers born in 1892 or earlier need only six quarters, or a year and a half, of work under social security to become eligible. The number of quarters goes up progressively so that those born in 1929 or later need 40 quarters or 10 years of credits. Credit requirements for women are generally somewhat less than those for men.

Survivors of workers who died after June 1954 and who were not eligible under the old law, may now be eligible under the 1961 changes.

Workers who were refused social security benefits in the past because they did not have enough credits should check again with the social security office in their area. They may now be eligible.

Permissible Outside Earnings Higher: Under the old law, retired workers who earned more than $1,200 a year were penalized. For each $2 earned between $1,200 and $1,500, $1 was withheld. For each $1 earned over $1,500, $1 in benefits was withheld.

Under the new law the $1,500 level has been raised to $1,700, resulting in an increase up to $200 in the benefits of those with outside earnings between $1,200 and $1,700.

Beneficiaries aged 72 or over continue to receive benefits regardless of their earnings.

Social Security Taxes Increased: To pay for benefit improvements, social security taxes both for employers and workers will go up. They will be 3.125 percent on the first $4,800 earned in 1962; 3.625 percent during 1963-65; 4.125 percent during 1966-67 and 4.625 percent in 1968 and after.

Extension of Deadline for Disabled: Workers with long-standing disabilities now have until June 30, 1962, to apply for early retirement.

10 Cents a Week Buys New Benefits

A worker earning $80 a week will pay 10 cents more a week to cover the cost of expanded social security benefits recently enacted. No worker will pay more than $6 a year for the added benefits.

This small amount, matched by the employer, Nelson H. Cruikshank, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security explained, points up the advantage of the social security system. The 10 or 11 cents a week will pay for benefits amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, said Cruikshank, and keep the trust in balance to meet all demands made upon it.

The AFL-CIO, he stressed on the federation's radio program "As We See It," has always supported the position that the social security system must be kept on a sound financial basis and that workers are willing to pay their share of the cost of expanded benefits.

To Fix Responsibility

THE "CALCULATED IGNORANCE" of corporate executives on criminal anti-trust law violations by their companies has been one of the more remarkable facets of the conspiracy to fix prices in the electrical equipment industry.

Disclaimers of knowledge of activities of lower echelon executives and righteous pointing to company policy directives have been the major defense of top officials.

Good business and administrative practice would indicate that company executives at all levels know what's going on in important areas such as pricing. To make certain that this does in fact happen, a series of bills has been introduced in the House and Senate to amend the anti-trust laws so that top officials would no longer be able to "wink" at price-fixing and other violations without fear of personal prosecution.

The amendments to the anti-trust laws are badly needed if for no other reason than to help keep corporate executives on top of their companies' activities and policies.

Note to the Fed

THE PROBLEM the nation faces in the next few months is putting idle men and idle capacity back to work so that the restricted output of the 1960-61 recession can be put behind us and a new period of growth and expansion launched.

One of the key factors in touching off a new period of growth is the role of the Federal Reserve Board in handling credit policies. If the supply of credit is restricted and interest rates allowed to rise, the current indications of recovery may be choked off and the chronically high unemployment of the past year will continue unabated.

The issue of the nation's economic future, therefore, is in large part in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board. In the recovery period after the last recession the board clamped down on credit, caused interest rates to rise and prevented a complete recovery.

Fortunately, the board has another opportunity now. If it acts wisely and effectively it can promote stable economic growth that will put idle men and plants back to work.

Record of the States

THE RECORD of the 1961 state legislative sessions to date—with 36 legislatures adjourned and 11 still in session—is generally unimpressive. There have been a few scattered gains, but overall the efforts of the state groups have resulted in ineffectual stabs at solutions to complex problems or doing nothing at all.

Given the complexion of most state legislatures—dominated by rural groups which have no real interest in or even understanding of the problems of urban growth pressing the limited facilities of state governments—and the dominance in many legislatures of the conservative coalition that has been a major factor in Congress for the past two decades, the general stand-off in the 1961 sessions is more easily understood.

Progress at the state level and development of new ideas and solutions that could ultimately provide the basis for federal legislation can be achieved only if the rotten-borough system of representation in the legislatures is abolished and the urban areas given an adequate voice in shaping state policies.

Under the present rural, conservative coalition domination of most of the legislatures, there can only be a sort of continuing stalemate.

Welfare War in Newburgh, N.Y., Is Actually a Problem of Jobs

SOME OF THE IMPLICATIONS of long-term unemployment and the denial of basic legislative protections to large segments of our population are being dramatized in Newburgh, N. Y., a small town on the Hudson River north of New York City.

Taking place in Newburgh is what has been called a "welfare war." On the surface it is being described as a moral problem, but the deeper one looks below the surface the clearer it becomes that it is a job problem.

The city manager of Newburgh, with the backing of the Republican City Council, is putting into effect a 13-point program which it says will take care of "welfare cheats" and others who are trying to get something for nothing.

The program would limit relief to any one family to three months in one year; deny public charity to mothers of illegitimate children who have additional offspring born out of wedlock; deny relief to anyone who leaves his job voluntarily; require all able-bodied reliefers to work 40 hours a week for the city; convert all relief payments to vouchers for food, rent and clothing, etc.

The program has provoked quite a hassle. The welfare commissioner of the city has resigned, saying he could not "in good conscience" administer it. The mayor has denounced it as "immoral, illegal and unfair." The NAACP has castigated it as directed against the Negro. On the other hand, the Wall Street Journal and the Associated Press say that the majority of the 31,000 people in the city favor it.

The welfare issue had its beginnings when growers in the area invited migrant workers to come in and work for miserably depressed wages. Migrant workers, as is generally known, are denied any of the protections of federal and state laws. They have no minimum wage, no standards for housing, no unemployment compensation, no child labor laws.

But the growers use them as long as they need them and when winter comes, they toss them on the city of Newburgh.

The city manager says of the migrant workers: "These people are uneducated and unskilled and the Newburgh economy cannot absorb them. There just isn't a need for much unskilled labor in local industry (chiefly needle trades, women's clothes and pocketbooks), so they apply for relief, loaf around town and get into trouble."

HE HAS PROBABLY offered the best case yet for fundamental legislative protections of migrant workers, the same protections enjoyed by so many other Americans. The city of Newburgh, just as many other cities in the country, is paying a heavy price for denying these protections.

What the city manager is doing, in the opinion of the New York Times, is punishing the people for the failure of society itself.

"Newburgh is flagrantly, willfully in the wrong on two counts," says the Times. "It is pursuing an inhumane policy and it is following an outlaw course. It is punishing innocent children in the name of 'morality' and driving or keeping the unfortunate off the relief rolls because the taxpayers are weary of their burden.

"There is ample provision in existing law to deal with the undeserving chiseler or cheater. Newburgh did not have to invent new regulations to cope with the dishonest or the malingerer. It decided to be a law unto itself, a city where mercy took a beating."

Actually, state and federal grants now provide more than 55 percent of the city's welfare bill of about $1 million a year. A five-member special committee of New York's Board of Social Welfare held a public hearing in Albany and decided that Newburgh's 13 points would be violating both federal and state law. The city, then, would lose those grants.

As far as the city manager and the Republican City Council are concerned, however, it is a matter of principle: the taxpayers' money, they say, is being squandered.

On the other side of the coin, what is being squandered are so many potentially useful Americans who are being denied opportunities to rise to a decent standard of living, or receive any of the general welfare protections that so many in the labor movement and outside it consider the basic rights of citizens. (PAI)

Morgan Says:

Kennedy Has His Troubles On Anniversary of Nomination

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

JOHN F. KENNEDY, who was nominated as the Democratic candidate for President a year ago, may be finding that his troubles in the job are just beginning. At least they never seem to end.

He and his wife invited some folks down to Mount Vernon for a social evening. George Washington himself could not have staged a more glittering, sumptuous affair and from all the accounts on the society pages—once the lady reporters could catch their breaths—it was a dazzling success and the guest of honor, Pres. Ayub of Pakistan, had a fine time.

Morgan

But now some people want to know how much the outing cost, the implication being that it cost too much. The White House concedes it cost more than its regular parties but "not significantly more," because a lot of patriotic people pitched in and donated things, like music and chairs, tablecloths, flowers and other decorations. Still, the pomp and opulent circumstances burst on the scene just at a time when the President was grappling behind the scenes with the problem of how to convince the country that it needed an expensive civil defense program.

And although Field Marshal Ayub, possibly with the exuberance generated the night before, became one of the most effective salesmen for the President's foreign aid program he may have bruised our relations with the neutrals by stressing—in effect—the kind of aid that Sen. Goldwater has been stressing—help to our committed friends only.

As if these difficulties for the Administration were not enough, a federal judge threw another case against Jimmy Hoffa out of court and the Republicans served notice on Mr. Kennedy by implication that no matter what happens to the national civil defense program, he better dig a political bomb shelter in the White House lawn. This last development merits a closer look.

What happened was the emergence of what the new national chairman of the GOP, New York's Rep. William Miller, has referred to obliquely as a summer replacement for the Ev and Charlie show. This, of course, has been the weekly TV report starring the two minority leaders, Sen. Everett Dirksen and Rep. Charles Halleck. They expressed their inner thoughts about Outer Mongolia, which added up to non-recognition, regardless of what possible advantage there might be to an outpost in a buffer state between Soviet Russia and Communist China.

THERE IS NOT the slightest reason to believe that their possible replacements disagree with the minority leaders but they will add new faces—that of Chairman Miller himself, Rep. Bob Wilson of California who succeeds Miller as head of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee, and Goldwater, who is not exactly a new face but who is getting new exposure at every turn, this time as chairman of the GOP Senate Campaign Committee.

At a news conference these three turned the heat on the Administration. Miller accused the President of failing to provide leadership in a time of peril. Goldwater said he was wandering aimlessly in foreign affairs and engendering a "hate business" attitude on the domestic scene. Wilson reported a "great popular dissatisfaction with Kennedy," flatly predicted the Republicans would pick up the 44 seats they need to win control of the House in 1962.

This cranking up of the strictly political cylinders of the two-party system is a fitting observance of the first anniversary of the President's nomination. And although Wilson didn't quote his sources, some opposition is becoming more apparent. The interesting and—to some—the disturbing thing about it is, however, that it is evident mostly on the far right, in those old and familiar GOP pastures where opposition for opposition's sake is an inspiration and where counter-proposals and programs are always clear and simple, even over-simplified.

The Administration is going to have more and more trouble from this quarter. Whether the right-wing Republican fascination with the past will operate as a kind of death wish for it again remains to be seen. An Oklahoma Republican named Henry D. Irwin told a congressional committee that as a presidential elector last fall he cast his electoral college vote not for Richard Nixon but for a right-wing Democrat, Virginia's Sen. Byrd, and for Goldwater as vice president. He said he urged other GOP electors to do the same, got an interested response, with the tacit support of the Republican National Committee.

Miller called this account "ridiculous." But as a reflection of the thinking of the radical right it is not so ridiculous.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE KEFAUVER SENATE subcommittee has heard fascinating testimony from an Oklahoma Republican, Henry D. Irwin, that a scheme was on foot last fall to use the Electoral College to elect Virginia's Sen. Harry F. Byrd as President and Arizona's Sen. Barry Goldwater as Vice President, ignoring the simple fact that neither of these gentlemen had been nominated for anything by the Republican and Democratic national conventions.

The bizarre scheme failed although Irwin, chosen as a Republican elector presenting himself as committed to Vice Pres. Nixon and Ambassador Lodge, actually voted for Byrd and Goldwater. This was his legal right. The constitution imposes no restrictions on electors; it is developing practice that has led to the orderly system by which the vast majority of electors consider themselves bound in honor to vote for the presidential candidate they have publicly pledged themselves to support.

In 1948 a Tennessee elector chosen on the Truman Democratic ticket broke away and cast his vote for then Gov. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina. In 1960 a group of Mississippi and Alabama electors offered themselves to the public as uncommitted to anyone and voted for Byrd.

Some reforms are needed and a constitutional amendment is required to get them.

TO ENTER THIS AREA involves dangers of itself. The "reform" recommended by Rep. William E. Miller (N.Y.), chairman of the Republican National Committee, would bind the electors legally to vote for the candidate they publicly espouse but also divide the electoral vote of each state according to congressional districts.

That is, two electors from each state would be chosen at large, reflecting the state's strength in the Senate. Each congressional district would choose one elector, and the vote of each district would be cast according to which candidate got a majority in that area.

This is the Lodge-Gossett amendment of years back, which actually passed the Senate at one time, and it is a proposal that would extend the present dominance of gerrymandered rural congressional districts in our political affairs. It should be unacceptable to the urban citizens who now make up a substantial majority of our population.

The Miller thesis on the electoral college is that large and populous states have an advantage over smaller states under the winner-take-all system giving the total vote of each state to the presidential candidate who gets a state-wide majority, however narrow.

In fact, however, the small states have a built-in premium in electoral college representation because each is entitled to one elector for each senator. New York and California, with huge populations, get two electors for their senators; so do Nevada and Alaska, with very small populations.

THE CONGRESSIONAL districts in almost every state are notoriously rigged by legislatures to give less-than-equal representation to urban areas, more-than-equal representation to small towns and rural sections.

Our system of checks and balances was deliberately devised by the writers of the constitution to protect minority interests against mere numerical majorities. The system has worked well, by and large. We have maintained a stable government, in which power is transferred peacefully from administration to administration, and no one thinks of challenging the results.

There is a limit beyond which the protection of minority rights should not be carried. The majority, too, has interests that deserve respect.

The clean-cut basic reform needed would be met by adoption of a constitutional amendment providing for the election of the President by direct popular vote. A less sweeping change, but one that is desirable, would be an amendment binding the electors to vote for the candidate they have publicly proclaimed they supported, and providing uniform laws on eligibility of voters to assure that every citizen has a recognized and conceded right to vote.

Washington Reports:

Health Care for Aged Bill Seen Up for Action at this Session

HEALTH CARE for the aged legislation may come before the current session of Congress, despite reports that action may not be taken until next year.

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.), in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 450 radio stations, said that his own version of a health care bill "will be presented and the Senate will be asked to vote on it if, within a few weeks, we do not get Administration action."

Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.), co-author of the Administration-backed Anderson-King bill, said on the same program:

"I say the outlook for action is very good this year, but I cannot guarantee it. I simply say I know it is the desire of the President to have action. It is the desire of the leadership of the Senate. I hope it is also the desire of the membership of the House."

Javits said there are 11 million persons over 65 "who need some help to get medical care" and who are not aided under present legislation.

"The facts are that we have about 60 percent of our people over 65 who just don't have incomes to pay anything beyond the barest necessities," he asserted.

His bill differs principally from the Anderson-King measure in that it would be financed out of general revenues, while the latter would be a part of the social security program.

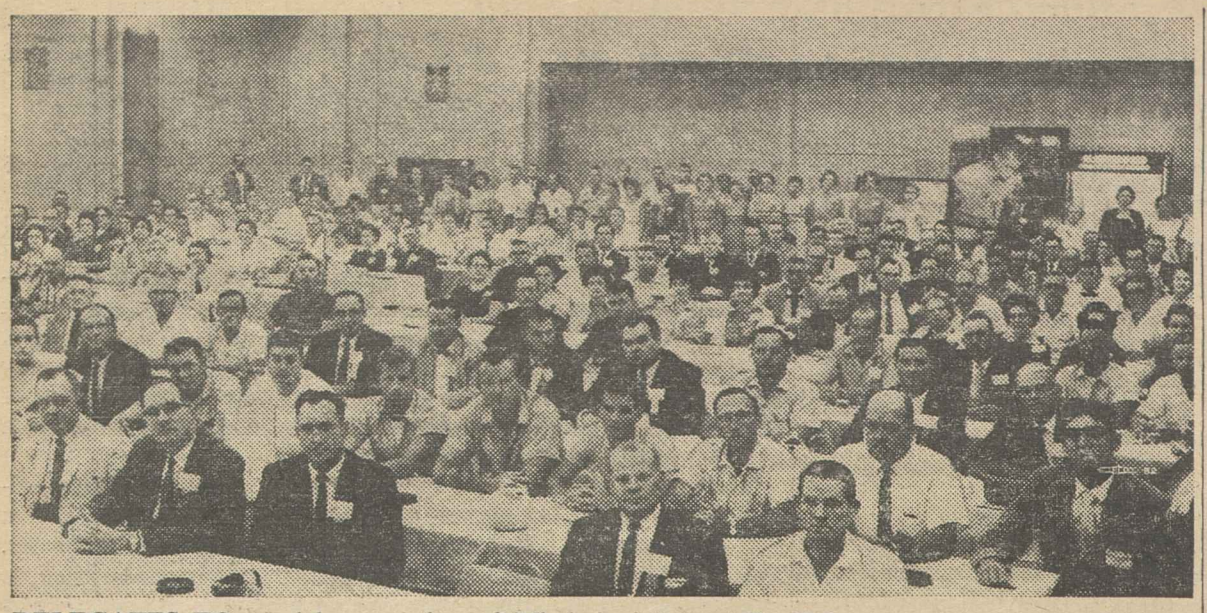
ANDERSON explained that the Anderson-King bill differs from those introduced in previous sessions by former Rep. Aime Forand (D-R. I.) in that the 1961 measure does not provide payments for doctor bills.

"We try to make this distinction plain because the American Medical Association keeps calling this socialized medicine," he declared. "I think the whole argument about personal choice of the physician falls when you realize we aren't trying to pay the physician.

"The patient has the right to choose his own doctor and make his own payment to the doctor. What we say is that if a man is ill and knows that there is a hospital to which he may go and his bills there may be paid, and if, on coming out of a hospital, he may get skilled nursing service or special home care, home diagnostic service, he will have some money left to pay the doctor."

Anderson said that Javits had every right to bring up his own bill, but he hopes that "Sen. Javits, who is a fine, liberal senator, will be working with us when the time comes to make sure that passage results in the Senate."

HEALTH CARE FOR AGED legislation may be passed at least in the Senate this year, Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) and Sen. Clinton Anderson (D-N.M.) said in interviews on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational radio program.



DELEGATES TO special convention of Mississippi State AFL-CIO, shown in session at Jackson, adopted a long-range political action program and levied a $1.50 a year assessment to pay for it.

Mississippi AFL-CIO Votes Levy To Build Labor's Ballot Strength

Ramsay described the program adopted by the convention as "long overdue" and said that had it been in operation 10 years ago "we would not have the fraudulent 'right-to-work' provision in the state constitution . . . nor would the workers of Mississippi have the lowest per capita income in the nation."

Mississippi became the third state federation in the South to levy a special assessment to finance expanded legislative and political activities. The Louisiana and Alabama state federations earlier voted assessments for this purpose and a similar program will be presented to the Tennessee State AFL-CIO at its convention in October. Louisiana's program was credited with a large role in repeal of the state's so-called "right-to-work" law—the only state in the South where this has been accomplished.

A motion to reduce the assessment to $1 a year was decisively defeated at the Mississippi convention and the delegates then adopted the $1.50 levy by a roll call vote of 12,557 to 5,127.

The convention unanimously approved the "program for progress" which called for legislation to:

- Establish a State Dept. of Labor.
- Reapportion the state legislature.
- Raise workmen's compensation.
- Provide state loans to enable qualified high school graduates to continue their education.
- Increase unemployment insurance.
- Revise state tax laws.
- Enact a state prevailing wage law.
- Change primary elections from Tuesdays to Saturdays.
- Establish temporary disability insurance.
- Raise salaries of teachers.
- Enact comprehensive child labor laws.
- Establish a statewide civil service merit system.
- Qualify women as jurors on an equal basis with men.
- Raise assistance to aged and disabled.
- Provide initiative referendum procedures under the state constitution.
- Enact a state wage-hour law.
- Eliminate the poll tax.
- Require equal pay for women.

Strong support for the political action program was voiced by speakers who addressed the convention, including Daniel A. Powell, COPE area director; Mrs. Esther Murray, eastern director of COPE's Women's Activities Div.; AFL-CIO Regional Dir. E. H. Williams and Assistant Dir. Robert Starnes.

Labor Parley Wins Lifting Of Race Bars

Norfolk, Va.—The segregation barrier has been broken at one of Virginia's largest hotels in connection with the State AFL-CIO convention to be held here Aug. 28-30.

The state federation announced that the management of the Triangle Hotel, where the convention will be held, has agreed to provide completely unsegregated housing and other hotel facilities for Negro delegates. The $7 million hotel is the city's newest and most modern.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its recent meeting at Unity House, Pa., had instructed the AFL-CIO's officers to assist the Virginia federation in its efforts to overcome the long-standing segregation obstacle in hotel accommodations. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph had called for suspension of the Virginia affiliate for proceeding with plans for separate living accommodations for Negro delegates.

Boris Shishkin, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, reported to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany that Virginia State AFL-CIO Pres. Harold B. Boyd and David D. Alston, chairman of the convention's housing committee, had succeeded in bringing about a change in the hotel's policy.

Grand Jury Flaw Voids Hoffa Fraud Indictment

Orlando, Fla.—A U.S. district court has dismissed mail fraud charges against James R. Hoffa, president of the unaffiliated Teamsters, on the ground that the federal grand jury that indicted him was improperly impaneled, but the Dept. of Justice is considered likely to seek a new indictment.

U.S. District Judge Joseph P. Lieb threw out the charges against Hoffa and two co-defendants on the ground that the lists from which the grand jury was selected excluded citizens who were not registered voters and all women except those who had signified an affirmative willingness to serve. The court held that such lists did not represent a fair cross-section of the community.

Hoffa's court victory followed a Teamsters' convention in Miami Beach in which the union president was re-elected for a five-year term against token opposition.

The convention raised Hoffa's salary from $50,000 to $75,000 a year and approved numerous constitutional changes. It voted to broaden the Teamsters' jurisdiction to include any type of occupation and craft and adopted a constitutional amendment making officers of subordinate units delegates to subsequent conventions.

A delegate from the floor answered charges that changes were being "railroaded" with the statement that he had never witnessed a chairman "that has allowed more democracy to creep in."

Dues for members and per capita to the international union were increased, the latter to raise revenue from about $8 million a year to $20 million. The Teamsters' previous per capita was 40 cents a month; the new per capita is $1.

The events on which the Justice Dept. may seek a new indictment of Hoffa involve the onetime $500,000 Sun Valley, Fla., real estate project, in which the union president and two others were accused of mail fraud in selling retirement lots to union members under false pretenses.

Testimony before the McClellan special Senate committee disclosed that $500,000 in funds from Hoffa's Local 299 were deposited interest-free in a Florida bank when the bank advanced money to Sun Valley and that Hoffa was an undisclosed prospective beneficiary of any profits the speculative venture might gain.

Collective Bargaining Report:

Insurance Covered By Most Contracts

Virtually every major collective bargaining agreement now provides life insurance protection for workers, and in most cases the employer pays the entire cost of the program.

The Collective Bargaining Report of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, appearing as a feature in the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine, reports on a Labor Dept. survey of life insurance provisions in 300 major union contracts. The survey found that:

- 296 of the 300 agreements, each covering more than 1,000 workers, provided life insurance under the union contract.
- The employer paid all costs in 57 percent of the agreements. Under 10 percent of the contracts, the employer paid a basic amount and individual employes had the option to take out higher amounts either at their own expense or jointly financed. The remaining one-third of the programs were jointly financed by workers and employers.
- Nearly two-thirds of the programs maintained insurance coverage for retired workers. A similar survey in 1955 found that only 51 percent of the plans then covered retired employes.

Emphasizing the trend to "employer-pays-all" insurance plans, the article points out that such programs result in significant tax savings.

Each dollar a company pays for a life insurance program for its employes represents an actual cost of only 48 cents, since the money would otherwise have been taxed at the corporate income tax rate of 52 percent.

On the other hand, the dollar paid by the employe from his wages costs him at least $1.20, since he pays at least 20 cents in taxes on each dollar of wages.

In addition, if the company pays the full cost, the expense of record-keeping, handling worker contributions and crediting insurance dividends is greatly reduced.

A growing number of plans now gear insurance coverage to earnings. In such programs, the average amount of coverage is equal to almost 1.5 years' wages, while the average for uniform, flat amount plans is less than a year's earnings.

Layoff Protection

One area of improvement in recent years has been in continued coverage of employes during layoffs. Nearly all plans continue protection for at least 30 days after layoff and 60 percent of the plans provide for continuation for longer periods. Twenty percent of plans provide continued coverage for longer than six months.

About a fourth of the plans provide payment for permanent disability as well as for death and most provide for additional payments for accidental death or dismemberment. Many programs which do not provide life insurance payments for permanent disability have other benefits such as disability retirement, which cover this area.

Most plans still reduce benefits after retirement—some immediately and others through periodic steps as the age of the retired worker increases until a minimum level is reached. Only 8 percent of the programs maintain full coverage throughout the retirement period.

Stoppages at Missile Sites Drop Sharply

Work stoppages from labor disputes at missile sites showed a sharp drop in June from the same month last year, Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg has reported to Pres. Kennedy.

Man-days lost during the month were only a little more than 1 percent of those lost in June 1960, said Goldberg, who is chairman of the Missile Sites Labor Commission the President set up on May 26.

Cooperation Praised

"I think this record is concrete testimony of the desire of labor and management to cooperate in making sure that work on our missile and space program goes forward uninterruptedly," said Goldberg.

The labor commission has obtained no-strike and no-lockout pledges and has set up labor relations committees at 21 sites.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. laid the improvement to a combination of several factors starting with the policy statement outlawing stoppages adopted by the department executive council last February.

Kennedy's statement impressing the country with the urgency of uninterrupted work at the sites and the follow-up executive order setting up the commission also were involved, he said, as well as the work of the labor commission.

Child Labor Laws Upheld:

AFL-CIO Supports Delinquency Bill

The AFL-CIO "welcomes" an Administration bill to combat juvenile delinquency and rejects the "misconception" that there would be less delinquency if Congress relaxed child labor laws, a federation spokesman has told Congress.

Saying that he was appearing to "restate and re-emphasize" the AFL-CIO's "long-standing support for a comprehensive program" to attack delinquency, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged a House education subcommittee to act favorably on the Juvenile Delinquency bill introduced by Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.).

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg also testified in support of the bill. He said delinquency in slum areas is "potentially the most dangerous condition" in America today and that by 1965 the nation will have a sharply increased number of persons under 20 in the labor force—40 percent more than today.

Goldberg is a member of the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Crime. Two other committee members also testified in favor of the bill—Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy and Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham Ribicoff.

Biemiller took sharp issue with a reported statement by Ribicoff that "we would have less juvenile delinquency if we relaxed our laws against child labor and put more children to work."

View Challenged

The AFL-CIO spokesman said child labor laws permit boys and girls to work after school and during vacations, and to quit school for work at 16. He challenged the view that substituting work for school is a remedy for delinquency, and cited previous AFL-CIO testimony that unemployment is "vastly higher" among dropouts than other groups.

Youngsters with inadequate schooling generally drift into the most unrewarding and frustrating jobs—jobs more likely to stimulate than to correct delinquency, he stated.

Biemiller testified that the Green bill, authorizing grants up to $10 million a year for five years, would attack juvenile problems in three important areas:

- By helping to develop "demonstration and evaluation" projects, it would help public and private youth agencies to learn more about the nature of delinquency as well as methods for its prevention and cure.
- By assisting in the training of personnel, it would meet a pressing agency need.
- By offering technical assistance and serving as an information exchange center, the program set up under the bill would enable each agency to benefit from the experience of others.

As early as 1949, Biemiller said, both the then separate AFL and the CIO were urging greater attention to delinquency prevention and the rehabilitation of delinquents.

"We recognize that juvenile delinquency cannot be isolated from the problems of our society as a whole," he said. "Poverty, slums, crowded schools, inadequate job opportunities—all these and many more make their contribution to the creation of young lawbreakers."

Biemiller pointed out that Congress has made an "impressive start" in the right direction in wage-hour improvements, a "truly comprehensive" housing bill, aid to depressed areas, and assistance to the dependent children of unemployed parents. Other progressive proposals are "on the horizon, or even closer," he said.

There nevertheless will be a need, he asserted, for special attention to young people who, in good times or bad, find themselves in conflict with society, and the Green bill will help provide that attention.

Would Authorize Grants

The bill asserts that juvenile delinquency and youth offenses are increasing in both urban and rural communities. It authorizes the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare to make grants to any state, local, or other public or non-profit agency for projects, staff training programs, and an increase in cooperation among youth organizations.

Biemiller reported that fewer than half the nation's counties have juvenile probation officers and that the qualifications of some such workers may be "less than desirable." Fewer than half of U.S. communities have a police officer especially assigned to juveniles, and some school districts with openings for specially trained school staff persons cannot find qualified personnel, he said.

The AFL-CIO also endorsed the Green bill's provision for participation by private voluntary agencies. AFL-CIO community services committees want to take part, he said.

Labor Aides Act for U.S. at Textile Parley

Geneva—Representatives of the major textile-producing nations are meeting here at an international conference sponsored by the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade (GATT) in an effort to seek orderly development of the industry.

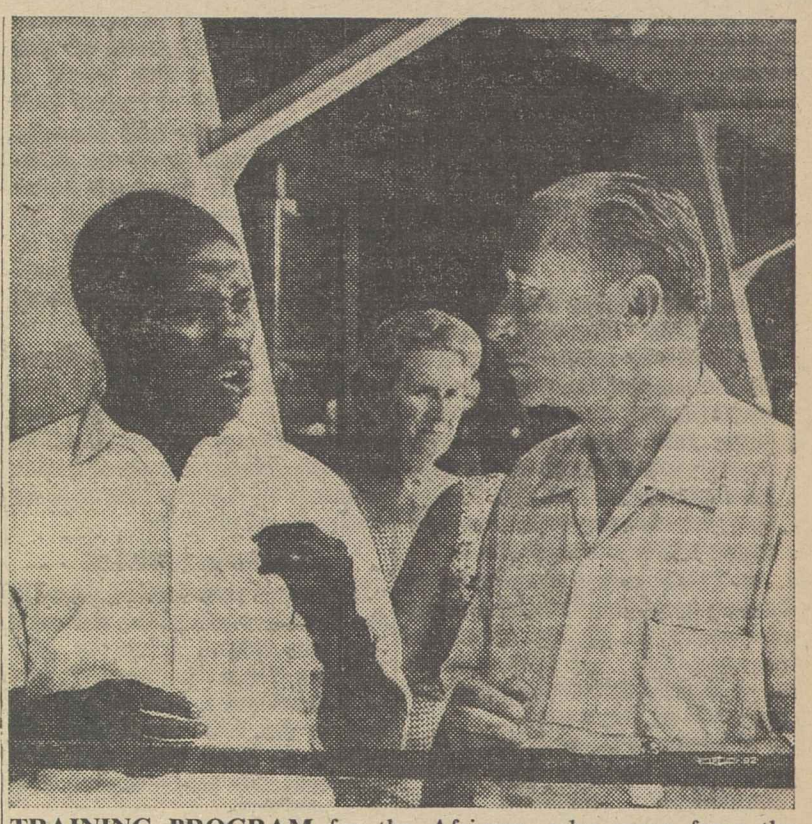
Each national delegation is composed of government, labor and management representatives and is centering greatest attention on the cotton textile industry. U.S. representatives include three research directors from labor—Stanley H. Ruttenberg of the AFL-CIO, Milton Fried of the Clothing Workers and Lazare Teper of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Eric Windham White, executive secretary of GATT, was elected chairman at the opening meeting upon nomination by the U.S.

Agreement Sought

The U.S. is seeking an agreement under which exporters in low-cost producing countries will exercise restraint in their shipments to the U.S. and to other countries where workers have relatively high standards of living and production costs are higher.

It also wants to assure the low-cost producers of access to expanding markets without disruptive results that could adversely affect other producers and lead to retaliatory restrictions on trade.



TRAINING PROGRAM for the Africans, who come from the needle trades, was arranged in cooperation with Ladies' Garment Workers. Above, during a weekend at Unity House, the union's resort in Pennsylvania's Pocono Mountains, Charles M. Pasipanodya of Southern Rhodesia emphasizes a point in a discussion with ILGWU Vice Pres. Charles Zimmerman.

AFL-CIO Program Training 6 Africans

Six African needle workers have been brought to the United States by the AFL-CIO for six months of intensive training in their chosen trades and in trade unionism.

They spent a week in Washington, where they met with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, other AFL-CIO officials and staff members and with government officials.

They are now undergoing five weeks of tutelage at the Ladies' Garment Workers Training Institute in New York, and upon its completion will be assigned to ILGWU shops for on-the-job training during the remainder of their stay in this country.

The program was arranged by Mrs. Maida Springer of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs with the cooperation of the ILGWU.

It is aimed at improving the efficiency of garment workers in Africa, promoting education in trade unionism among Africans and encouraging the development of a spirit of trade unionism in the industry in Africa. A special effort is being made to help the African leaders promote union consciousness among women workers in their home lands.

The trainees are:

Atim E. Williamson, 27, a member of the executive board of the A. G. Leventis African Workers Union, an affiliate of the Trades Union Congress of Nigeria. Miss Williamson resides in Ibadan.

Folake Johnson, 26, member of the UAC & Associated Companies African Workers Union, also a TUCN affiliate. Miss Johnson lives in Lagos.

Joyce Bwalya Chanda, 25, member of the Union of Commercial & Industrial Workers, an affiliate of the Trades Union Congress of Northern Rhodesia.

Anselmi Wambu Karumba, 40, general secretary of the Tailors, Textiles & Garment Workers Union of Kenya, a master tailor and a Kikuyu who has spent much time in detention camps—as well as several years in the British army. He lives in Nairobi.

Charles M. Pasipanodya, 31, secretary of the Tailors & Garment Workers Union and treasurer of the Southern Rhodesian Trade Union Congress. His home is in Bulawayo.

Flora Manjonde, 21, of the Tanganyika Federation of Labor. Her home is in Dar-es-Salaam.

Exiled Dominican Unionists to Get Training Under ICFTU Program

niques. The course will last for two months and will be coordinated by Richard Henry Roe of Chicago, a member of the American Federation of Teachers.

"As soon as the Organization of American States obtains guarantees that the creation and functioning of a free labor movement will be accepted by the [new] Dominican government, the entire operation will be moved there," Romualdi said.

The program was devised by the AFL-CIO at the request of Alfonso Sanchez Madariaga, general secretary of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers, the hemisphere division of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions. It is being financed by the ICFTU's Intl. Solidarity Fund.

Romualdi expressed special appreciation for the help of Dr. Alfredo Nazario, head of the Labor Relations Institute at the university, for making the school's facilities and staff available for the project. General supervisor of the training will be Morris Paladino, formerly of the Ladies' Garment Workers and now education director of ORIT.

The eight trainees, Romualdi said, are former workers in such industries as sugar, transportation, communications and stevedoring. While all are members of the Free Democratic Dominican Trade Union Group in Exile, they are not linked with any political faction, he said.

"The entire purpose is to plan in advance for building a genuine, democratic labor movement in the Dominican Republic as soon as circumstances permit," he added. "This is an essential element in building a democratic society. These young men, with no political ambitions or political connections, will be trained for that important task."

Curran Sees Bunche On Arab Ship Curbs

United Nations, N. Y.—Pres. Joseph Curran of the Maritime Union discussed continued United Arab Republic interference with Israeli shipping at a meeting with Undersec. Ralph Bunche of the United Nations.

Curran acted as spokesman for the Intl. Transportworkers Federation, which represents 6.5 million members of 225 marine unions in 71 countries outside the Iron Curtain. The ITF has condemned the Arabic action.

Congress Steps Up Pace:

Senate Vote Revives Atomic Power Plant

By David L. Perlman

The Senate has voted to build the world's largest nuclear power plant at Hanford, Wash., using waste products from the Atomic Energy Commission's plutonium production reactor to generate electricity for the power-starved Northwest.

The labor-backed and Administration-endorsed proposal—bitterly fought by private power interests—had been knocked out of the AEC authorization bill by the House on a 176-140 non-rollcall vote. A Republican-led attempt to kill it in the parallel Senate bill was defeated 54-36. The differing bills now go to conference with strong indications that the Senate version may prevail.

In other major actions on Capitol Hill:

- Congress passed and the President signed a water pollution bill providing stepped-up grants to communities for sewage treatment plants and extending federal anti-pollution authority to all navigable waters.
- The House Ways & Means Committee gave tentative approval to a withholding tax on dividends from stocks and interest from savings accounts—a key proposal in the Administration's tax reform package.

The committee, however, rejected Pres. Kennedy's request for repeal of special tax credits to stockholders, under which dividend income now is taxed at a lesser rate than income from wages. A labor-opposed Administration proposal of tax incentives for business expansion was approved with modifications.

- The President signed a labor-backed amendment to the Longshoreman's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act raising maximum benefits for disabling injuries from $54 to $70 a week.
- A House Labor subcommittee approved a two-year $300 million program for retraining jobless workers and for paying them while they learn new skills. Deleted from the original Administration proposal was a plan to reimburse a retrained worker 50 percent of the cost of moving to an area where he can find employment.
- A Senate Labor subcommittee approved a bill by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) to establish a permanent Youth Conservation Corps modeled after the Civilian Conservation Corps of the New Deal era. Earlier a House subcommittee had endorsed a smaller-scale Administration proposal to set up a pilot project involving 6,000 youths.

Key issue in the debate over the Hanford atomic power project was whether the 11 million pounds of steam per hour produced as a by-product of the plutonium production should be utilized to generate nearly 800,000 kilowatts of electricity—half of which would be used by the Hanford project itself.

The AFL-CIO had strongly urged construction of the dual-purpose reactor, terming it a major step "toward the goal of breaking through the barrier to achieve nuclear power competitive in cost with conventional power."

An amendment to the atomic energy authorization bill by three Democratic senators from coal-producing states added a $5 million authorization for a study of nuclear processes to develop new uses for coal and coal products.

Water Grants Raised

The water pollution bill signed by the President raises the authorization for federal grants to communities from the present level of $50 million a year to $80 million in the 1962 fiscal year, $90 million in fiscal 1963, and $100 million each in the fiscal years 1964 through 1967.

The bill, originally sponsored by Rep. John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.), was strongly supported by the Kennedy Administration—in sharp contrast with the position taken by former Pres. Eisenhower who last year vetoed a similar bill.

Approval by the House Ways & Means Committee of a withholding tax on dividends and interest was aimed at stopping an estimated loss to the government of more than $800 million a year, based on Treasury estimates that nearly $3 billion in dividends and interest payments goes unreported on tax returns.

The committee voted for a 16.7 percent withholding rate as against the 20 percent asked by the President. It agreed to exempt anyone who filed a statement that his total income in the year ahead would be so small that no tax would be due.

The "barbarous regime" of Fidel Castro in Cuba has been condemned by the executive committee of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Intl. for "following in the footsteps" of Soviet Premier Khrushchev and Red Chinese Party Chairman Mao Tse-tung.

Meeting in the nation's capital, the board of the international trade union secretariat also heard talks by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. George M. Harrison, Railway Clerks' president, and Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, and received reports on PTTI's pioneer union training programs.

Composed of 105 organizations representing 2 million communications workers in 65 free world countries, PTTI declared its "complete solidarity with the suppressed workers" of Cuba and condemned the Castro regime for "subverting and destroying" free trade unions and for seeking to communize all of Latin America.

It also urged all governments and private employers in the western world to give employment to workers "fortunate in escaping" from Castro's tyranny.

Goldberg praised the "trail-blazing" programs set up by PTTI in Latin America and Africa and those planned for Asian countries.

Harrison as spokesman for the AFL-CIO commended PTTI for "work well done" and asserted that the merged U.S. labor movement, in spite of some internal differences, has a unified approach and a united outlook on these principles:

- The right of workers to create free unions of their own choosing.
- The right of unions to support programs designed to raise living standards.
- Full dedication of unions to the struggle for human freedom, peace and democracy.

Kennedy Asks House To Pass School Bill

member Dixiecrat-GOP bloc voting solidly against the bills and joined by Rep. James J. Delaney (D-N. Y.), normally an Administration supporter, who claimed the general aid bill discriminated against parochial schools and thus voted against all the bills.

The Senate Education Committee has reported out favorably a bill to extend and broaden NDEA but has not completed action yet on the college scholarship aid proposal. Both measures have Administration support.

Kennedy at his press conference expressed confidence that Administration supporters in the House would use all "their energies to get this bill by." He noted that seven of the eight votes in the Rules Committee against the Administration-backed general aid bill were opposed to the Administration's entire program in the domestic area.

Of the procedures open to House members to bypass the Rules Committee, the one receiving serious consideration is the "Calendar Wednesday" approach, which allows House committee chairmen to call up bills on a Wednesday although they have not been cleared by the Rules group.

However, any bill called up for action in this manner must be acted on before adjournment for that day, allowing opponents to use delaying tactics to scuttle it.

Petition Possible

Also available to House members is the discharge petition which requires signatures of a majority of House members to bring a bill to the floor without Rules Committee approval.

An important element in the school-aid tussle is extension of aid to impacted areas—school districts where military bases and other federal installations increase the burden on schools. This has been a continuing program, but the Administration has called for continued aid in this form in the general school-aid bill and it is included in this manner in the Senate-passed bill.

There are about 320 congressional districts sharing in this aid and if no legislation is passed at this session about 3,800 schoool districts will not receive the $300 million in federal aid.

The Administration is reportedly taking the position that it will not support independent extension of impacted aid and that the future of this program depends on the adoption of the general aid measure.

Faupl Bares Cubans' Flight From ILO

The Cuban delegation to the recent Intl. Labor Conference in Geneva, Switzerland, vanished about 10 days before sessions formally opened, Rudy Faupl, U.S. worker delegate to the meeting, disclosed on Labor's News Conference, AFL-CIO public affairs program heard on the Mutual Broadcasting System's radio network.

Until the disappearance, Faupl said, the Cubans had a full delegation which participated in the preliminaries "and invariably voted with the Communist bloc."

"No one seems to know what happened," he added.

Faupl, a member of the Machinists' staff, was questioned on the program by John Herling, Washington correspondent of the National Newspaper Syndicate, and Tom Healy, editor for publications of the Bureau of National Affairs.

Herling asked if there had been any conjecture on the Cubans' departure and their reasons for leaving.

"Not that I know of," Faupl answered, "except that in the beginning they attempted their poisonous propaganda and their attacks, particularly on the United States. But they were stopped in their tracks and then, all of a sudden, they disappeared."

OCAW, Sinclair Agree on Terms

Kansas City, Mo.—Negotiators for the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers have reached agreement with the Sinclair Oil Corp. on terms designed to end a strike that started June 16. Picket lines remained pending membership ratification.

The OCAW bargaining committee has recommended approval of an agreement in which Sinclair agrees to negotiate with the union on the question of severance pay for laid-off employes.

OCAW locals with more than 4,500 members struck at East Chicago, Ind., Corpus Christi and Houston, Tex., and Marcus Hook, Pa., when no agreement had been reached two days after contracts expired. Major issue was a union request for improvements in severance pay provisions.

House Coalition Kills Kennedy Plan To Speed Up Labor Board Cases

erage time for the NLRB to complete processing of an unfair labor practice charge was 426 days, and that even after the board had handed down its final decision the findings were subject to challenge in federal court.

NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch estimated that approval of the reorganization plan would have reduced the time required for processing an unfair labor practice complaint by four or five months.

The reorganization proposal was bitterly opposed by right-wing Republicans in Congress and in the testimony of business organizations before House and Senate committees. A U.S. Chamber of Commerce spokesman endorsed the general principle of speeding up disposition of cases but argued that federal jurisdiction in labor relations cases should be sharply reduced and jurisdiction assigned to the separate states.

Under the reorganization plan, the five-member NLRB would have granted review of a hearing officer's rulings under certain specified circumstances:

- If a substantial question of "law or policy" was raised either by the absence of board precedent or departure from precedent.
- If a trial examiner's decision on a substantial factual issue was "clearly erroneous," prejudicing the rights of any party.
- If the conduct of the hearing had resulted in prejudicial error.
- If there were "compelling reasons" for reconsideration of an important board policy.

Review would have been granted in any case if two of the five board members indicated that in their opinion such consideration was desirable.

This procedure was to have followed the pattern adopted by the NLRB earlier this year in delegating to regional board offices authority to process most representation cases, subject to review on specified grounds. The power to delegate representation cases was affirmatively given to the board in the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959.

Both Republican and Democratic members of the board endorsed the reorganization plan as essential to the proper functioning of the board's machinery and the speedy protection of rights guaranteed in the labor laws.

ULLICO Moves to New Headquarters

New York—The Union Labor Life Insurance Co. has moved its home office to a new building at 850 Third Avenue, New York 22. The move from the old location here was accomplished over a recent weekend without disrupting business.

ULLICO's first office, prior to a move to New York, was in the former AFL building in Washington, D. C., in 1927. The firm is planning to hold open house in the new quarters later this year, probably during the October meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council here.

Social Security Health Plan Vital to Aged, Meany Says

An Editorial

Guide for a World in Torment

THE SOCIAL ENCYCLICAL issued by Pope John XXIII provides highly significant signposts for human advancement at this most critical turn in the history of mankind.

Humanity now possesses the scientific knowledge and technical know-how for eliminating poverty, ignorance and illness. But in the hands of Communist dictators, bent on world conquest, this very knowledge and remarkable industrial progress have tended to menace mankind with the limitless horrors and destruction of nuclear warfare.

Whole peoples who once meekly submitted to a foreign yoke and degrading poverty no longer accept their plight as a matter of fate. They are determined to win freedom from oppression and hunger, eager to build modern economies and improve their conditions. But this very laudable struggle for national freedom and economic progress is endangered by hypocritical forces seeking to exploit its efforts and sacrifices in the interest of the new Soviet colonialism.

These are the great opportunities and the grave dangers so characteristic of our times. It

House Told System 'Sound, Necessary'

A program of health care for older people, financed through the social security system, is a "sound and necessary" plan and the only feasible means of preventing the cost of illness from "pauperizing" millions of retired citizens, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has told Congress.

Appearing before the House Ways & Means Committee, Meany appealed for approval of the Anderson-King bill that would broaden the social security system by adding benefits toward the cost of medical care to the existing protections of the law.

The issue involved in the Anderson-King bill, he told the committee, "literally involves the difference between constant peril and peace of mind; between humiliation and dignity; between pauperism and true social security, not in broad, general terms, but for millions of individuals one by one."

Security Against Catastrophe

The question the committee must decide, the federation president declared, was simply whether our social security system, "that already protects the aged against total loss of income in their years of retirement, [should] also protect them against medical catastrophe."

There is no other effective remedy to meet the problem of medical expenses of older people, "which have destroyed the hard-earned economic security of retired persons and imposed tremendous burdens upon their children," Meany said.

"We believe in the social security system," he said. To be "meaningful," a system of old age insurance "must guard against all frequent and predictable threats; and by far the greatest of these is long-term, costly illness."

Meany appeared before the committee after Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff had thrown the full weight of the Kennedy Administration behind the Anderson-King bill.

Stating that the proposal would extend hospital and nursing benefits to 14.5 million persons 65 years of age or older, Ribicoff called the

Foreign Aid Bill Moves To Key Vote

The Kennedy Administration's crucial foreign aid program moved into the showdown stage in Congress with efforts turned toward building bipartisan support of its long-term aid principle.

In the Senate, the $4.3 billion aid program was set for floor debate after narrow approval by the Foreign Relations Committee of the President's request for authority also to advance $8.8 billion in Treasury funds in long-term loans to underdeveloped nations.

In the House, also, Kennedy won a major victory when the Foreign Affairs Committee approved the long-range financing approach and prepared to clear the entire aid bill for floor action next week. A Republican effort to reject the Kennedy program was beaten, 19 to 10.

The House group then approved the five-year, $8.8 billion loan plan and cut $407 million, less than expected, from the $4.8 billion aid request for the current fiscal year.

Next Congress Unpredictable:

Legislatures Fail On Redistricting

By David L. Perlman

The 1962 congressional elections could be the wildest, most confusing and most unpredictable in the nation's history as the result of failure of key states to redistrict their congressional seats.

Unless divided legislatures in Pennsylvania and Illinois are able to compromise their differences, each Pennsylvania voter will ballot for 27 congressmen in 1962 and each Illinois voter will be entitled to vote for 24 representatives.

In these two states alone, a sweep by either party could give Pres. Kennedy a firm working majority of liberal Democrats—if his party won — or give the Republicans either absolute control of the House or effective control in coalition with conservative southern Democrats.

At-large elections of entire congressional delegations are also possible in Massachusetts, Minnesota and Alabama, which have thus far failed to redistrict, and in Arkansas, where a redistricting law has been challenged by a referendum petition.

The reapportionment of Congress based on the 1960 census resulted in a loss of House seats for all of these states, thus forcing them either to redistrict or to fill all their seats in a statewide election. While several states which gained congressional seats will elect their additional representatives at large, the impact will be minor compared with the winner-take-all possibility when a large state must elect its entire delegation on a statewide basis.

In the present Congress, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Massachusetts and Minnesota combined have an evenly-split aggregate—39 Democrats and 39 Republicans. Under the new apportionment, they will be entitled to a total of 71 representatives, a drop of seven.

Without considering the uncertainties of at-large elections, the reapportionment actions taken to date would appear to favor the Republicans picking up several seats. Congressional Quarterly, an authoritative source, considers a net GOP gain of five seats as "the most likely net effect of the redistricting."

Of the 16 states which lose one or more seats, seven have enacted redistricting bills. The Kentucky and Mississippi legislatures meet early next year and New York also is considered certain to pass a redistricting bill in the 1962 session.

Of nine states gaining seats, five have redistricted, although Maryland's action may be

Berlin Mayor Hails AFL-CIO 'Solidarity'

Mayor Willy Brandt and the people of West Berlin are "counting on the solidarity of the AFL-CIO in the critical period" ahead, Brandt has assured AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a letter from Berlin.

The mayor recalled that the American trade union movement was "first to lend moral support" from abroad and that American labor has, through the years, remained "among our most consistent and most active friends."

"My assurance here is stronger," Brandt wrote Meany, "because I know of your own devotion to our cause in this city."

Committees Give Okay to Training Bill

"High priority" legislation which would create training and retraining programs to enable unemployed and underemployed workers to acquire and upgrade skills is being speeded through Congress.

The House Labor Committee voted approval of a $263 million two-year manpower development and training program by an overwhelming 24 to 3 margin. Earlier, the Senate Labor Committee unanimously approved a $655 millon four-year program.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany gave labor's "whole-hearted" support to the retraining program in testimony before the House group in June. "No man is expendable," Meany declared in praising the proposals as an investment in human resources.

The actions came as Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg stressed the Administration's concern over the plight "of 1 million workers unemployed continuously for 27 weeks or more."

Goldberg nudged Congress through letters to the committee chairmen—Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.) and Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.).

He said Kennedy assigned "high priority" to the proposed manpower development and training bill and the youth employment opportunities bill. He said the President asked him to thank the committee leaders for their efforts and added the Administration "eagerly awaits" enactment of the legislation.

The manpower training measure passed by the Senate group would provide $90 million for the year beginning last July 1, $165 million the next year and $200 million in each of the two succeeding years. State governments would be re-

GM 'Inflation' Charge Challenged by UAW

By Eugene A. Kelly

Detroit—Charging that the General Motors Corp. has injected a false issue of "inflation" into contract negotiations, the United Auto Workers have formally requested GM, under the National Labor Relations Act, to supply data on the firm's "price-profit formula."

The request, signed by UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther and Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock, pointed out that, since GM injected the inflation issue in recent statements, the "reasonableness and propriety of that price-profit formula are now central issues" in the negotiations.

The union negotiators made nine specific requests for information about the formula which, they said, from 1947 through 1955 gave GM a profit of 26 percent after taxes.

Reuther and Woodcock charged the formula is geared to realize a 20 percent net return on investment for 180 days of production an-

CHICAGO NEWSPAPER GUILDSMEN walk picket line at the Defender, issued by its publisher as community daily for Negro citizens and now operating with strikebreakers after all employes were fired. Trouble began Apr. 16, the Guild has filed refusal-to-bargain and other unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board.

Round-the-Clock Picket Lines Continuing at Chicago Defender

Chicago—Outside a well-appointed white-brick newspaper plant on Chicago's South Side, patient pickets in their 15th week are carrying on a 'round-the-clock demonstration against the Chicago Defender, a one-time champion of liberal causes which has become an aggressive critic of labor and is warring on its employes with strikebreakers.

Fifty-eight members of the Chicago Newspaper Guild's Defender unit have been marching since Apr. 16, seven days a week, around the office of the Negro community daily and its publisher, John H. Sengstacke.

Now the National Labor Relations Board has moved into the case, issuing a complaint charging the Defender with refusal to bargain and other unfair labor practices including refusal to furnish data to bear out a claim that poverty prevents a wage increase offer. A hearing before a trial examiner has been set for Aug. 7.

With headquarters in a nearby shop, the Guildsmen have maintained solidarity and a high morale. One of the pickets, Isaiah Major, is the publisher's nephew. Strong support is being given by other units of the Chicago Guild, neighboring locals and other unions.

Chicago Guildsmen, by a 7-1 margin, have voted to pay assessments of $1.50-$3.00 a week to help support Defender pickets.

The Defender for many years has had a history of labor difficulties. In 1954, the Guild had to go to arbitration to enforce its contract for wage payments to two rewritemen who were being paid under the wrong job classification.

Last fall, shortly after the Guild opened negotiations for renewal of its contract for non-mechanical employes, mechanical workers voted to disband an unaffiliated local and join the Guild. After they had voted 27 to 2 in favor of the Guild in an NLRB election, the Defender withdrew a pay raise offer it had previously made to the editorial employes.

In new counterproposals, the company offered no money, no other substantial improvements, and asked for more exemptions from the contract. Management said its original pay raise offer was a mistake and no money was available to pay.

Proof Refused

The Guild offered to extend the old contract if the company would prove inability to pay, but it refused to offer proof. The company also refused to fix firm dates for bargaining for the mechanical employes. The Guild then acted.

Nine days later, the company submitted brief comparative income statements. The Guild held there was not sufficient proof of inability to pay but offered to return the striking employes to work. The company then announced the names of 58 employes the company had "replaced" or for whom allegedly no jobs any longer existed. The list included every one who had walked out.

The company, at a Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service session on June 29, offered to restore 19 of the workers to their jobs if the Guild would drop its charges. The offer was rejected. A later publisher's offer to rehire 20 as "new employes" was neither accepted nor rejected but was reported to the members. Not one of the members went back.

By farming out mechanical work and hiring editorial and office strikebreakers, including a number of his own relatives, Sengstacke has continued to publish. A Guild committee has begun canvassing advertisers to let them know the Defender story. Fellow-publishers have given little publicity to Sengstacke's labor troubles.

Sengstacke has now been appointed to the National Public Advisory Committee on Area Redevelopment by Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges. Guildsmen have asked friends to join them in sending protests to Hodges and to senators and congressmen.

Ken Byrd, executive director of the Guild local, and Intl. Rep. Carleton Ihde said the Defender Guildsmen will stay on the picket line until they can all walk back into the plant together to pick up their old jobs.

U. S. Sues Bakeries In Price-Fix Case

The Justice Dept. has sued five bakery firms for damages resulting from an alleged conspiracy to fix prices and rig bids for the sale of bread to naval installations in Florida and Georgia.

All five firms—Ward Baking Co., American Bakeries Co., Derst Baking Co., Flowers Baking Co., and Southern Bakeries Co.—had been fined recently after having entered no contest pleas in companion criminal anti-trust suits.

The government has asked double damages under provisions of the False Claims Act. The amount of damages claimed was not specified in the suit.

Senate, House Groups Approve Training Bill

quired to match the federal expenditures in the final two years.

The Senate bill would give the Secretary of Labor authority to study labor force needs and the impact of automation.

Stricken from the measure was an Administration-favored provision to allow the relocation of some 3,000 families from hard-hit areas. Added to it was provision for the training and guidance of youths—a program which had been part of the youth opportunity bill.

While the job picture has improved, Goldberg wrote, there continues a high level of unemployment, with over 5 million jobless and a very large number of long-term unemployed.

"This kind of continuous joblessness for half a year or more for 1 million American workers is one of the most serious aspects of our current economic situation," Goldberg wrote.

The long-term jobless, he said, are concentrated in three groups: among the semi-skilled and unskilled; in certain industries, such as the building trades and manufacturing; and in the under-21 or over-45 year age brackets.

The pending programs are designed to train younger workers and to train or upgrade the skills of older workers.

June Change Is Slight:

Living Costs Rise, Factory Pay Up

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's cost of living climbed to an all-time high in June, the government has reported.

The Labor Dept. said the Consumer Price Index rose by 0.2 percent between May and June to 127.6 as a result mainly of price increases for used cars, gasoline, housing and fresh fruits and vegetables.

An accompanying report on factory worker earnings said a steady rise over four months had brought the buying power of production workers to the record levels reached in June and December of 1959.

The June CPI means that the market basket which cost $10 in the 1947-49 base period now costs $12.76.

The rise ended a seven-month period during which the CPI fluctuated between 127.4 and 127.5.

Ewan Clague, commissioner of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics, regarded the June increase as insignificant in statistical terms. He said the stretch since last October, when the CPI was 127.3, has been "a very stable period."

The June index, however, is 0.9 percent higher than the 126.5 of June a year ago. This over-the-year increase is "significant," Clague said.

Asked for a forecast, Clague told reporters he "wouldn't anticipate any decline" for July but did expect "a slight drop" for August.

The increased earnings of production workers was due "mainly to the lengthening of the workweek and also to higher average hourly earnings," the government report explained. It noted the earnings gain was preserved as buying power because of the "comparative stability" of consumer prices.

The report said spendable earnings—what is left after deduction of federal income and social security taxes—rose by about $1.10 between May and June to $83.74 per week for a factory production worker with three dependents and to $76.12 for a worker without dependents.

Earnings at Record

These spendable earnings, representing a new record high, were $2.10 or 2.5 percent higher than June a year ago. Buying power—spendable earnings deflated by cost of living increases—was up by nearly 2 percent over the year and equal to the record high set in June 1959, the report said.

The June CPI of 127.6 will mean a 1-cent-per-hour wage increase for some 9,500 workers. They are employed by the Clark Equipment Co. of Michigan and by the Wagner Electric Corp. of St. Louis and southern Illinois.

The report said there will be no change in the cost of living allowance for the remainder of the 100,000 workers whose union contract clause provides for quarterly review at this time.

GM 'Inflation' Charge Challenged by UAW

nually and is, in fact, the "major engine of inflation" in the auto industry.

They asserted also that 59 GM executives drew more in 1960 salaries and bonuses than the combined salaries of 608 top government officials from Pres. John F. Kennedy through the list of 50 state governors.

Meanwhile the UAW presented major contract proposals to the fourth large auto maker—American Motors—and asked for the help of Chrysler Corp. on a proposed legislative program, as it had done earlier at GM and Ford.

The UAW called on American Motors to put its 25,000 hourly-paid workers on salary, reduce work time without loss of pay, and "modernize" the present wage formula.

In talks with Chrysler, the UAW said its proposal for joint legislative action is based on the recognition that "broad aspects of such compelling problems as rising unemployment" cannot be solved at the bargaining table.

The union emphasized two points in legislative goals—a flexible reduction of the workweek, with no loss in pay, through legislation; and the establishment of a national agency to provide programs to meet changing work needs.

Other points in the suggested legislative program included these:

- A national fund for retraining, relocating and re-employing workers whose employer goes out of business.
- Earlier retirement under social security of displaced workers, over a given age, who are unable to find work.
- A federal system of reinsurance to protect workers' pension rights.
- A federal fund to provide temporary loans for debt payment by jobless workers.
- A standby law giving the President authority to cut withholding taxes to head off recessions.
- A law to protect consumers from price abuses by requiring open hearings on corporation price boost proposals.

Fire Fighters Unit Speeds Integration

Baltimore, Md.—Integration of Negro fire fighters into Local 734 of the Fire Fighters here has been accelerated by a temporary bylaws change permitting non-members to join the union on payment of a $10 initiation fee in lieu of the normal $25 fee.

Pres. Raymond Fogarty of Local 734 said 109 Negro firemen joined when the regular by-laws were modified for a month. That brought the number of Negro members to a total of 113 out of 198 eligibles.

Last year after a speech by Boris Shishkin, director of AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, the local suspended a previous bylaws requirement that all non-members in the Baltimore Fire Dept. must pay the equivalent of back dues for the duration of their services plus initiation fee. The maximum payment at that time was dropped to $25. This year the $10 fee was substituted for a one-month period.

To Protect Job Rights:

Auto Workers Sue 2nd 'Runaway' Firm

Detroit—The Auto Workers have filed suit in U.S. District Court here against Lyon, Inc., to protect the contract and seniority rights of 400 workers as the company carries out plans to transfer operations to Grenada, Miss.

The suit asks the court to declare the rights and duties of the company and the union under their agreement. The union charges Lyon has repudiated the pact by refusing to offer transfer rights to its employes when it moves.

The UAW, which is now studying possible legal suits in six similar "runaway" cases, acted in the wake of a July 5 federal district court ruling that union-won seniority rights become "vested" in the job.

In that ruling, Judge Fred W. Kaess said the Gemmer Mfg. Co. of Detroit, "has an obligation and duty" to offer jobs to its some 700 Detroit employes when it moves to Lebanon, Tenn. Pres. John E. Jarrell of Ross Gear and Tool Mfg. Co., of which Gemmer is a subsidiary, has said the ruling will be appealed.

Decision Appealed

In a related development, attorneys for the Glidden Co. of Cleveland, formally asked the U.S. Supreme Court to review a March 28 decision of the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals which upset a lower court and held that seniority workers had "vested" rights in their jobs. The Glidden case was cited as a precedent by Kaess in his Gemmer ruling.

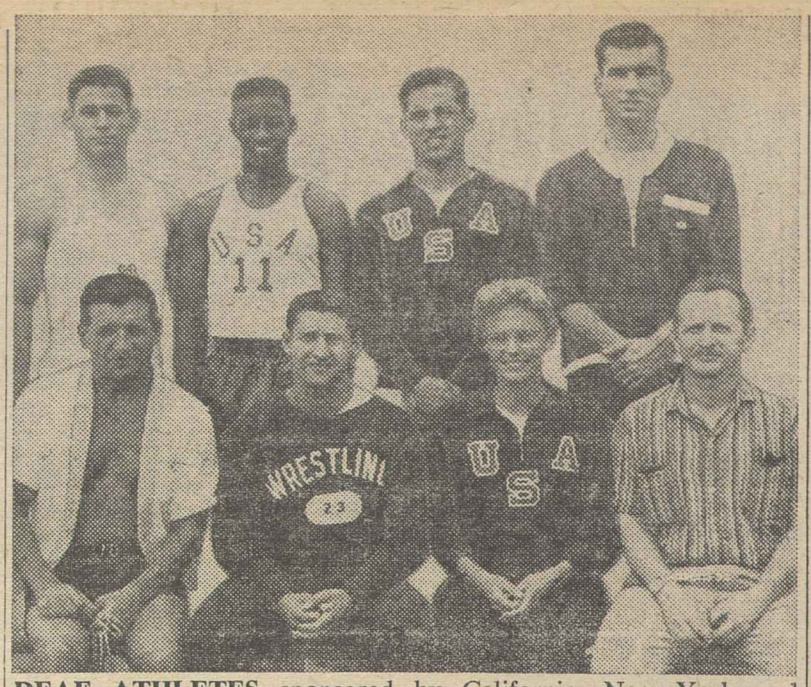
The high court, now in recess, is expected to consider the Glidden petition in its new term next October.

The Glidden and Gemmer decisions and the union legal offensive promise to bring the "runaway" problem to a head.

South Importing Unions?

The lawyer who represented the Glidden workers is reported by the Wall Street Journal as saying he has been "bombarded" with inquiries from union lawyers and others across the nation. The Glidden legal staff said it has had over a hundred inquiries, mostly from company attorneys.

The head of a large Detroit auto supply firm was reported as commenting that the Gemmer ruling is "bound to cause anyone to reconsider plans to move South." He observed it would mean moving northern wage rates to the South and moving the union with the plant and might mean the company would have to pay moving expenses as well if the decision is extended.



DEAF ATHLETES sponsored by California, New York and Arizona locals of the Hod Carriers met their coaches at Gallaudet College in Washington, D. C., before flying to Helsinki, Finland, for the ninth Intl. Games for the Deaf Aug. 6-10. Another sponsor was the Industrial Union Dept. of the AFL-CIO, which gave $1,937 for uniforms for the men's team. From the left are: seated, Dr. Peter Wisher, swimming coach; Jerry Berlowitz, Bronx, N. Y.; Nancy Elkins of Tempe, Ariz., Gallaudet student and javelin thrower; Art Kruger, team director; standing, Lonnie Knapp, Maurice Mosley, Sal Flores and Mike White, all of California.

Kennedy Picks Cosgrove for OCDM Post

Pres. John F. Kennedy has nominated John E. Cosgrove, assistant director of education for the AFL-CIO, as assistant director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization.

Cosgrove has been a lawyer in private practice, an attorney for the Dept. of Labor, and an education staff member for labor bodies in Iowa and Washington, D. C.

A native of Keokuk, Ia., he graduated from St. Ambrose College, Davenport, Ia., and cum laude from the University of Notre Dame law school and was admitted to the Iowa bar in 1948. After two years of Labor Dept. work on the employment security law, he served as education director of the former Iowa State Federation of Labor and as assistant education director for the former AFL. He became assistant director of education for the AFL-CIO at the merger of the two federations in 1955.

John E. Cosgrove
Named to OCDM by Pres. Kennedy

Cosgrove has been a federation representative with the Joint Council on Economic Education, American Library Association, the White House Conference on Children and Youth, the Fulbright Scholarship Association and other bodies.

URW Rejects 'Runaway' Threat by Tire Firm

Mansfield, O.—A demand by the Mansfield Tire & Rubber Co. for a "work rules" reopening of its contract with the Rubber Workers a year ahead of schedule has been rejected by members of URW Local 17 in the face of a company threat to "run away" to the South.

Management served notice it would move its tire plant here to an unorganized company plant in Tupelo, Miss., unless the union agrees to negotiate work rule changes now. It said production costs here are "not competitive."

Pres. Herman Welling of the 1,400-member URW Local 17 listed these objections to the company's ultimatum:

- The contract expiring in September 1961 has a provision for a wage reopener this year, but no reopener on work rules.
- Union and management are bound by the present agreement on work rules until late 1962.
- Management has cut the number of Mansfield plant employes by 40 percent over a period of years but production stayed at virtually the same level because of automation and increased worker productivity.
- Management's last annual report made no mention of wages as a factor in a 1960 decline in company profits.

5 Meetings Held

In five meetings with the company on the union's request for tire industry "pattern" increases of 14.5 cents an hour, management acknowledged, Welling said, that scrap rubber operations were to blame for most of its drop in profits.

The union head said the local stands ready to explore the situation with the company but "members will not be stiff-armed into needlessly giving up contract benefits" agreed to by management in the past.

Many tire companies have signed contracts calling for wage boosts of 7.5 cents an hour this year and another 7 cents in 1962. Among the latest was Mohawk Rubber Co., which agreed to give 600 Akron area workers the "pattern" increase and other improvements.

Meany Asks French To Leave Tunisia

The recent outbreak of fighting between French and Tunisian troops in Bizerte brought an immediate appeal from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urging the United States to seek an immediate end to hostilities and to support the Tunisian people "in their courageous struggle to have all French military forces leave their country."

Meany made his appeal in a telegram to Sec. of State Dean Rusk, a copy of which was cabled to Ahmed Tlili, secretary-general of the General Federation of Tunisian Workers. He said that combat between French and Tunisians jeopardized "the vital interests of the Tunisian, French and all other freedom-loving peoples." The fighting halted after a United Nations Security Council resolution appealed for a ceasefire.

Meany told Rusk the American government should energetically employ its own good offices and through the UN to speed French evacuation of all Tunisian territory.

Missile Sites Ruling Resolves Work Issue

The Missile Sites Labor Commission, in its first ruling since the President established it May 26, has issued a finding involving a jurisdictional dispute at the Walker Air Force Base, Roswell, N. M.

There had been no work stoppage during the dispute and all parties have complied with commission procedures, the commission pointed out in directing that the work of installing underground cable at the base should be performed on a "composite basis" by the Operating Engineers and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The finding, announced by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg as commission chairman, listed methods of installing cable by the plow-in method or the trench method and specified which craft should perform each task.

The commission made its finding on the basis of a report by a panel consisting of Dr. John T. Dunlop of Harvard University, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., and Executive Director James D. Marshall, Associated General Contractors of America.

First Dispute Heard

The panel held a public hearing on July 5 and also met with the disputants to help settle the controversy, the first labor dispute accepted by the missile sites commission.

Meanwhile, the commission released a policy statement designed to "facilitate economical and efficient operations" in construction at missile and space sites. It said a similar statement on work done by manufacturers and industrial unions at missile sites would be issued soon.

The commission recommended that the construction industry and union contract negotiators be governed by these principles:

- Wage rates, fringe benefits and other terms should not be negotiated which "establish more costly standards" than are made applicable to other construction activity in similar circumstances.
- The introduction of new conditions for any craft in a site area should be judged against the standards of practice in the region and construction industry generally, recognizing also that some areas may require somewhat higher benefits to attract the needed workers.
- In the absence of a "clear showing" that wages or work practices are discriminatory or unreasonable, the commission will regard such provisions as reasonable, it said.

The commission has 11 members, three each representing the public, labor and management, with Goldberg as chairman and Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service Dir. William E. Simkin as vice chairman.

It said it is reviewing contracts and practices which place a "discriminatory burden of costs" on missile and space construction projects and urged employers and unions to do the same.

It urged unions and contractors to cooperate in manning construction sites, and called for uniform overtime schedules on sites in the same region.

Labor Relations Called Best in Saskatchewan

Montreal—Four rules that put the basic principles of sound labor-management relations into effect were recently defined by Prof. Roger Chartier of Laval University at the Conference of Learned Societies here.

In Canada, he added, they are applied only in Saskatchewan. The rules he listed were:

- There should be as few restrictions as possible on the definition of a "dispute" or a "working condition."
- Government conciliation should be optional in a dispute.
- Where compulsory conciliation is enforced, it should be short and to the point.
- Conciliation should be "educative" as well as "preventive" with the opportunity for investigation of new bargaining content and techniques, the gathering of pertinent information and "dispassionate discussions" between union, management, government and university spokesmen.

Chartier pointed out that, except in Saskatchewan, the parties to a union contract are not allowed to enter into an agreement on some matters.

"They are compelled to use government conciliation machinery exactly as determined by statute," he said. "No alternatives are set forth."

Fear, rather than freedom, is the force that guides legislators outside Saskatchewan in their thinking on conciliation of disputes, Chartier charged.

"The strike is a fundamental ingredient of the collective bargaining process," he said. "Without it the union would be put from the start at such a disadvantage that well-balanced, genuine collective bargaining would not be possible."

Prof. Pauline Jewett of Carleton University told the conference that a survey showed New Party candidates in Ontario parliamentary by-elections last year were unusually attractive to younger voters.

In the Peterborough area Walter Pitman, the victorious New Party candidate, polled about 80 percent of the voters between 21 and 30 years of age and 61 percent of those between 31 and 40, she reported. The candidate's campaign, she said, caught the imagination of the younger voters without alarming more conservative groups.

In Niagara Falls, New Party Candidate Ed Michelson, who ran third in a race in which the New Party was pushed to the left, won nearly 40 percent of the voters under 30 years of age, Prof. Jewett said.

ILO Institute Opening Set For Fall of '62

Geneva—The board of the Intl. Institute for Labor Studies at its first meeting here decided to open the new school to a first class of 30 students from different parts of the world in the autumn of 1962.

The school was created by the Intl. Labor Organization to provide advanced training to people with some experience in labor-management relations who may be expected to rise to positions of greater responsibility and who may influence social and labor policy.

The board consists of six members of the ILO Governing Body —two each representing workers, government and management; five persons appointed by the Governing Body for terms of three years each from among "persons of outstanding international experience having a knowledge of educational and labor problems," and the counselor of state of the Geneva Dept. of Public Instruction.

The appointed members include Dr. Thomas H. Carroll, president of George Washington University, Washington, D. C. Also attending the meeting were representatives of the United Nations secretary general and of the director general of th UN Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization.

An advisory committee named to advise the director general, Sir Douglas Copland, on curriculum questions includes Dr. Clark Kerr, president of the University of California. It will meet in Geneva Oct. 11 to 13.

ICFTU Asks UN Probe of Abduction

Worldwide support for a United Nations investigation of the disappearance of Heinz Brandt, editor of the West German union publication Metall, is being built up by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions. There are suspicions that Brandt was abducted from the western zone of Berlin by East German political police.

UN Inquiry Urged

From Brussels, ICFTU Gen. Sec. Omer Becu asked UN Sec.-Gen. Dag Hammarskjold to submit the kidnap allegation to the UN Commission on Human Rights and charged that whether Brandt was abducted or arrested as a spy, as the East Germans claim, the incident was "a striking violation of human rights" and "an insolent and inadmissible Communist terror action."

Brandt, 52, who was persecuted by the Nazis during the war, fled from the Soviet zone of Germany in 1958. On June 16 of this year he disappeared from West Berlin, where he had been attending a union meeting commemorating the eighth anniversary of the East German workers' revolt. Five days later the East Germans announced he had been arrested as a western agent.

In Berlin, the German Metalworkers Union expressed the strong suspicion Brandt had been kidnaped and demanded his release. In Kiel, the executive committee of the German Federation of Trade Unions condemned the arrest and called for a free world protest. In Washington, the executive board of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers demanded his release in a resolution also charging kidnaping.

JULIUS NYERERE, Prime Minister of Tanganyika, and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany enjoy a chat on former's visit to Washington. Tanganyika will become independent of Great Britain in December. Nyerere met with Pres. Kennedy on question of economic aid for his nation, destined as the base of an East African federation.

Foreign Aid Program Heads for Showdown came as Pres. Kennedy bluntly warned the Soviet Union that the United States would fight, if necessary, to resist Soviet pressure to force western nations out of West Berlin, but invited the USSR to enter diplomatic negotiations to ease tensions.

These other developments took place in the legislative field:

- Strong bipartisan support developed for swift approval of Kennedy's request for nearly $3.5 billion in increased defense appropriations and for strengthened military forces.
- The Senate passed a pared-down farm bill extending the Administration's wheat and feed grains program but excluding a broader program of crop-by-crop controls to reduce farm surpluses.
- The House passed a bill authorizing $180 million in federal grants to help local communities improve their public health services.
- The Administration worked on new versions of a school aid bill designed to salvage educational proposals that were blocked by an 8-to-7 vote in the House Rules Committee.

With the Senate committee victorious behind them, Administration forces in Congress gave serious consideration to Republican proposals of a "watchdog" group to keep Congress informed on the long-range aid program's operations.

The Senate committee voted twice by 10-to-7 margins to authorize long-term loans totaling $8.8 billion over the next five years and to finance the loans from the Treasury.

The key votes were largely along party lines, with two Democrats voting against the President and one Republican with him. The committee is made up of 11 Democrats and 6 Republicans.

Five of the six Republicans previously had voted for the long-range loan principle when former Pres. Eisenhower requested it in 1957 and again in 1959.

This time, however, four of the five reversed themselves. They were Senators Bourke B. Hickenlooper (Ia.), George D. Aiken (Vt.), Homer Capehart (Ind.), and Frank Carlson (Kan.).

The close vote took place in spite of a last-minute letter to all members of Congress from Secretary of State Dean Rusk and Treasury Secretary Douglas Dillon and personal efforts by the President.

Final Senate committee approval of the aid program came on a 13-to-4 vote, sending it to floor debate and possibly hard battles on key issues. Three senators who helped clear the bill had voted against the heart of the program—the long-term feature and Treasury borrowing—and reserved the right to resume their opposition on the floor. These were Senators Frank J. Lausche (D-Ohio), Aiken and Carlson.

Democratic leaders in the House hope, after final approval is obtained from the Foreign Affairs Committee, to obtain Rules Committee clearance in a manner that would prohibit points of order made on the floor.

This is in anticipation of opposition from the powerful Appropriations Committee, which tends to oppose long-range financing and favors aid programs subject to annual appropriations.

200 IUE Officials Visiting Europe

More than 200 shop stewards and committeemen from locals of the Electrical, Rado & Machine Workers are scheduled to visit Europe this summer on tours arranged by the IUE Education Dept. and the American Travel Association.

The first group of 100 left July 1 and is due to return July 22. The second group of 111 is slated to leave Idlewild Airport, New York, on July 30. This will be the largest U.S. union delegation ever to visit Great Britain, according to IUE Education Dir. Ben Segal.

Senate Votes to Confirm Weaver

George L-P Weaver has been unanimously confirmed by the Senate as Assistant Sec. of Labor for Intl. Affairs. He succeeds George Cabot Lodge, a holdover from the Eisenhower Administration, in the post.

Weaver had been assistant to the president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers before his appointment in January as special assistant to the Secretary of Labor.

Weaver, a labor advisor at several conferences of the Intl. Labor Organization, this year attended the ILO conference in Geneva as a government delegate. He spent nearly three years in Asia on key international assignments for the AFL-CIO and the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Ruttenberg Hails Pact:

16 Nations Agree On Textile Imports

Geneva, Switzerland—Wider world trade in cotton textiles but less disruption by imports in individual nations, such as the United States, may be the outcome of a 16-nation agreement reached here this week.

The agreement was hailed as a "milestone in trade relations" by Stanley H. Ruttenberg, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. Ruttenberg, Lazar Teper, research director of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and Milton Fried, research director of the Clothing Workers, were observers with the U.S. delegation.

Terms of the agreement—which depends on action by the individual governments to become effective—are generally as follows:

- Nations that now impose stringent quotas on cotton goods from low-wage countries are to relax their restrictions sufficiently to permit a reasonable rise in imports.
- The United States and other nations that do not now impose quotas would have the right to request that low-wage exporting areas, such as Japan, India, Pakistan and Hong Kong, exercise restraint, and do not send into a market like the U.S. a total volume of goods greater than in the year ended June 30.

The objective, Ruttenberg explained, is to permit the low-wage nations to expand their exports—essential if they are to build up their economies and raise living standards—without flooding the market in any one importing country, which would inevitably lead to quotas and other barriers.

"The ideal in trade relations that we have been advancing at the AFL-CIO has borne fruit here," Ruttenberg said. "Instead of acting on our own in dealing with a very difficult problem we have come to an international agreement through negotiation."

Europeans Hold Key

Key to the success of the agreement is the willingness of European Common Market countries, which now impose strict quotas on cotton textiles from low-wage areas, to take on some of the burden the U.S. has been carrying, Ruttenberg added.

This week's agreement is planned to extend for one year beginning Oct. 1. The same nations will meet here, starting Oct. 9, in an effort to devise a long-range approach to the export problems of low-wage producers.

Undersecretary of State George Ball, who headed the U.S. delegation, noted that the agreement permitted this country to impose quotas on cotton textiles if the low-wage exporters failed to hold their total shipments to pre-June 30 levels.

Employer observers with the U.S. delegation were more cautious in commenting on the agreement, but indicated they would be satisfied if the Kennedy Administration effectively applied the provision against a rise in imports.

Junior High Named After Labor Leader

Tacoma, Wash.—A new junior high school scheduled to be completed for the 1962 school year is this city's way of saying thanks to organized labor and to a man who has represented labor in the community for more than a quarter of a century—Harry S. McIlvaigh, secretary-treasurer of the Pierce County Central Labor Council.

The chairman of the city's school board, James L. Boze, came to a recent meeting of the AFL-CIO central body to announce the decision to name the new junior high school after McIlvaigh. He told the delegates:

"We appreciate what labor has helped accomplish toward improvement of our schools and we are especially appreciative of the cooperation we have received from your secretary-treasurer."

As secretary-treasurer of the cental body and its predecessor since 1933, McIlvaigh has been prominently identified with labor's crusade for better schools.

A congratulatory letter to the labor council from Teachers Local 461 hailed the decision to name the school after McIlvaigh and declared that as a result of his "fairness, intelligence, leadership and loyalty to the labor movement, the Pierce County Central Labor Council is regarded with the highest respect as an ardent, active friend of education."

Better Programming Sought:

AFTRA Convention Supports FCC Chief

Detroit—A strong resolution, emphatically backing the reform program advanced by Federal Communications Commission Chairman Newton N. Minow, was adopted by the delegates to the 24th convention of the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists here.

Minow has proposed sweeping changes in the FCC's handling of television and radio license renewals, aimed at uplifting the caliber of broadcast programming which Minow finds in a depressing state.

The Minow proposals call for holding of hearings on a license renewal application in the community in which the station is located, provision of more local programming by TV and radio stations, and a limit of extension to one year instead of three where a station is found not to be living up to FCC standards.

The 315 AFTRA delegates called on the union's locals to cooperate with responsible local citizens in making presentations to the FCC in license renewal hearings.

The resolution noted that Congress had refused to give the FCC chairman the powers Pres. Kennedy had proposed but said that present commission authority is broad enough if employed to bring about the objectives of the Minow proposals.

Schnitzler Hails Record

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler praised the union and its leaders for having "accomplished wonders" for performers in its 24-year history. He paid tribute to their unpaid leaders from Eddie Cantor, the first AFTRA president, to Miss Virginia Payne, retiring president.

Pointing out that labor has "lost face" under attack recently despite its contributions to American democracy, Schnitzler urged all union members to tell the story of "very fine unions" like AFTRA to the public.

"Don't hide your light under a bushel basket," he said. "Let the public know of your accomplishments."

Schnitzler said the "professional enemies" of unions have "overreached themselves" and are beginning to get reckless, as when they tried to make labor the scapegoat for the "missile gap."

Despite human imperfections, labor is "still alive and growing," Schnitzler said. In the months to come, the value of labor's work against communism and other despotisms will be more understood and appreciated, he said.

Entertainment Alliance Urged

Pres. Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians called for an alliance of entertainment unions to fight the spread of automation in the broadcasting industry.

"Instant broadcast can soon become as common as instant coffee and music are today," Kenin said, warning that equipment is being sold that could all but eliminate the need for radio artists and performers, just as recordings have cut employment for musicians.

Kenin said the time had come for the unions to take the offensive and "compel a greedy industry to assume its public responsibilities or we shall soon be pushbuttoned into silence."

Officers Elected

Delegates elected Art Gilmore to the presidency of the union. Gilmore is president of the Los Angeles local. Also elected were seven vice presidents: Bernard Lenrow, New York; Hal Newell, Twin Cities, Minn.; Arvin Schweig, Chicago; Roland Sharette, Detroit; Jack Chase, Boston; Clancy Leisure, San Francisco; Travis Johnson, New York.

The delegates also elected New York actress Vicki Vola as treasurer and Judd Conlan of Los Angeles as recording secretary. Executive Secretary Donald F. Conaway serves in an appointive position.

Guild Certified for 54 at Ottawa Journal

Ottawa, Ont.—The Ottawa Newspaper Guild has been certified as bargaining agent for the 54-member editorial department of the Ottawa Journal. That brought Canadian membership in the American Newspaper Guild to nearly 3,200—more than 10 percent of ANG's total.

Newspaper Guild Convention Set To Act on Dues Hike, Strike Policy

Vancouver, B. C.—More than 200 delegates of the 28th annual convention of the Newspaper Guild faced a heavy agenda in a scheduled five-day meeting including a proposal to increase per capita payments from $1.80 to $1.90 a month and to map an expanding program and meet rising operational costs.

Also on the program were proposals for strengthening procedures in administering strike policy and in some areas of collective bargaining, adoption of a budget totalling $486,000, and minor constitutional revisions.

Convention Saluted

Greetings to the Guild were received on the opening day from Canada's Prime Minister Diefenbaker and from Pres. Kennedy.

The convention was to close July 28 with nomination of candidates for the international executive board, comprising 15 members whose two-year terms start Oct. 15.

In a five-hour closed-door session of the convention, delegates reaffirmed a policy, fixed at last year's Chicago gathering, that the Guild shall not engage in financing or otherwise supporting a commercially-owned newspaper.

The issue arose in connection with the 20-month-old strike at Portland, Ore., where 49 Guild members made jobless by a Stereotyper union strike against the Oregonian and the Journal are now employed on a publicly-financed daily newspaper, the Portland Reporter, an outgrowth of a strike publication launched as a union weekly.

The Reporter has issued stock, leased and remodeled a newspaper plant, has a growing circulation and patronage from advertisers, and a staff of about 175 employes.

Cutoff Date Aug. 11

Guildsmen on the Reporter have been receiving Newspaper Guild benefits in lieu of salary. Despite a refusal by the 1960 convention to invest in the enterprise, Guild benefits have continued, with three extensions of the time limits originally set by the executive board. The board recommended to the Vancouver convention that benefit payments be discontinued Aug. 11, which would be six months after the day the Reporter went into daily publication.

The Portland Guild local countered with a proposal that benefits be continued to Dec. 1. The IEB's position prevailed.

The week's program included a lavish schedule of entertainment arranged by the Vancouver-New Westminster local, a 700-member Guild group which dates its ANG affiliation back only five years.

Workers Win Test Case on Jobless Pay

More than 135 Western Electric installers in New Jersey, laid off by the company in 1958 and 1959, will receive back unemployment compensation that they wouldn't be receiving if the company had its way.

The laid-off workers, members of the Communications Workers, received termination pay in accordance with the contract. When they also filed for unemployment compensation, the company objected, claiming that the termination pay was a bar. The State administrator upheld the company.

On appeal, the State Supreme Court has now ruled 7-to-0 in favor of the workers.

In a strongly-phrased statement, the court said in deciding a test case:

"The lay-off allowance granted the claimant herein was dismissal wages, regardless of the descriptive terms used. It was not wages for the period of Aug. 15 through Sept. 19, 1958. The claimant was not continued in employment during that period. His claim of Aug. 18, 1958 was valid. He was eligible for unemployment benefits."

Thus, in the test case, the court has held that all the men denied benefits are now eligible to receive their unemployment compensation.

USWA Asks Metal Mines Inspection Law

A law requiring federal inspection of the nation's metallic mines is needed to protect more than 30,000 union miners from death, disease or disablement, a Steelworker spokesman has testified.

Asserting that there is no federal statute now covering such mines, Orville Larson, USWA's coordinator of nonferrous activities, urged approval of a bill by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) for annual inspections by the U.S. Bureau of Mines.

Larson told a House Labor subcommittee that years of "futile effort" have convinced the union the bill is needed because of the "total inadequacies of the present conglomeration" of state laws and general lack of enforcement.

Asserting that 42 miners have beeen killed in two states alone since the last congressional hearings, Larson said some states have no inspection systems at all, others have poor enforcement or inadequate state appropriations, while trained civil service personnel is "almost non-existent."

Unsafe Mines

Larson referred to recent testimony that two-thirds of the nation's uranium mines are unsafe and that owners had done nothing about it.

"Inspection is the key factor" to curtail accidents and death, the USWA man said. The bill he favors would cover mining of copper, lead, zinc, iron ore, gold, silver and other minerals, not including coal and lignite already covered by federal inspection laws. Other bills are now pending to broaden protection under the coal inspection statutes.

UNDER NEW BUSINESS, or maybe it was welfare, these entertainers—union members all—were on the agenda of the regular meeting of the Cincinnati AFL-CIO Labor Council. They put on a preview of a show they will stage at the nearby River Downs Race Track on Sept. 17 to raise money to combat juvenile delinquency. Meeting was held in hall of Retail Clerks and shows poster on consumer boycott of Sears, Roebuck.

. . . a troubled world

is against this background of developments that the social encyclical must be viewed.

Its calm analysis and constructive proposals for meeting such complex problems of our times as socialization, the elimination or reduction of economic imbalance within countries and the urgency of just relations between nations in different stages of economic development will attract much support among peoples of all faiths.

Labor everywhere will be deeply impressed by the encyclical's rejection of the belief held in certain quarters that "socialization, growing in extend and depth, necessarily reduces men to automatons."

In view of what has been happening behind the Iron Curtain, free labor throughout the world will welcome the conclusion of Pope John XXIII that "socialization can and ought to be realized in such a way as to draw from it the advantages contained therein and to remove or restrain the negative aspects."

Even the most "rugged individualists" will have to see the soundness and justice of the encyclical in stressing that "private enterprise must contribute to effect economic and social balance among the different zones of the same country" and that "public authorities . . . must encourage and help private enterprise, entrusting to it, as far as efficiently possible, the continuation of the economic development."

The social encyclical will arouse fervent approval, especially in the developing countries, for its forthright and sound consideration of "probably the most difficult problem of the modern world . . .—the relationship between the political communities that are economically advanced and those in the process of development." We are confident that the peoples of the free world will view with full favor the indisputable conclusion of the encyclical that:

"Given the growing interdependence among the peoples of the earth, it is not possible to preserve lasting peace if glaring economic and social inequality among them persists. . . . We are all equally responsible for the undernourished peoples. Therefore, it is necessary to educate one's conscience to the sense of responsibility which weighs upon each and every one, especially upon those who are more blessed with this world's goods."

Wherever labor is free to express its own opinion, it will hail the encyclical's eloquent plea for social justice and its insistence that the "workers should be paid a wage which allows them to live a truly human life and to face up with dignity to their family responsibilities." The international free trade union movement will certainly not fail to see the significance of the encyclical's forceful support of the worker's right to an effective voice in the running of industry and public economic planning.

The social encyclical should have a most salutary effect on the ranks of free world labor. It should go a long way toward removing the debris of prejudice left over from the lay-clerical struggles of the nineteenth century.

Once the air is thus cleared, a most serious obstacle to the greater unification of free labor, especially in Europe and Africa, shall have been removed. Such higher free world labor unity was never more urgent than it is today when the Soviet imperialist threat to human freedom, national independence and world peace is so grave.

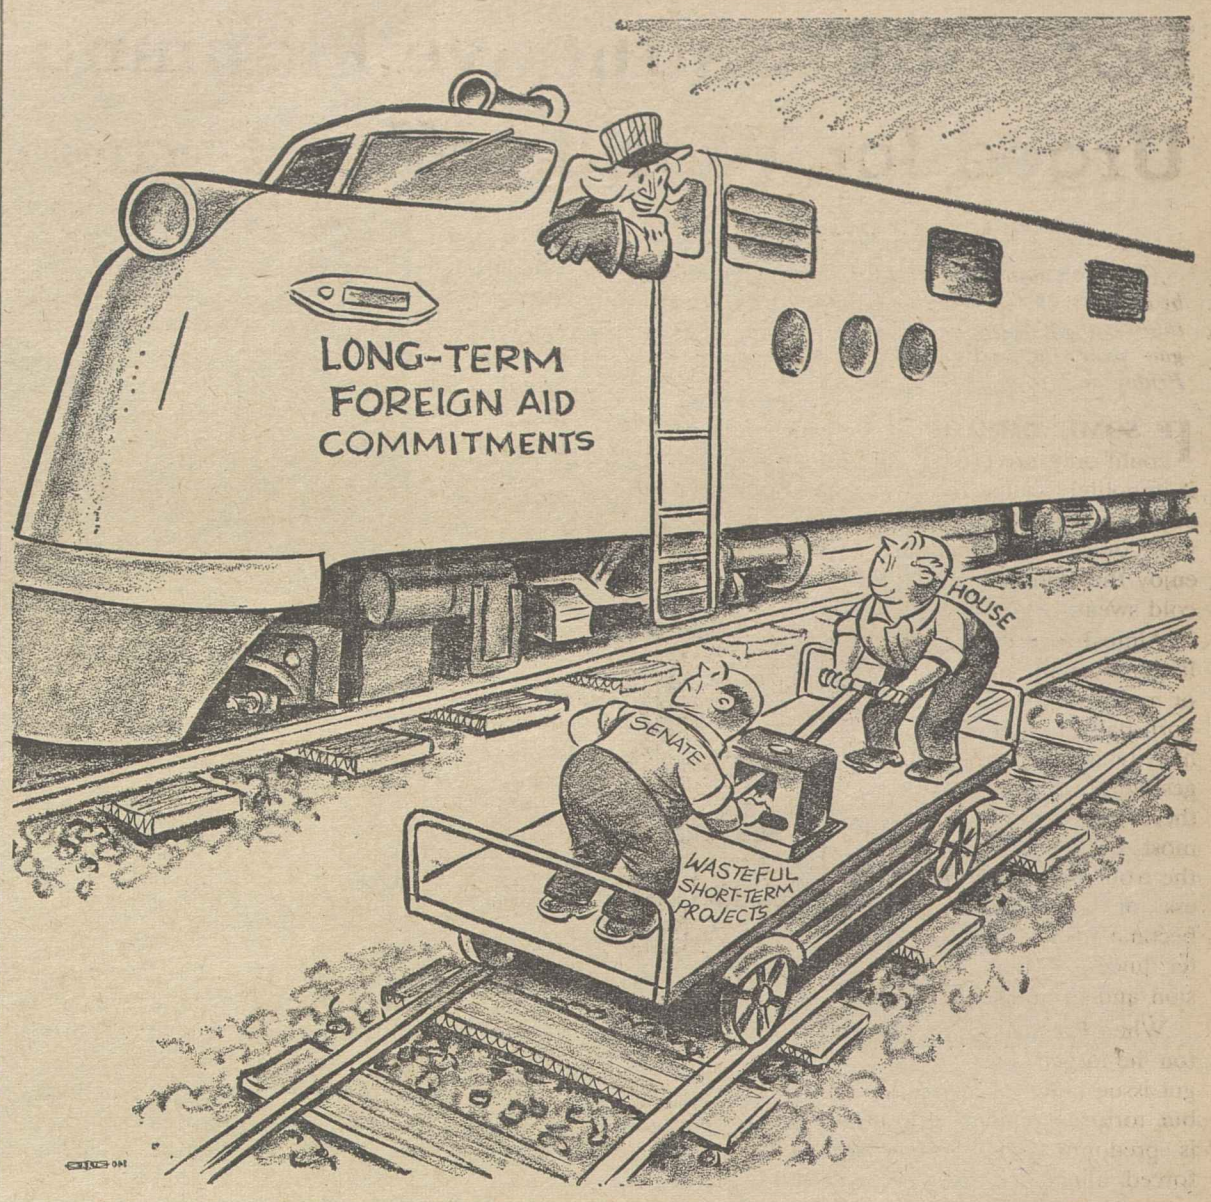
Time to Get Aboard



Log-Jam Broken by Kennedy:

Federal Workers Seen Winning Struggle for Union Recognition

AFTER MORE THAN half a century of struggle it would appear that organized employes of the federal government may finally achieve their goal of recognition and the right to talk officially about their grievances and working conditions with their bosses.

For many years there have been all sorts of roadblocks that have prevented official recognition of the 500,000 federal workers who are members of unions, notably the Postal Clerks and Letter Carriers. Efforts have been made to get legislation that would provide for recognition. Former Sen. James Mead (D-N. Y.) was a strong fighter for recognition when he was in the Senate 15 years ago. But the efforts failed.

Now Pres. Kennedy has broken the log-jam and has set in motion machinery that may bring about recognition through an Executive Order. He has set up a special task force of government heads to "review and advise" him on the whole problem of employe-management relations in the federal service. Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg has been named chairman of the task force, which has been directed to report by Nov. 30.

What they will report remains to be seen. But the President himself gave some pretty strong clues as to his own thinking. The opening sentence of his memorandum is about as clear as it can be in "recognizing" federal employe unions. It reads:

"The right of all employes of the federal government to join and participate in the activities of employe organizations, and to seek to improve working conditions and the resolution of grievances should be recognized by managerial officials in all departments and agencies.

"The participation of federal employes in the formulation and implementation of employe policies and procedures affecting them contributes to the effective conduct of public business. I believe this participation should include consultation by responsible officials with representatives of employes and federal employe organizations."

HOW FAR CAN the federal government and federal employe unions actually engage in collective bargaining in the ordinary sense of the term?

Obviously, there won't be bargaining over wage scales and basic working conditions such as hours, vacations, pension plans and such matters, which are established by Congress through legislation.

The President was careful to use such phrases as "participation" in the formulation of employe policies and "consultation" by officials with union representatives.

Nevertheless there is a wide area of activity that can be dealt with fruitfully through "participation" and "consultation" in such matters as grievances, working conditions, interpretation of legislation dealing with government-employe relationships and general working policies.

In the past, federal employe unions have complained of one-sided decisions in grievance cases. The department head, in effect, brought the charges against an employe, made the decision of guilt or innocence, and meted out the punishment with no check upon him.

Federal employe unions would like to see review power placed in impartial hands. They would like to be able to talk over work problems with department heads, not as tolerated "outsiders," but as officially recognized representatives of their members.

Quite apart from the President's efforts to settle this long controversial and unsolved problem as a matter of justice, there is the probability that the government can get more and better service from satisfied workers than from disgruntled ones.

Deputy Postmaster Gen. H. W. ("Bill") Brawley already has predicted that the Administration's efforts to improve labor relations in the postal service will pay off to the tune of "at least 10 percent" increase in productivity.

Brawley said that when the Kennedy Administration took office, it "found that the employe force of the postal establishment had been almost systematically embittered by a personnel program that could be described only as an anti-people program.

"Personnel practices and procedures, along with four successive vetoes of pay bills, had driven morale to an almost unprecedented low," Brawley added.

If Pres. Kennedy finally heals this long-running sore in the relations between the government and its unionized workers, he will have made a great contribution not only to improved relations in the federal employment-management field, but will have set an example for private enterprise (PAI).

Morgan Says:

Dose of Constructive Planning Urged for World's War Fears

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

IF SOME DOCTOR of human eccentricities could only prescribe a cure for what are vividly if impolitely called the "gut issues" of the world, civilization's collective bellyache over the threat of war could be substantially eased and we might enjoy the summer with a cold drink instead of a cold sweat.

Morgan

Almost every country, large or small, suffers one or more gut issues, a stubborn ball of emotion lying heavily in its political digestive tract. On paper there are solutions to almost every problem but the trouble is in the process of application they become curdled by the bitter juices of human passion and prejudice.

When Pres. Ayub of Pakistan was in Washington he urged Pres. Kennedy to help solve the gut issue between Pakistan and India—the lovely but tortured state of Kashmir whose population is predominantly Moslem but whose allegedly forced allegiance is to Prime Minister Nehru's predominantly Hindu India. Mr. Kennedy promised to do what he could but warned he couldn't do very much—making it plain we wouldn't use foreign aid as a lever to pry two countries into a settlement of a bilateral problem.

And he used the gut issue between Austria and Italy—the senseless but virulent flare-up over the German-speaking population of the gorgeous Tyrol—to illustrate how small quarrels can so disproportionately suck away a government's energies that it has no time or substance left for larger world problems.

THE FREEDOM OF ALGERIA is another gut issue which has prevented Frenchmen and Algerian nationalists from being reasonable in approaching a settlement. Now France's usefulness in what was supposed to be a major commitment to NATO's defense of Europe is strained another excruciating degree by the eruption of a pathetic and deadly fight with Tunisia over the Sahara and a French base at Bizerte.

One of the most ulcerated gut issues, eating deeper pockets of hatred into the Middle East, blighting progress and blocking stability, is the pernicious conflict between the Arabs and Israel.

It is the bloodshot blindness of fear and prejudice that is hindering the Portuguese and the blacks of Angola from taking a clear-eyed start toward independence for that anguished African colony. Independence must and will come, making the savagery now seem even more cruelly pointless.

When the full story of violence and repression in Angola comes out it will be ghastly and shocking. U.S. intelligence reports indicate more Europeans were killed in Angola in one week at the height of disorders three months ago—some 1,500—than all the British colonists slain in Kenya during the long Mau Mau terror. It is said some 10 times that number of Negroes were killed in Angola in the same interval.

Americans need look no farther than their own cities—north as well as south—for one of their most cancerous gut issues, racial prejudice.

There is no patent medicine or other nostrum to combat these deep emotional blocks which twist the viscera, sap the strength and clog the minds of the non-Communist world, just at a time when its major effort should be concentrated on human betterment everywhere—a goal which is the best possible answer to the threat of expansion by the Communists. But perhaps if the promise on the one hand and the purposeless poison of the so-called gut issues on the other can be put into clearer perspective, it will be easier, little by little, to divert nations' efforts from the negative to the positive.

A tantalizing tangible example of this possibility is hopefully emerging. Since the Kennedy Administration began to push seriously the concept of long-term foreign aid, U.S. officials have been quietly astounded at the favorable reaction abroad, at the inclination of foreign regimes to intensify serious planning coupled with social reforms which Washington says are a must to qualify for assistance.

"If we can avoid a war and if we can get the foreign aid bill through Congress," says a key Administration source privately, "it will be possible to see a major change in the pattern of relations between the northern and southern hemispheres within a year."

Key countries like Brazil, Nigeria, India and Pakistan, properly helped and properly developed, could have enormous healthful influence in their areas. Even uneasy Iran, bordering the USSR, and Formosa, across the Straits from China, bear encouraging prospects of positive and stabilizing developments when aid is charted in terms of balanced plans.

Washington Reports:

Clark, Prouty Emphasize Need For Job Retraining Legislation

THE ADMINISTRATION-BACKED Manpower and Development Training Program must be passed to prepare workers displaced by automation and other causes for new jobs, Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.) asserted in interviews on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program, heard on 450 radio stations.

Clark, sponsor of the Senate bill, said it appears that the U.S. may have "well over 6 percent of the labor force unemployed the first of next year and perhaps an additional 1.5 million underemployed at that time." Such a level of persistent unemployment, Clark said, would be "unsupportable."

He agreed that the area redevelopment program and housing and other projects will make some jobs, but said retraining is necessary for workers who no longer have "marketable skills" and for the "out-of-school people who have never had a job and lack the educational training to find and hold one."

Prouty remarked: "I think too many of our young people are leaving school before they finish high school and it's very difficult for anyone nowadays to get a good job and keep it unless he has the advantage of at least a high school or vocational school education. I can't stress that enough."

Both senators pointed out that training must be for existent jobs. Random retraining, they said, is not advisable.

Clark explained that under his bill the Dept. of Labor would make a continuing series of studies to find where job opportunities exist and in what field. The Dept. of Health, Education and Welfare would set up actual training classes, with "priority given to those who have been members of the labor force for three or more years, who are heads of families, and who are 30 years old or older."

Retraining allowances would be paid to enable jobless workers to exist while taking training. Prouty said transportation costs also should be paid to move workers and their families from a jobless area to one where they could find employment.

Clark said his bill could go into effect immediately after it is passed, since the Dept. of Labor has already begun preliminary research on job availabilities.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

MR. KENNEDY'S SOLEMN Berlin speech to the nation won the immediate support of Republicans in Congress as well as of Democrats. The spokesmen of the GOP followed the precedent set during several other national crises—and particularly the precedent of the majority Democrats during the last six years of Pres. Eisenhower's Administration—in giving bipartisan endorsement to the program believed necessary by the Chief Executive to warn the Soviet Union plainly that we shall not be pushed out of Berlin.

At the same time, a drumfire of Republican demands came for cutbacks on various domestic programs urged by the Administration.

The Republican Congressional Campaign Committee, headed by Rep. Bob Wilson (Calif.), demanded that Mr. Kennedy withdraw proposals to strengthen our home economy and to expand, after years of delay, essential social services. The Administration must decide, said Wilson's committee, whether to equip Uncle Sam for the Berlin crisis with "a Santa Claus suit or military khaki."

The 10 Republican members of the House Ways & Means Committee sent a letter to the President expressing "shock" over his "apparent unwillingness to make any downward revision in pending proposals for optional non-defense spending."

House GOP Leader Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) spoke for the central Republican Leadership Conference in demanding a message from Mr. Kennedy "proposing cutbacks on domestic spending."

WHAT IS IT the Republicans desire to have "cut back" to save the nation from that "bankruptcy" they have predicted steadily for almost two generations? Oddly enough, precisely the programs they have always voted against, have sought to blockade before there was any immediacy to the Berlin crisis, have labeled "socialism" and "wastrelism."

Bob Wilson's committee and the Ways & Means Committee members suggested housing, farm subsidies, federal school aid and depressed area plans as among the principal programs where "cut backs" were desirable.

Halleck also mentioned the housing program and school aid and added anti-pollution expenditures, the proposed Youth Conservation Corps, and the Hanford reactor project for which the Senate authorized an investment of $95 million to produce electricity from heat generation that would otherwise be wasted totally.

The GOP says these programs should now be abandoned—even those approved just this year after they had been checked for 10 or 12 years or more—because of proposed additional defense spending of $3.5 billion, which is roughly seven-tenths of 1 percent of our gross national product.

THERE IS IN REALITY a profound difference in viewpoint between those who think federal expenditures for the health, education and well-being of our people are basically wrong and those who believe a modern democracy, enlightened and strong, has a proper place to play in providing social services.

An all-out war, as we learned during World War II, requires the channeling of materials and resources into defense production. It imposes restrictions on consumer expenditures. It requires disciplines that free people willingly accept temporarily in order to safeguard their future freedom.

In fact, however, the cost for social services must be paid by the citizens of a country regardless of the level of government from which the tax bills are sent, whether local, state or federal.

The plain truth is that the states and cities are overburdened financially, that they have dragged their feet on some services and that localities and states are structurally incapable of providing some other services requiring a national approach, such as valley flood control and stream pollution.

The issue with the Republican conservatives is not whether the nation will be "bankrupted" by programs the people have shown they need and want. It is whether federal responsibility for civilized services shall be accepted, together with the graduated income tax that places a substantial and equitable share of the burden on those best able to pay.

WORKER RETRAINING is urgently needed, Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.), left, and Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Clark is author of Senate bill to set up training program.

How to Buy:

Supermarket Private Brands Represent Significant Savings

By Sidney Margolius

HOW MUCH can you really save by buying supermarkets' own brands of foods and cleaning supplies? A survey by this department found the average price of 32 items packed under stores' own brand names was 14 percent under similar products sold under nationally-advertised names. In all instances we tried to compare items quality for quality.

This is an important saving. It can be pyramided further if you also buy the larger sizes. This department recently reported that larger sizes of foods and cleaning supplies cost an average of 17 percent less per ounce than small sizes of the same products.

The savings on private brands found in this survey are even larger than those reported in a survey made six years ago by the University of Illinois Bureau of Economic and Business Research. The university found supermarkets' own brands of foods cost on the average 11 percent less than the nationally-advertised brands.

By combining the two techniques of buying private brands and buying larger sizes, you cut the cost of some staple foods actually in half. For example, we found private-brand bake beans selling for only seven-tenths of a cent an ounce in the larger cans. A famous brand of canned beans in the small size costs 1.4 cents an ounce.

The biggest savings found were on private brands of cleaning supplies. The most startling example is the popular new liquid household cleaners. Two private brands—Co-Op Glow and Grand All-Purpose Cleaner—were approximately half the price of the most-famous national brands.

But the savings were available in almost all products. Of the 32 items compared, only two of the private brands were priced the same as the advertised brands. Similarly, the University of Illinois survey had found that of 31 price comparisons, the private brands were lower in 26, the same in two, higher in three instances.

As a matter of fact, as merchandise experts know, many of the private-brand products are packed for stores by the manufacturers of the nationally-advertised brands.

THE SURVEY ALSO SHOWED a tendency by some national-brand manufacturers to charge exactly the same price for "competing" products. In flour, for example, two national brands are exactly the same price for the same-size package; spaghetti of two national brands is the same to the penny, and so on.

The potential savings in private brands extend beyond foods. This department frequently has pointed out the large difference in price between private and national brands of household medicines and toiletries.

In a Federal Trade Commission hearing not long ago, the Sun Oil Company testified that private-brand gas stations usually pay as much as three or four cents per gallon less than independent major dealers pay for gasoline of "like grade and quality" under advertised brand names. In fact, it was testified that "the gasoline sold by private-brand dealers is frequently purchased . . . from major suppliers and is the same as that sold under the brand name of such suppliers."

People often needlessly rely on advertised brand names instead of using their own judgment and making quality comparisons.

RETIRED MEMBERS weren't forgotten in the pension plan negotiated by the Westchester, N.Y., Brickmasons District Council. The first check went to 96-year-old Robert P. Nethercott, center, who was the first state secretary of the Bricklayers. At left is Bruno Caneva, a trustee of the fund representing the Building Trades Employers Association. The presentation was made by James A. Nilan, president of the council. One hundred and fifty other retired members will also receive pensions.

How Britain Meets Automation Problem

LONDON—THE TROUBLES caused by automation in the United States and Canada are far from the pattern throughout the rest of the western world.

In Britain the story of office automation shows that the results for the office worker may be a job with a least the same salary and status and often improved jobs and working conditions.

The secret is consultation between the unions and management.

The London County Council with the Labor Party in control has recently acquired an eight-ton electronic recording and integrating computer.

The computer will streamline the Council's operations and through economies will save the London taxpayers nearly $100,000 a year.

But these weren't the only concern of the council. Problems were created for the council's employes and the council set out immediately to solve them.

When the suggestion to acquire the computer was first broached, the council called in the executive of the London County Council Staff Association, an affiliate of the Trades Union Congress, and gave it a full description of the machine, its purposes and methods and gave the union men an appraisal of the likely effects which the computer would have upon the staff.

This early exchange of ideas and information, reports the union, was followed by joint consultations between union and employers at subsequent stages of the operation.

THE EFFECT of the well-planned move both here, and in other offices through Britain where consultation marked progress, has been that many new and more senior jobs have been created.

Consultation with the unions, say the National Union of Railwaymen and the Transport Salaried Staffs Association, takes place before the new electronic methods are introduced and any staff displaced from their jobs are absorbed in other posts without reduction in salary or status. The unions add that automation in the office sometimes leads to improved job values among lower ranks of the staff.

In some cases computed installation has involved a substantial reduction in staff. Here the unions have won agreements with employers. For example the Clerical Workers have an agreement that all affected workers receive three months notice. Staff with three to five years' service receive eight weeks severance pay and those with more than five years receive 30 weeks severance. Agreement has also been reached that there should be no recruitment during the change-over period and this has made it possible to transfer staff from the old operations to the new computer operation.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Pre-Toasted Marshmallows Free Jane for Mowing Lawns

By Jane Goodsell

AN OPEN LETTER to American manufacturers from an American housewife:

Dear Sirs:

I wish you fellows would get together and figure out what sort of person you think I am. The way you treat me, I'm all confused.

Sometimes you act so tender and protective toward me that I feel like your pampered darling. Look at the sweet things you've done for me: You invented an electric can opener because you thought it was too hard for me to turn that little handle all by myself; you put a cellophane strip around cigarette packages to make them simpler to open; to make my lot in life easier, you developed frozen orange juice, pre-cooked rice, roll-on mascara and an automatic pencil sharpener.

Just the other day I discovered another example of your kindness: you're packaging pre-toasted marshmallows for me. Gentlemen, I thank you! It's perfectly darling of you to rescue me from the drudgery of toasting my own marshmallows.

But, as I said before, you puzzle me. Why, pray tell, did you invent that featherweight lawnmower? You know what I'm talking about—the one that's so light that even a woman can cut the grass. Is it for me, little old me, who's too helpless to squeeze oranges and shell peas?

Come come, men, I'm the little featherbrain with the automatic pencil sharpener. Surely you don't expect me to mow my own lawn! And, while we're on the subject, what's all this talk about me painting my own living room? I don't care how easy it is with latex paints and rollers, it's not fair to expect me to do it. Not after the way you've babied me, it isn't.

Gentlemen, you've simply got to be more consistent. I'm willing—nay, eager—to be your spoiled darling and buy my marshmallows pre-toasted. But if that's the kind of woman I am, how can you expect me to change a tire all by myself? Now don't tell me you don't. It's me you had in mind when you developed that hydraulic jack, isn't it? I saw what you wrote in those advertisements. You said that even a woman could fix a flat all by herself. Well, maybe a woman can. But not the same woman who's too fastidious to use messy cream deodorants.

The point is, I don't want tire-changing made so easy that I have to do it myself.

And another thing. I want to go to the beauty parlor and sit under the dryer and read movie magazines with a clear conscience. So will you please stop telling me that it's easy to give myself a home permanent? How can you say that permanent waving is easy when you've just convinced me that opening a can is difficult?

Gentlemen, you can't split my personality like this. I can be a luxury-loving lazybones who uses instant coffee and pre-toasted marshmallows. And I guess I can be a sturdy, self-reliant type who mows her own lawn and curls her own hair. But—much as I'd like to be your ideal woman—I can't be both at the same time. Given a choice, I prefer to be a languorous lazybones. So would you mind keeping your hands off my spare time?

Is that clear? After all, gentlemen, I'm your billion-dollar baby, and you want to keep me happy, don't you.

With love and hate,

Jane.

Rollcall Vote on NLRB Reorganization

Here is the rollcall vote by which a coalition of Republicans and conservative southern Democrats defeated the Administration reorganization plan aimed at speeding up the processes of the National Labor Relations Board. The vote to disapprove the reorganization plans was 231-179.

On labor's scoreboard, a vote for the resolution of disapproval was a wrong vote (W), while a vote against rejecting the reorganization plan was a right vote (R). Other symbols: PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not voting. Numerals denote district; AL—at-large; NV—not voting.

CITED FOR her services to labor and libraries was Dorothy Kuhn Oko, center, retiring labor education specialist of the New York Public Library. Presenting the citation at a dinner in Cleveland of the American Library Association's Joint Committee on Library Service to Labor were Director Lawrence Rogin, left, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, and Roberta McBride, Detroit, chairman of the Library Committee.

Service to Community Urged on Librarians

Cleveland—"Librarians should go out into the community to find the needs of all major groups—including labor—not now being adequately served," according to Lawrence Rogin, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

Speaking at a dinner of the American Library Association Joint Committee on Library Service to Labor, Rogin pointed out that the committee developed out of an awareness by some librarians and trade unionists that the large mass of American workers were not making use of existing library services.

Dorothy Kuhn Oko, former committee chairman who is retiring this year as labor education specialist of the New York Public Library, was presented with a citation for her contribution in this direction.

"The 15-year history of the committee," said Rogin, "has shown that this group could be reached only when there are librarians who have been concerned with the problems and have tried new ideas.

"It is not enough to open the doors and call out 'welcome.' Librarians and library boards must recognize that labor unions offer a major channel to reach a large group of citizens who do not use the library."

Lists Typical Services

Rogin noted a number of libraries had shown the way to enlarged service to workers by working with labor writers, developing programs for retired workers, cooperating with labor education classes, assisting in various types of research, developing book lists on labor subjects and arranging special reading-discussion groups.

"Librarians must meet the needs of the labor union members if the slogan of the ALA Conference 'Libraries for All' is to be meaningful," Rogin said.

Roberta McBride of the Detroit Public Library is chairman of the Labor Committee.

Cement Union Wins Raises For 27,000

Chicago—The Cement Workers have reached agreement on new two-year contracts with cement producers that represent a "major breakthrough" on wages and fringe benefits for 27,000 production and maintenance workers in 135 U.S. plants, according to Pres. Felix C. Jones.

After 2.5 months of "hard bargaining" with all major producers and numerous single-plant managements, the union secured wage increases of six cents an hour this year, eight cents more next May 1; the union shop, use of the union label on all union products, and an agreement to set up a joint wage study plan by the end of 1962.

Employers agreed to pay worker health and welfare plan costs, raised sick and accident benefits from $50 a week to $55, granted an eighth paid holiday, and added language to protect workers against the effects of automation.

Research Report Puts Jobs First:

Full Employment Seen as Key To Increased U.S. Growth Rate

The question of jobs for a growing labor force in the 1960s is one of the most important issues of domestic economic policy and, until it is answered, there can be no certainty about America's growth potential, the AFL-CIO has warned.

Available evidence indicates the nation has a normal potential for a high growth rate of 5 percent a year, according to Labor's Economic Review, prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and published in the July issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

The Review defended the estimate of a 5 percent growth potential, along with the similar 4.7 percent estimate of the National Planning Association, as contrasted to the 3.5 percent estimate of the President's Council of Economic Advisers and the lower estimates of some business groups.

"If the economy grows only 3.5 percent a year, when increases in the labor force and productivity make it possible for the economy to expand about 5 percent a year," the article said, "the slow growth rate is achieved at the cost of labor displacement and rising unemployment."

The Review cited the 2.6 percent growth between 1959 and 1960, when the total national production of goods and services rose from $490.6 billion to $503.2 billion. The population, however, also increased—by 1.6 percent—to nearly 180 million. This meant a net gain of only 1 percent in additional goods and services.

A 'Tiny' Gain

The Review pointed out that national output gained from $2,770 per person in 1959 to $2,797 in 1960. This meant, it added, "a tiny additional margin" of $27 per man, woman and child for improvements in defense, education, public services and living conditions.

"There are great needs for improvements in national defense, education, health care, homebuilding and urban redevelopment, mass transportation, community facilities and roads, conservation and development of natural resources," the Review declared.

"There is the need to lift the living conditions of the one-fifth of American families who live in substandard conditions and to answer the urgent requests for economic and technical aid from the less developed countries of the world."

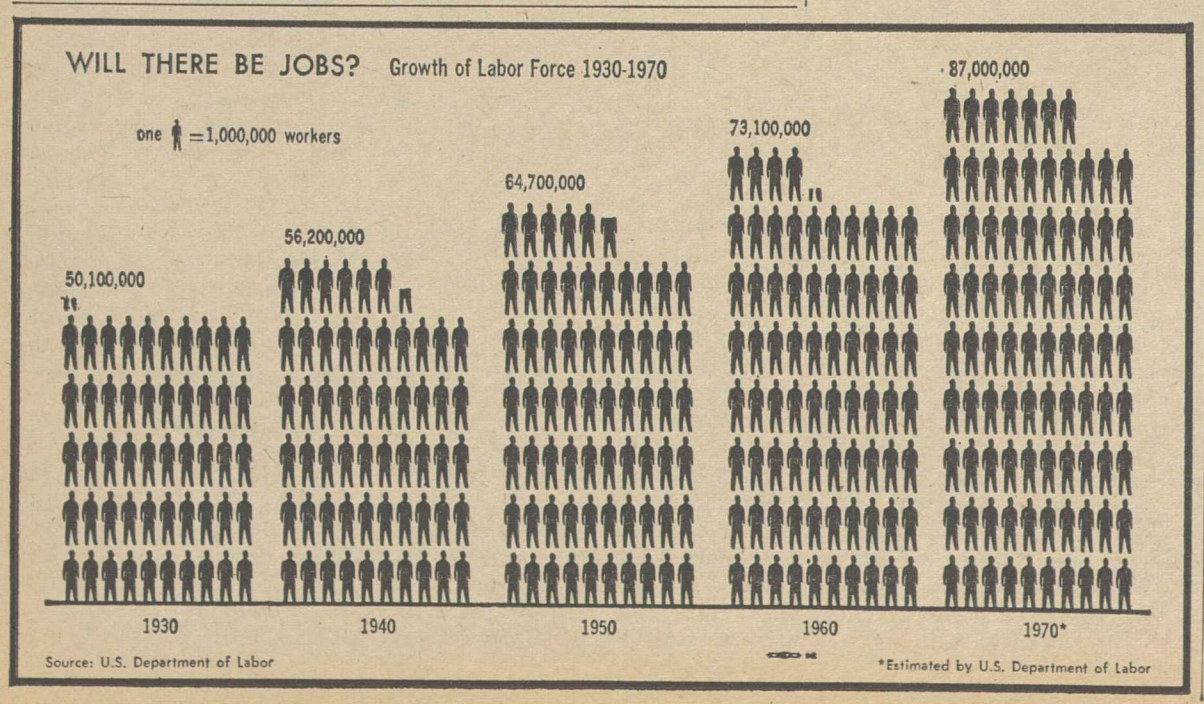
These needs and a rising living standard cannot be met on a margin of 1 percent a year, it added. For these purposes alone, the Review said a gain of 2.5 to 3 percent, or $12.5 billion to $15 billion annually, is required. And, since the population is expected to increase about 1.6 percent to 1.8 percent a year, an annual growth rate of 5 percent is necessary, the article said.

The AFL-CIO said America is fortunate in having all the factors which make for a high growth rate. The basic factors, the Review noted, are a growing labor force and expanding employment, which increase total manhours of work, and rising productivity, which increases output per manhour.

The Review then posed what it called the most important domestic economic policy questions: Will America's growing labor force and rapidly rising productivity be used to a maximum degree? Will there be jobs for a growing labor force?

"A sustained and continuing rise of sales and production is needed," contended the Review, "to provide the basis for full employment of our rapidly growing labor force and maximum use of our increasingly efficient plants and machines."

The Review said government policies should provide the environment for a balanced expansion of private investment and spending and of public investment in education, research, natural resources and community facilities as a key to growth and maximum use of manpower, plants and machines.



United Aircraft Named In Strike Cost Probe

A congressman has publicly accused the United Aircraft Corp. of trying to "stick" the public with $7.5 million of the cost of breaking a strike and has called for an investigation by Navy Sec. John B. Connally and the House Armed Services Committee.

Rep. Frank Kowalski (D-Conn.) made public a report by U.S. Comptroller Gen. Joseph Campbell that the company is seeking reimbursement for "excess" costs incurred on a Navy contract during a strike of 30,000 members of the Machinists and Auto Workers between June 8 and Aug. 9, 1960, at its Pratt & Whitney aircraft engine plants in Connecticut.

Campbell has agreed to furnish a similar report on Hamilton Standard Division plants of the company, and Kowalski has asked for a report on strike costs at United's Sikorsky Division plants—all struck at the same time.

'Patently Unfair'

"It seems to be patently unfair," Kowalski said, "that the taxpayers of the United States should be asked to bear such costs."

He asked Chairman Carl Vinson (D-Ga.) of the Armed Services Committee to conduct an investigation to determine:

- Whether payment of such strike costs can be prevented by department regulations.
- Whether additional legislation is needed to "curb the outflow of tax money" for such purposes.

In his home state, Kowalski heard complaints from union members that the big aircraft company was trying to get the government to foot the bill for high overtime costs during the strike period.

He asked the comptroller general on Feb. 2 to find if the best interests of the government, and its taxpayers, had been protected during the strikes and afterward.

Campbell reported verbally in May, and in writing late in June, that UAC had asked to be reimbursed for excess overtime costs, for training new employes, for spoiled work, and for "help wanted" advertising during the nine-week walkout.

Pratt & Whitney plants in Connecticut continued to operate during the strike advertising extensively for new employes. The firm also conducted an intensive "back to work" advertising campaign that brought some strikers into the plants while picket lines were still operating.

The company had government contracts for aircraft engines and spare parts, furnished under fixed-price "incentive" contracts. The contracts provided for negotiation of prices including an estimated cost and a basic profit at the start of each year and an upward or downward adjustment of the profit at the end of each year.

Other Details

The comptroller general's report, described by IAM Counsel P. E. Papps as "history-making" because such financial data never had been furnished before, gave these additional contract details:

- The company agreed with the unions in settling the strike that it would maintain a "preferred hiring list" until Jan. 1, 1961. Company records showed a net increase of 526 factory employes in the four months before Jan. 1, but a net gain of 461 during Jan. 1961 alone, immediately after the preference to former employes had run its course.
- Nearly $2 million of the $7.5 million asked by the company is for extra overtime pay, an increase of 70 percent over original estimates.
- During Jan. 1961, worker training costs totaled $113,000, an increase of about $43,000 over the average cost of training for the preceding four months.
- The company spent $109,365 for help wanted ads in 1960. More than half this amount—$58,951—was spent during the strike.

"It seems obvious," Kowalski said, "that the company paid out large amounts in overtime pay in the months following the strike to avoid rehiring strikers."

In Connecticut, the executive board of the state AFL-CIO called on all the state's senators and congressmen to join Kowalski in fighting the "strike subsidy." UAW Local 1234, in newspaper ads published in dailies in Bridgeport, Hartford, Meriden and Waterbury, Conn., urged taxpayers to write their legislators opposing such subsidies.

Three Named to Social Security Unit

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has appointed three new members to the AFL-CIO Committee on Social Security to fill vacancies.

New members are Pres. Gordon M. Freeman, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Pres. Karl F. Feller, Brewery Workers; and Vice Pres. Joseph W. Ramsey, Machinists.

Pres. Maurice Hutcheson of the Carpenters is chairman of the 17-member committee.

Key Legislatures Fail on Redistricting

1962 Congressional Elections Seen Completely Unpredictable

blocked by referendum. Hawaii, Michigan, Ohio and Texas will each elect an additional representative-at-large.

The Democrats are expected to gain heavily from California's redistricting which may give them between six and eight new seats added to their existing 16. Their big loss will be in New York where the Republican legislature is expected to reshuffle districts so as to cut the 22-member Democratic delegation by five and add three GOP seats to the present 21.

Following is a state-by-state report, based on a Congressional Quarterly analysis supplemented by reports from state AFL-CIO central bodies:

ALABAMA (9D) loses 1. No final action taken on reapportionment. Legislature still in session. House-passed bill combining districts of Reps. Albert Rains (D) and Kenneth A. Roberts (D) has met strong opposition in Senate.

ARIZONA (1D, 1R) gains 1. Under 1947 stand-by law, 1st District represented by John J. Rhodes (R) remains unchanged but 2nd District, represented by Morris K. Udall (D), is divided into southern and northern parts. Congressional Quarterly sees Udall favored to hold his seat with possible GOP pickup of new district. Population of Rhodes' unchanged district will be more than other two districts combined.

ARKANSAS (6D) loses 2. Legislature passed redistricting bill putting Wilbur D. Mills, chairman of House Ways & Means Committee and a congressman since 1935, in the same district with Dale Alford, who was first elected in 1958 as a write-in candidate against the long-time incumbent, Brooks Hays. In south Arkansas, Oren Harris, chairman of House Interstate & Foreign Commerce Committee, was placed in same district as Mrs. Catherine D. Norrell.

If referendum petition pushed by three counties objecting to the realignment of districts holds up, the state's four seats will be filled at large. The State AFL-CIO reports, however, that there is a possibility that either a special election will be called to vote on the redistricting referendum or that a special session of the legislature will pass a new redistricting bill.

CALIFORNIA (16D, 14R) gains 8. The Democratic legislature took a lesson from the Republicans who, after the 1950 census, redistricted the state to confine Democratic votes in as few districts as possible. The Democrats are expected to pick up between six and eight new congressional seats.

FLORIDA (7D, 1R) gains 4. An effort to keep the state's growing Republican voting strength confined was only one of a number of factors involved in the legislature's redistricting. State and local political rivalries entered into the picture also. The reshuffle finds districts ranging in population from 241,000 to 660,000. All incumbents are considered safe in their realigned districts, but the GOP is given a good chance of picking up at least one of the new seats.

HAWAII (1D) gains 1. The legislature adjourned without acting on districting, thus leaving both seats to be filled at large in 1962.

ILLINOIS (14D, 11R) loses 1. The legislature, divided between a Republican Senate and a Democratic House, adjourned without redistricting, thus seeming to force at-large election of the state's 24-member delegation. However, there is a strong possibility of agreement at a special session.

The Republicans, who have been insisting that the Democrats give up a Chicago district, are considered in a somewhat better bargaining position since most observers give them the edge—at least at the moment—in a state at-large race. Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen, a proven GOP vote-getter, will be heading the ticket.

IOWA (2D, 6R) loses 1. The Republican legislature lumped together the state's two Democratic congressmen into one firmly Democratic district, leaving the other districts to the GOP.

KANSAS (1D, 5R) loses 1. The Republican legislature combined the district of the state's lone Democrat, J. Floyd Breeding, with that of Republican Robert Dole, making the new district—50,000 square miles—one of the largest in area in the nation and 24 percent above the same average in population. To give the GOP an edge, the legislature took away a county which gave Breeding a sizeable plurality in 1960 and assigned it to a safely Republican district. The legislature also divided up heavily Democratic Wyandotte County, which includes Kansas City, between two otherwise solidly Republican districts.

KENTUCKY (7D, 1R) loses 1. The legislature does not meet until 1962.

MAINE (3R) loses 1. The Republican legislature put a conservative congressman, Peter A. Garland, in the same district with moderate Rep. Stanley R. Tupper so as to give a slight edge to Garland.

MARYLAND (6D, 1R) gains 1. The Democratic legislature divided the state's largest district to produce an extra Democratic seat but left unchanged a population imbalance of two districts with more than 600,000 and four below 300,000. A referendum, sparked by League of Women Voters' petitions, will bring about an at-large election for the extra seat unless the legislature passes a new law next year.

MASSACHUSETTS (8D, 6R) loses 2. The Democratic-controlled legislature adjourned after setting up a special redistricting committee which is to report early in 1962. Republican Gov. John A. Volpe would be able to veto a redistricting bill but might hesitate if a statewide at-large election seemed likely to result in a sweep for the Democrats.

MICHIGAN (7D, 11R) gains 1. With the Republicans in control of the legislature and a Democratic governor holding veto power, no action on redistricting was taken this year and none is expected in the 1962 session. The seat would then be filled at large. At present a Michigan Republican-held district, the 12th, is the nation's smallest in population with under 200,000.

MINNESOTA (3D, 6R) loses 1. The conservative Senate passed a redistricting bill favoring the Republicans; the liberal House bill would have aided the Democrats. No agreement was reached and, barring an unexpected special session, all eight seats will be filled at large. The 1960 vote for congressional candidates was divided almost equally—760,000 for Democratic candidates and 750,000 for Republicans.

MISSISSIPPI (6D) loses 1. The legislature does not meet until next year.

MISSOURI (9D, 2R) loses 1. The Democratic legislature put two Democratic congressmen, Richard H. Ichord and Morgan M. Moulder, in the same district but weakened Republican strength in the suburban St. Louis district represented by Thomas B. Curtis (R) by adding several new Democratic areas.

NEBRASKA (4R) loses 1. Districts of Reps. Ralph F. Beermann and Phil Weaver, both Republicans, were combined.

NEW JERSEY (6D, 8R) gains 1. Democrats seem certain of gaining an additional seat as the split legislature agreed to make a separate district out of industrial Middlesex County, which includes Perth Amboy. The action also makes more firmly Republican two adjoining districts.

NEW YORK (22D, 21R) loses 2. The Republican-controlled legislature, early next year, is expected to reduce New York City Democratic districts, combine two Democratic districts upstate and add new Republican districts in fast-growing Long Island. The result is likely to be a Democratic loss of five seats and a Republican gain of three.

NORTH CAROLINA (11D, 1R) loses 1. The legislature put the state's lone Republican, Charles R. Jonas, in the same district as Democrat A. Paul Kitchin but growing GOP strength may allow the Republicans to hold the seat and possibly pick up another.

OHIO (7D, 16R) gains 1. No action taken by legislature so additional seat will be filled at large.

PENNSYLVANIA (14D, 16R) loses 3. The closely-divided legislature has not yet been able to agree on redistricting. A chief obstacle is Democratic unwillingness to agree to cut Philadelphia's congressional delegation from six to five. If the stalemate continues through this session and in the 1962 legislature, all 27 seats would be filled at large.

TEXAS (21D, 1R) gains 1. The Democratic legislature was unable to avoid the risk of a second GOP seat since Republican Rep. Bruce Alger's Dallas area district, with 952,000 population, is the largest in the state and the third largest in the nation. As a result, the extra seat will be filled at large.

WEST VIRGINIA (5D, 1R) loses 1. Democrat Cleveland M. Bailey and Republican Arch A. Moore were put in the same district and the outcome is rated a toss-up. While the Democrats have a registration edge, Moore has proven a powerful vote-getter. The Democratic legislature also added a bloc of Democratic voters to another closely-divided district represented by Democrat Ken Hechler.

ILLINOIS GOV. OTTO KERNER (D), seated, signs bill establishing the largest increase ever made in the state's workmen's compensation benefits and hands his pen to Illinois State AFL-CIO Pres. Reuben G. Soderstrom. Standing, left to right, are: State Director of Labor Robert Johnston, Soderstrom, Assistant Labor Dir. Samuel C. Bernstein, and Harold A. Katz, special attorney for the state labor federation. The bill will boost benefits an estimated $9 million during the next two years.

Delaware Legislature Hikes Jobless Benefits

Wilmington, Del.—The Delaware legislature has passed a labor-backed bill raising maximum unemployment compensation from $40 to $50 a week and permitting workers laid off from their job to collect holiday and vacation pay due them without reduction of jobless benefits.

The bill, which had bipartisan support, also entitles workers involuntarily retired but still in the job market to receive full unemployment benefits if their retirement pension does not exceed $50 a week. Thereafter, benefits are reduced $1 for each dollar their weekly pension exceeds $50.

Another labor-backed bill—improving Delaware's workmen's compensation program—has been signed by Gov. Elbert N. Carvel (D) despite opposition from business groups.

The workmen's compensation amendments give the worker the right to inspect medical records kept by his employer or insurance carrier, provide that any fees for medical witnesses used by an injured worker to establish his eligibility for benefits are to be paid by the employer if the worker wins a compensation award, and give the injured worker the right to select a doctor of his choice.

In other states, legislative actions not covered in the AFL-CIO News survey in the July 15 issue, or erroneously reported, include the following:

- The Ohio legislature enacted a labor-supported anti-discrimination bill dealing with public accommodations, placing enforcement under the State Civil Rights Commission. Also enacted was a law prohibiting job discrimination because of age. The state already has a basic fair employment law.

Also in Ohio, the legislature appropriated $200,000 for a program for retraining jobless workers similar to the federal legislation now pending in Congress. A 10-member committee will administer the program.

- In Illinois, a compromise 75-cent minimum wage bill failed of final passage. The graveyard was the same Senate Industrial Affairs Committee which earlier had killed a $1 minimum wage proposal.

The AFL-CIO News had reported on the basis of an inaccurate report that the 75-cent bill had been enacted. While it passed the lower house with bipartisan support, it was blocked in the Republican-controlled Senate committee on a straight party-line vote during the final days of the session. Illinois at present has no statutory minimum wage.

- Kansas, which previously had a fair employment law without enforcement powers, improved its anti-discrimination program by giving the state's Anti-Discrimination Commission the right to issue a cease-and-desist order if conciliation efforts fail and to seek court enforcement of the order. The procedure represents a compromise from the original labor-backed bill. However, the Kansas action brings to 21 the number of states with enforceable fair employment laws.

1932 At-Large Elections Saw Democratic Sweep

Not since 1932 have major states elected their entire congressional delegations at-large. In that year four states which lost seats—Kentucky, Minnesota, Missouri and Virginia—failed to pass redistricting bills before the 1932 elections. By the time of the 1934 elections, however, all four states had returned to election by separate congressional districts.

Here's how the 1932 elections turned out:

- Kentucky, which previously had nine Democrats and two Republicans, elected an all-Democratic nine-member delegation.
- Minnesota, with nine Republicans and one Farm-Labor representative in the previous Congress, returned a split delegation made up of five Farmer-Laborites, three Republicans and one Democrat.
- Missouri replaced 12 Democrats and four Republicans with 13 Democrats.
- Virginia elected nine Democrats to succeed nine Democrats and one Republican.

Generally, the votes in the five states reflected a pattern of Democratic congressional victories that year, which saw the party gain 90 seats in the House of Representatives.

Social Security Key To Issue, House Told need for the program "urgent and pressing."

It would be financed, he said, by a three-quarters of 1 percent tax increase upon employers and employes. Specific benefits would include:

- Up to 90 days of hospital care a year with the beneficiary paying $10 per day for the first nine days.
- Up to 180 days of necessary nursing home services following hospital confinement for an illness.
- Up to 240 home-health-service visits and additional diagnostic benefits with the patient paying $20 toward each diagnostic study.

Charging that the American Medical Association, which has bitterly opposed the Anderson-King bill, was employing a "bogeyman" in its attacks, Ribicoff said the AMA had "misled" its own members and "played loose with the facts" by branding the program as "socialized medicine."

Meany told the committee that he himself discussed the AMA's "advertised objections" to the bill only with reluctance because of his respect for the medical profession.

The fact remains, he said, that the AMA's advertising "has taken a really extreme position" in describing the Anderson-King bill as one to "inject the government into every consultation room, deprive Americans of free choice of doctors, to dictate the pattern of health care."

The leaders of the medical profession are "intelligent and well-informed" and obviously "know that these charges are without foundation," he continued. The issue involved in the bill "is too important for the tactics of college debaters or for the techniques of Madison Ave."

Meany said the judgment of Congress on the Anderson-King bill should be based on a decision on three factors—whether a problem exists in regard to medical costs to older people, whether effective remedies are available outside the social security system, and whether the proposed plan of the bill is sound and workable.

Numerous government and private studies, the AFL-CIO president said, had certified the reality of the old-age medical problem.

These included, he pointed out, the White House Conference on Aging held just last January, which through its panel on income maintenance declared that commercial insurance, old age assistance and other devices "will continue to fall short of meeting the basic medical care needs of the aged as a whole."

A study published by the Brookings Institution, he continued, recently pointed out that the medical costs of the aged appeared to average about one-third of their income, whereas existing insurance plans provided no more than one-sixth of the coverage for those who carried policies and met "only about one-fourteenth of the total medical costs for the aged as a whole."

The Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans have built-in obstacles, Meany said, and even union-sponsored health plans have found themselves unable to meet the cost of providing hospitalization of their own retired members.

He praised the Kerr-Mills Act of 1960, which expanded federal old-age assistance for medical purposes, as "a desirable and indeed a necessary supplement" to the Anderson-King program.

This aid is based on a "means test," he said, that in most cases is applied very strictly. A high proportion of the "needy" who qualify under the Kerr-Mills program, he declared, "were forced into that unhappy position by the medical bills they have already paid. This is a post-mortem approach to living people."

Most states, Meany continued, have failed to appropriate matching funds to make the Kerr-Mills program fully effective, and in any case the program is no substitute for a social security measure.

The Anderson-King bill, he emphasized, would insure retired workers against the threat of heavy medical costs in old age in "exactly the same way" it now insures workers against "total loss of income."

"Every worker, and his employer, would put aside a modest sum each week to create a fund that would pay a substantial part of his medical expenses after he retires," Meany continued.

"Now what in the world is wrong with that?"

Under such a program, the federation president said, "we have the truly broad group, the truly equal division of risks, that is basic in any workable insurance plan. Here we have the young protecting against their old age—the very first commandment in the decalogue of every insurance salesman."

Thanks to repeated actions of Congress, the number of people not included in the social security system "grows smaller each year," Meany pointed out.

The program of the Anderson-King bill would grant medical benefits to all included in the social security system.

In one way or another, Meany said, all of us have to pay the bill for medical programs—whether it be under the Kerr-Mills assistance bill with its "means test" or whether we are paying for a system based upon an "earned right" instead of one "based upon a pauper's oath."

The bill before the committee is one "about the personal well-being of men and women—those who are retired, those who are about to retire, those who are barely beginning their working lives, and everyone in between. For the sake of all these people—of all Americans—we hope you will act upon it favorably."

Prominent Doctors Break with AMA To Support Kefauver's Drug Bill

Prominent physicians, including two members of the American Medical Association's Council on Drugs, have told Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) that he is prescribing the correct legislative medicine for the misleading claims and high prices of many prescription drugs.

The physicians, testifying before the Senate Anti-Trust subcommittee, endorsed key provisions of a bill by Kefauver and Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.) which would:

- Require the Food & Drug Administration to certify that new drugs are effective, as well as harmless.
- Compel drug manufacturers to provide doctors with more extensive and candid information as to potentially harmful side-effects of drugs recommended for various ailments.
- Provide for federal licensing and inspection of drug manufacturing plants as a step toward giving physicians greater confidence in prescribing by generic rather than the often more expensive brand names.
- Make restrictive patent agreements unlawful.

Testimony in support of the Kefauver-Celler bill by experts in various fields of medicine followed a sharp clash between Kefauver and spokesmen for the American Medical Association who lined up organized medicine on the side of the pharmaceutical manufacturers in opposing tighter government regulation of the drug industry.

Kefauver charged that the AMA relaxed its standards for accepting advertising in its Journal in 1955 after a survey by a public relations firm showed that drug manufacturers were unhappy over what they considered the over-strict standards applied. Up until then, all drugs advertised in the AMA Journal were required to have the Seal of Acceptance of the AMA's Council on Drugs.

After the Seal of Acceptance was dropped and standards for advertising relaxed, Kefauver said, advertising revenue from the 22 biggest drug firms nearly doubled.

The AMA spokesmen—Dr. H. H. Hussey, chairman of the board of trustees, and Dr. E. B. Howard, assistant executive vice president—denied that advertising standards had been lowered to attract more advertising. They said the AMA rejects about 85 percent of all ads offered.

When subcommittee staff members quoted apparently misleading claims for drugs in advertising in the AMA Journal, Howard commented:

"We do not require in advertising copy . . . the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth."

Other witnesses before the subcommittee were less tolerant of the drug industry's claims.

- Dr. Charles D. May, professor of pediatrics at the New York University Medical Center and a member of the AMA's 14-man Council on Drugs, criticized "extravagant" claims for new drugs and charged that the industry's "hectic" promotion of "unwarranted" products may subject patients to "illogical and excessive" use of drugs.
- Dr. Louis S. Goodman, chairman of the Dept. of Pharmacology at the University of Utah College of Medicine and a member of the Council on Drugs, said he was puzzled by the fact that the AMA didn't consult the council before taking a stand in opposition to the Kefauver-Celler bill.

"The AMA deserves credit for having experts on its council," he testified. "I only wish they would make use of us."

- Dr. David P. Barr, president of the Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York, said drug firms push up prices by misusing patents, advertising extravagantly and besieging doctors with incompletely described drugs.
- Dr. Louis Lasagna of Johns Hopkins University charged that some drug companies try new products on human beings "simply because bypassing toxicity tests on laboratory animals saves time and money."
- Dr. William B. Bean of Iowa State University's School of Medicine said highly advertised drugs are likely to cost many times more than identical drugs sold under generic or chemical names.
- Dr. Allan M. Butler, prominent Detroit pediatrician, testified on behalf of the Physicians Forum that the AMA leadership "certainly does not speak" for thousands of doctors who daily face "excessive drug costs and irresponsible advertising."

Stiffer Welfare Disclosure Law Winning Support in Congress

Bipartisan support is gaining in Congress for amendments to put teeth in the 1958 welfare and pension plan disclosure law and protect the equity of workers in some $48 billion in assets.

A House Labor subcommittee unanimously approved a bill requiring more detailed reports from the administrators of over 188,000 welfare and pension plans. The measure also would empower the Labor Dept. to investigate reports which appear fraudulent or inaccurate, to seek out unreported plans and to refer to the Justice Dept. suspected cases of theft or kickbacks.

The AFL-CIO testified before the House subcommittee in support of the original Administration-backed bill sponsored by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.). The federation has supported strong amendments since 1958, when a strict reporting bill, sponsored by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) and passed by the Senate, was watered down in the House.

The 1958 law made the Labor Dept. the custodian of pension and welfare reports but made no provision for determining whether the reports were accurate or for looking into suspected violations.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, following an appearance before the House subcommittee headed by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), submitted a supplementary report stressing the lack of safeguards in the 1958 law.

He pointed out his agency now has no authority to find out whether reports are filed or, if filed, are accurate.

"This system obviously gives no protection to the workers whose present and future welfare is to a great extent tied to these funds," Goldberg added.

The House subcommittee bill would not grant the full powers requested by the Administration.

It would empower the Labor Dept. to investigate welfare plan reports only after receiving complaints and then after determining "reasonable cause."

The Labor Dept., however, would have new power to subpoena witnesses, look into reports on file and trace administrators failing to report. It could seek court injunctions to compel compliance with the law. Embezzlement of funds would be punishable by a $10,000 fine or five years imprisonment or both. A briber or bribe-taker could be jailed for three years or fined $10,000 or both.

Joblessness Near 7% Level For 8th Successive Month

NLRB Kills 'Penalty' Layoff Plan

A major blow has been struck by the National Labor Relations Board against the use of "superseniority" promises to strikebreakers hired during an economic work stoppage.

In a decision of wide-ranging importance, the board ruled unanimously in the Erie Resistor Corp. case that it was an unfair labor practice to award 20 years of arbitrary "seniority" to strikebreakers, or to former strikers who returned to work during the walkout, and to apply this 20-year preference clause in determining later layoffs.

"In our opinion," the board said, "superseniority is a form of discrimination extending far beyond the employer's right of replacement" of economic strikers to carry on his business, adding that it is "in direct conflict" with the law prohibiting discrimination against union members.

The case involved Local 613 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Erie, Pa., and the Erie company, manufacturer of electronic components and custom-molded plastics.

Upon expiration of a contract and failure to negotiate a new agreement, the union called a strike Mar. 31, 1959. During the strike period, the company adopted a policy granting 20-year seniority to new employes hired as strike replacements and 20 years additional seniority to laid-off employes and strikers who returned to work. The union terminated the strike June 25, 1959.

In the course of economic layoffs which later followed, many strikers who had been recalled were among the first to lose their jobs solely as a result of the superseniority plan. The union filed charges of discrim-

Rise Shown In Long-Idle Workers

By Robert B. Cooney

Unemployment remained at a high level in July for the eighth straight month, the government has reported, while the ranks of the long-term jobless increased slightly.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg released summary job figures which showed unemployment fell by 440,000 between June and July to 5.1 million while employment remained about the same as in June.

The decline in joblessness, however, was described as seasonal, and "concentrated among the young persons who had entered the labor market in June," which left the key seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment at 6.9 percent. It was 6.8 percent last December.

The 6.9 percent rate, up from June's 6.8 percent, was the second highest for the month in the postwar period. It was exceeded only by the 7.5 percent in the depths of the 1958 recession. In July 1960 the jobless rate was 5.5 percent.

The postwar lows for the month were 3.1 percent in 1951, 3.3 percent in 1952 and 2.7 percent in 1953.

An accompanying report on job conditions in the nation's 150 major employment centers showed "overall job gains" in nine-tenths of them but no change in the total classified as areas of labor surplus.

Areas with unemployment of 6 percent and over totaled 88

Schnitzler Urges Reforms:

'Strong' Law Asked To Guard Pensions

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO has renewed its plea to Congress to give the Secretary of Labor "strong powers" to uncover abuses in employe pension and welfare plans.

Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, in testimony before a Senate Labor subcommittee, called for "rigorous protection" of such funds by the federal government, whether they are jointly-administered by unions and management or controlled exclusively by either group. His testimony sharply challenged the position taken by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce that regulation of pension and welfare funds should be "left to the states."

Schnitzler said Administration-proposed amendments to the 1958 Welfare & Pension Plan Disclosure Act are urgently needed to protect the interests of "millions of wage and salary earners in the United States." The Administration bill has been sponsored by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), chairman of the subcommittee.

The AFL-CIO spokesman pointed out that the federation "was among the foremost proponents of strong and enforceable legislation" in 1958 but that the bill enacted at that time "amounted to little more than token legislation."

Declaring that the rapid growth of the number and size of trust funds also increases "opportunities for fast practices and embezzlement by unscrupulous administrators and trustees," Schnitzler called for new legislation "putting teeth into the 1958 law."

The Administration has asked for legislation to:

- Give the Secretary of Labor investigative and enforcement au-

Fund-Raising Reforms Given Labor Backing

New York—Fund-raising and financial reporting practices of the nation's 100,000 voluntary health and welfare agencies have been challenged in a report warning that failure to make needed reforms could result in a loss of public confidence.

Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, called the report "a step in the right direction" although it "does not go far enough."

The report resulted from a two-year study by a highly-qualified committee under a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation. Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers and Chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, was a member of the study group.

The committee found that "the great competition for the charity dollar has resulted in the failure of too many voluntary agencies to present a fair, balanced picture of their activities."

Unions Aid Charleston Flood Victims

Charleston, W. Va. — State AFL-CIO leaders and members moved quickly to help victims of this city's flash floods which claimed 22 lives and caused total destruction or damage to some 1,600 homes.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Miles C. Stanley and Sec.-Treas. Benjamin W. Skeen rallied the West Virginia Building and Construction Trades Council, the Kanawha Valley Labor Council, and the Charleston Building and Construction Trades Council for meetings and surveys of the damaged areas, held with Red Cross disaster teams on the scene.

The state federation's Community Service Activities include labor representation on the Disaster Advisory Committee of the Red Cross and close liaison with the day-to-day activities of the 47 Red Cross staff members now on the job in the stricken community.

The state labor group formed the Kanawha Valley Disaster Fund and called on affiliates to solicit both union treasury and individual contributions. The money received is to be used "entirely and exclusively (on the basis of actual need as determined by the Red Cross) for the relief of victims."

Henry Gunesch, Red Cross liaison with AFL-CIO CSA, met with the state and local labor leaders in Charleston and assisted them in the development of the program.

Meany Urges Full Support of Aid Bill

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in identical letters to all members of the Senate, has reiterated full support of the Administration's long-term foreign aid program, which he called "the most important issue that will face the 87th Congress."

"The future of freedom in America, and of free men everywhere, depends upon the successful passage of this measure," Meany said.

The "keystone" of the bill, the federation president urged, "is the request for authority for long-term Treasury financing."

Its enactment, he said, "will help insure a well-planned, much-needed program of aid to the underdeveloped nations which hold the balance of political power in the world today."

UAW 'Welcomes' Offer From American Motors

Detroit—The Auto Workers have "welcomed" a contract counter-offer from American Motors Corp.—the first offer from any auto maker since negotiations started late in June—and expressed the hope that other major motor firms will present affirmative proposals.

American offered the UAW a 10 percent profit-sharing plan and annual pay increases of 7 cents an hour in a three-year contract. The union called the profit-sharing plan a "welcome step" and promised an answer when negotiations resume Aug. 22, but declined to accept a company proposal to drop cost-of-living and annual improvement factor clauses from the new contract.

The Auto Workers said little progress has been made in negotiations with Ford, Chrysler or GM.

The UAW has served notice on GM of its intent to terminate the existing contract at midnight Aug. 31. Three hours after the union took that action, the company notified the UAW that it also wished to terminate, and sent a similar termination notice to the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, representing about 25,000 GM employes.

UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock told a press conference in Washington, D. C., that the union has not decided whether to seek a National Labor Relations Board order compelling GM to answer questions about the company's price-profit formula.

"When GM officials say our proposals would lead to a price increase but refuse to furnish the figures on which it bases that conclusion, they put the union in an impossible position," Woodcock said.

"The union cannot make an intelligent determination as to whether or not a strike is necessary when the contract expires Aug. 31. The law says we are entitled to information we have asked for."

Woodcock recalled that on Jan. 14, 1946, the NLRB issued a complaint accusing GM of an unfair labor practice because it had shifted its position during bargaining, but the UAW did not press the point when a new contract was arrived at.

The union has asserted that GM profits have run 26 percent on the average over a period of several years and could be reduced to approximately 15 percent without raising prices to give its 300,000 hourly rated workers some measure of equity with salaried workers.

'Truth in Lending' Urged To Restore Confidence

The "truth in lending" bill sponsored by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) and 20 other senators would "do much to restore public confidence" in installment buying, Administrative Director Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has told Congress.

Clayman told a Senate Banking subcommittee that consumer credit has become so vital to the nation's economic health that it must be "treated with a respect commensurate" with its position as an important economic indicator.

His counsel backed up earlier testimony by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, who gave the bill full support from the federation and told the subcommittee that borrowers and buyers should be "let in on the secret of how much any given credit commitment" will cost.

Clayman warned: "If the consumer loses faith in this institution, and it is permitted to degenerate into a vehicle for the exploitation of the public rather than an instrument by which our citizens share more fully in the resources of our country, the results could be catastrophic."

The Douglas bill would require sellers and lenders to give buyers an accurate statement of total finance charges and annual interest rates. It has the endorsement of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Referring to earlier testimony about exploitation of credit buyers' ignorance, Clayman said:

- When buyers know the total interest they are asked to pay, they will have a yardstick with which to compare the prices of competitors.
- Buyers who are given the true annual interest rate can decide whether to finance their purchases or use their savings.
- The bill will lead to the end of the "credit gougers"—those whose profits are "proportional to the amount of ignorance" they can exploit.

Eight Unions Participate in Safety Class

Students from eight international unions and two city central bodies have completed the second series of lessons in the safety training institute sponsored by the AFL-CIO and the Bureau of Labor Standards of the U.S. Dept. of Labor.

Jointly planned by the AFL-CIO Committee on Safety and Occupational Health and the bureau's Division of Safety, the course consists of four groups of lessons held at three-month intervals for union safety committeemen and officers.

The institute is held in Washington, D. C. The first series had classes in organizing and operating practical safety programs. The second, just ended, featured instruction in mechanical and physical safety. The section beginning Oct. 2 will cover chemical and environmental safety. The fourth and final unit will be a 30-hour instructors' institute.

No charge is made for classes, but each union affiliate pays for its students' room, board and transportation. Represented at the second institute were the Auto Workers, Carpenters, Communications Workers, Fire Fighters, Insurance Workers, Seafarers, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, and representatives from Chicago and the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO.

So many Carpenters enrolled for the second course that a special series of classes was held for them, according to Exec. Sec. John D. Connors of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety and Occupational Health.

State labor bodies and local unions will be encouraged to hold similar institutes at the state and regional level, Connors said.

A. McKeown Dies; Headed Hosiery Union

St. Petersburg, Fla.—Alexander McKeown, one of the founders of the Hosiery Workers and the union's president for 18 years prior to his retirement in 1957, died here July 10. He was 71.

McKeown, who lived in Philadelphia until his retirement, become president of Branch 1 in that city in 1927 and served until assuming the national post. He was Socialist candidate for mayor in 1931, and under the late Gov. Gifford Pinchot (R) was a member of the State Prison Welfare Board. His widow, Bertha, and a son, Courtney, survive.

Inter-American Advance:

Uruguay Workers Get Loan for Plant

An Inter-American Development Bank loan to a meat-packing workers' cooperative in Montevideo, Uruguay, has been hailed by Serafino Romualdi, AFL-CIO inter-American representative, as "an important and effective step in the fight against communism and for democracy" in Latin America.

The $640,000 loan, announced by the bank on Aug. 4, will furnish funds in both dollars and Uruguayan currency for the expansion and improvement of the packing plant operated by the cooperative.

The 4,000 workers involved are former employes of two plants closed down in 1958 by the Swift and Armour companies. The workers set up their cooperative, named the Establecimientos Frigorificos del Cerro (EFCSA), with the support of Uruguay's government to continue operations.

The Inter-American Bank, drawing the loan from its Fund for Special Operations, pointed out that "considerable advances" had been made in Uruguay's manufacturing industry but that the country was still "highly dependent" on meat raising and agriculture.

EFCSA, the workers' cooperative, handles close to 50 percent of the country's total meat exports, the bank said.

Romualdi, welcoming the bank's announcement of the loan, emphasized that the workers' cooperative had run the packing plants successfully but had been unable to expand to full productive capacity because of a lack of operating capital and insufficient commercial bank credit.

The AFL-CIO representative, who initiated talks with the Inter-American Bank in behalf of the cooperative and at the request of Uruguayan non-Communist labor forces, pointed out that the loan was justified both on social and economic grounds and also for "political reasons."

EFCSA, he declared, had been made a major target of attack by a packinghouse workers group known for pro-Communist tendencies, the president of which on several occasions visited Cuba as guest of Fidel Castro.

For several months, he declared, this group "carried on a violent campaign" against the proposed loan. The actual grant, he added, will have "a tremendous beneficial effect among the workers of Uruguay" and strengthen the position of the anti-Communist workers' federation, the Confederation Sindical del Uruguay (CSU).

Romualdi observed that the AFL-CIO Executive Council, in its meeting last June at Unity House, Pa., urged that U.S. policy toward Latin America be designed to promote "wide participation in and sharing of social and economic advances."

"A major means," the council declared, "is to provide loans for socially desirable projects to institutions affiliated with or sponsored by trade union organizations. Such loans are a sound means of opening needed additional private-institution channels for social development."

The council specifically commended the Inter-American Bank for consideration of a loan to the Uruguay meat-packing cooperative and cited several other projects, such as workers' housing cooperatives in Chile, Ecuador and other countries, as also under survey.

The Inter-American Bank said its present loan should be followed by measures to provide pastures and stock for the meat-packing cooperative, with the purchase of modern equipment for retail meat stores in the City of Montevideo as a third forward step.

Union Ratifies Settlement at Sinclair Oil

Denver, Colo.—Settlement of a strike of Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers against the Sinclair Oil Corp. has been approved by a majority of the 9,000 OCAW members involved.

The union withdrew its pickets from four Sinclair refineries and ended a strike that started June 20. The settlement provides that Sinclair will negotiate with the union on the amount of severance pay to be granted in case of future layoffs.

The severance issue was the major cause of the strike. Refinery workers and others walked out when management refused to agree to a change in its policy of making unilateral decisions on layoff pay. The agreement takes the issue out of the unilateral category, the union said.

NLRB Reports Rise in Back Pay, Rehirings

Back pay of $1.37 million was collected by National Labor Relations Board offices in fiscal 1961 for employes discharged or laid off in unfair labor practice cases, NLRB General Counsel Stuart Rothman has reported.

The back pay collections were up 20 percent over the level of fiscal 1960, and the number of employes offered reinstatement after illegal discharge was nearly double. Rothman said the NLRB in fiscal 1961—the year ended last June 30—also made further "significant reductions" in the time required to consider contested unfair labor practice cases—from 52 days to 45 days between the filing of a charge and issuance of a formal complaint.

The agency succeeded, the general counsel reported, in cutting the time from filing of a charge to the close of the hearing by 27 percent—from an average of 118 days to 86, an alltime record for speed.

Other details of the Rothman report are these:

- Because of board action and agreed settlements of charges filed with the NLRB, reinstatement was offered to 3,664 employes. That compares with 1,885 offered reinstatement in fiscal 1960.
- Of the employes offered reinstatement, 2,443 accepted, or approximately 67 percent. The remaining 1,221 declined to take their old job back.
- The unfair labor practice cases in fiscal 1961 numbered 12,115, an increase over the 1960 total but 1 percent below the record of 12,239 cases in 1959.

The total of unfair labor practice and representation election cases also reached an alltime peak of 22,675, Rothman said.

PTTI Affiliates Cooperate:

Union Teams to Survey Latin American Conditions

An unprecedented labor survey of Latin American economic and social conditions has been launched by teams of union members from the United States, Mexico, Argentina, Brazil and Colombia.

The survey teams, representing the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Intl., have been assigned to interview union members, government and church officials, embassy and consular representatives and leaders of private and public agencies about conditions affecting trade unionists.

Vice Pres. Ray Hackney of the Communications Workers was slated to visit Jamaica, Barbados and British Guiana as the Caribbean interviewer for PTTI, international trade union secretariat.

William C. Doherty, Jr., PTTI's inter-American representative, is heading for the office he maintains in Rio de Janeiro and will meet there with the other team members Aug. 14 for a series of conferences and the drafting of a final report, for release about Aug. 20.

Other team members are: for Mexico and Central America, Augustin Avecia of Mexico; for Panama and northwestern South America, Jorgè Acosta y Acosta of Colombia; for Argentina, Chile, Bolivia and Uruguay, Angel Bucci of the Argentine; in Brazil, Helcio Maghenzani of that country.

The survey, authorized by a recent inter-American conference of the PTTI, will produce information designed to be keyed to Pres. John F. Kennedy's "Alliance for Progress."

Meeting in Bogota, Colombia, in May, representatives of 50 PTTI affiliates in 23 Latin American countries voted to set up the "priorities for the future" committee which is now getting under way.

'Priorities' Unit Set Up

Copies of the PTTI survey have been distributed in the countries to be visited. It contains questions about the status of unions, their right to strike, forms of political action which are permitted, and contracts with employers.

A larger section deals with wage levels today and a few years ago; subsidiary benefits such as vacations, sickness allowances, and other forms of social security; social programs in the field of housing, transportation and education.

The questionnaire also calls for detailed data on average hourly wage rates, working hours per week, and vacations, bonuses, night and holiday wage premiums.

Another series of questions deals with the cost of food items, men's shirts, work clothes, rents. Others relate to the cost of telephone service, haircuts, dental work, movies, utilities.

The PTTI coordinating committee will meet in Rio for a review of the answers submitted and opinions expressed by those interviewed.

BEFORE THE HOUSE Ways & Means Committee, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged approval of the Anderson-King bill, for health care financed through the social security system, as "sound and necessary." It is the "only feasible means," he said, of preventing the cost of illness from "pauperizing" millions of retired citizens. Meany is shown, right, with Director Nelson H. Cruikshank of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Missile Base Disputes Drop to All-Time Low

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, after a two-day tour of major missile and space sites, reported newly-established machinery for settling disputes has helped reduce to "an all-time low" the man-days lost in work stoppage at the nation's 21 sites.

Goldberg announced his findings to a press conference before reporting to the White House.

"Of over one million man-days worked in the month of July in missile and space programs, only 209 man-days were lost," Goldberg said.

Calling this loss "infinitesimal," he said it figures out to two ten-thousandths of 1 percent in the ratio of man-days lost to total time worked.

Cites 'Dedicated Work'

Goldberg, who visited four of the most important sites, said "justifiable criticism has been leveled at the labor situation" at various sites. But, he added, "candor requires acknowledgment of the very outstanding and dedicated work" of all levels of government, the armed services, the manufacturers, the contractors and the workers at these "new frontiers."

Goldberg said his trip convinced him the new machinery for resolving disputes will enable missile and space site work to continue "without interruption" and achieve "value out of every dollar spent."

Pres. Kennedy created a Missile Sites Labor Commission, with Goldberg as chairman, about two months ago. In a letter to Goldberg in advance of the secretary's tour, Kennedy said the voluntary no-strike, no-lockout pledge given by labor and management indicate their desire "to do the job."

Warns of Delays

The nation, Kennedy added, "cannot afford the luxury of avoidable delays in our missile and space programs" and "neither can we tolerate wasteful and expensive practices."

Goldberg explained to reporters a few of the problems peculiar to missile site work.

He said sites are located in "out-of-the-way places" for reasons of security and that this creates recruiting problems. Workers must drive 50 to 90 miles to work and it is understandable, he said, that travel pay demands would be made, though this was not usual in private industry.

Trained personnel sometimes are recruited from a dozen states, creating housing problems, Goldberg said. Some workers must live in trailers and at high rents, he noted.

Jurisdictional problems also are created, he added, since the missile work brings together different crafts and employers.

What is impressive, he concluded, was that people are now discussing their differences while continuing the work.

More Accidents Seen If Rails Slash Crews

A spokesman for railroad workers has warned the Presidential Railroad Commission that decreasing the size of train crews "would cause a tragic surge in the accident rate among employes."

Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen told the tripartite commission which is studying railroad work rules disputes that "the number of employes killed and injured in railroad accidents is proof enough that constant safeguards must be maintained to prevent the lowering of safety standards and an accompanying increase in accidents."

Taking sharp exception to management demands for elimination of firemen-helpers in yard and freight service, Gilbert declared:

"The death of 10, 20, 30 or more men per year because only one man was operating a yard engine or because there was not a trained helper on a freight locomotive cannot be justified in the profit columns of railroad corporations."

Gilbert presented to the 15-man commission reports on 439 episodes in recent years where locomotive helpers were able to prevent or minimize railroad accidents. The reports were originally submitted as entries in the BLF&E safety award contest.

He said the incidents were characteristic of what happens daily on U.S. railroads but only a sampling of the many "near-misses" that are never reported as accidents because of the alertness of the cab crew.

The "near-misses," he said, "are a reality, if not a recordable statistic."

Gilbert's appearance before the commission wound up the first phase of the presentation of the union position by the five operating brotherhoods.

Referring to earlier testimony by working railroaders who described the importance to safety and operating efficiency of the fireman-helper, Gilbert declared:

"They told you enough of their experiences to demonstrate that every crew member has an important safety function. Elimination of any of these employes would create a void that would have a direct and serious effect on present safety standards."

Unions Urge Retention Of Navy's Gun Plant

Reactivation of the Naval Weapons Plant in Washington, D. C., and its use as an "essential part of our defense structure" has been urged on Pres. Kennedy and other government officials by Pres. James A. Brownlow of the Metal Trades Dept. of the AFL-CIO.

A famous plant—formerly the Naval Gun Factory—the facility has been ordered closed by early 1962 and now has only a third of the craftsmen who once engineered and developed new weapons, made jigs and fixtures for mass production by private manufacturers, and produced spare parts for existing weapons on short notice.

Brownlow reminded Kennedy, members of Congress and heads of the Defense establishment that the plant, with its complement of skilled workmen and machine tools, still represents an investment of many millions of dollars "and should be fully utilized."

Citing Kennedy's speech to the nation on the Berlin crisis and his program for increased military preparedness, the Metal Trades spokesman said the need for the plant under the pending emergency is obvious.

"This plant and its employes can make a major contribution to the President's program in addition to serving the economy of the area and the thousands of employes who are being compelled to seek jobs in other areas," Brownlow said.

It would be better, he said, to use the facilities available in the nation's capital rather than "duplicating them elsewhere at tremendous cost" in materials and manpower.

Similar appeals were sent to the President and others by William H. Ryan, president of Machinists District 44 representing IAM lodges of government employes.

Goldberg Invites Views On Revision of T-H

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg was scheduled to meet Aug. 4 with experts in labor-management relations to discuss revisions of the national emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Goldberg had been asked by Pres. John F. Kennedy to recommend changes for presentation to Congress. The study was planned as a result of Administration dissatisfaction with the limited 80-day injunction procedures that are now the only weapon available under Taft-Hartley.

Those invited to express their opinions include the following educators, judges, arbitrators and attorneys:

Justice Walter V. Schaefer of the Illinois Supreme Court; Dr. George W. Taylor, Wharton School of Finance, University of Pennsylvania; Prof. Robben Fleming, University of Illinois college of law; Prof. John T. Dunlop and Prof. James J. Healey, Harvard University; Prof. Nathan P. Feinsinger, University of Wisconsin law school.

Also David L. Cole, Paterson, N. J.; J. Albert Woll, AFL-CIO general counsel, and Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel; William B. Barton, general counsel, U.S. Chamber of Commerce; Charles A. Kothe, vice president, National Association of Manufacturers; Jesse Freidin and Peter Seitz, arbitrators.

Additional participants invited were: David Feller, counsel to the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Louis Sherman, general counsel of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; and Charles A. Horsky, Ralph T. Seward, Guy Farmer and Gerard D. Riley, lawyers.

IATSE Bars Strikes at Missile Bases

Ottawa, Ont.—A policy with strong safeguards against strikes has been laid down by the executive board of the Theatrical Stage Employes for members of the union who work as film cameramen, editors or in related crafts at U.S. missile launching areas.

Members of IATSE at Cape Canaveral "have never gone on strike," union Pres. Richard F. Walsh said during the executive board's semiannual meeting here. It was nevertheless the board's desire, he continued, "to take every possible precaution" during an international crisis that "threatens the destruction of democratic forms of government."

Hundreds at Canaveral

Hundreds of IATSE cameramen, laboratory technicians and specialists are employed at Cape Canaveral, the union pointed out, to track the flight of missiles and process films recording details of their launching and recovery. Movies also are taken by cameras mounted with the missiles themselves, and the films are essential to scientific studies for improvement of the program.

The safeguards against strikes approved by the board forbid IATSE members from striking in a missile area, or assisting any other union that might strike, without express permission from the international president, who in turn is forbidden to grant permission without prior approval of the executive board.

Conductors Name Wagner President

Cedar Rapids, Ia.—Directors of the Railway Conductors & Brakemen, unaffiliated with the AFL-CIO, have named Louis J. Wagner, Duluth, as president in place of James A. Paddock, who resigned because of illness.

Wagner had been senior vice president since 1958, later acting president. The board named Vice Pres. James E. Magill, Philadelphia, to take Wagner's previous post. Paddock, who has been under the care of a doctor since May 1, was named as a union adviser.

The Shadow Widens

THE SHADOW OF REVOLT—considerably bigger than a man's hand—is showing within the medical profession, a revolt by the rank and file of non-political doctors against the monolithic anti-social politicking of the American Medical Association's ruling hierarchy.

The AMA's president, Dr. Leonard W. Larson of North Dakota, went before the House Ways & Means Committee with a 91-page document flaying the pending Anderson-King bill as unneeded, misbegotten and the opening wedge to "socialized medicine."

This assault led Rep. Cecil King (D-Calif.), sponsor of the House bill for limited social security health care for the aged, to say that in all his years in Congress he "had never read a statement more damning in criticism of features not mentioned" in the bill itself. He labeled the AMA hierarchs "desperate men" forced to circulate inaccurate charges to defeat his measure.

The files of House and Senate members are filled with letters from individual physicians endorsing the Anderson-King bill—which is simply the extension of the tested social security system to the problem of providing limited protection against the financial catastrophe of illness in old age. But these letters say, "Please don't use my name." Why not? Because they fear political retaliation—in their county and state medical societies if not from the hierarchs themselves.

A spirit of rebelliousness against the blind opposition of the AMA ruling group is growing, nevertheless. From Palo Alto, Calif., Dr. Philip Randolph Lee told the House Ways & Means Committee that more than a quarter of physicians in the area now "openly and actively" support the principle of the Anderson-King bill while only a small percentage "actively" opposes it.

When the Bay Area Committee of physicians began an information program designed to counteract the party line of the AMA ruling group, it quickly gathered support. Physicians in a score of other cities are expressing interest, Dr. Lee told the committee, and it is "no wonder," he said, "that I should believe the leaders of the AMA have misinterpreted the feelings of physicians on this issue.' '

End of Sloganeering

PRES. KENNEDY AND DEFENSE SEC. Robert S. McNamara have made it clear that among their immediate objectives is the rebuilding of American military strength for "limited" and brush-fire wars—a radical change from the policy of the Eisenhower years, when the manpower and conventional-operations capacity of our armed forces were slashed again and again.

The slogans of the immediate past were "deterrent" power and "more bang for a buck."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany made an appeal for the reversal of the sloganeering when he testified last year before the platform committees of both Republican and Democratic national conventions.

"While we must be capable of 'massive retaliation,' we must also be capable of limited retaliation. No one in his right mind would put out a 'grass fire' war with an atomic bomb but by the same reasoning no one can allow the 'grass fire' war to spread for lack of adequate fire-fighting equipment, until it becomes a total world conflagration."

It will require time to rebuild what was frittered away, but the policy change has been declared by the Administration.

'This Is Good for What Ails You'

On Health Insurance Issue:

Biographer of Madison Refutes 'Misrepresentation' by AMA

In the continuous American Medical Association attacks on the pending social security health care bill (the Anderson-King Bill), the AMA aroused the wrath of Irving Brant, a famous biographer of James Madison, who was third President of the United States and principal author of the Constitution.

Brant wrote a letter to the Washington Post in which he straightened out the AMA on the assumed beliefs of Madison and the false so-called issue of "socialized medicine." Herewith is his letter:

THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION has employed so many misrepresentations in its fight against federal health insurance for the aged that one might expect it to run out of new materials. On the contrary, in the AMA News of June 12, it caps the climax by dragging out James Madison's 1830 letter to House Speaker Andrew Stevenson on the meaning of the general welfare clause of the Constitution.

Madison's narrow construction of it, as limited to expenditures to carry out other enumerated powers, is treated as proof that he would regard the current health bill as something calculated to convert the United States from a federal republic into a "monolithic democracy."

If the AMA wants to know what Madison would think of the medical bill now before Congress, why waste time making tenuous deductions from what he said about a constitutional interpretation that was settled contrary to his views during his own lifetime? Why not inquire what he said and did in the actual field that the AMA miscalls "socialized medicine?"

Surely the AMA Advisory Committee, in its ransacking of history, has discovered that on Feb. 27, 1813, Pres. Madison signed "An Act to Encourage Vaccination" containing these opening words:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an agent to preserve the genuine vaccine matter, and to furnish the same to any citizen of the United States, whenever it may be applied for, through the medium of the post office."

Madison appointed as United States Vaccination Agent—the doctor—yes, the doctor—who suggested the idea, and gave him specific directions to spread the benefits as widely as he could throughout the United States. What does that leave of the AMA's contention that "under Madison's views . . . medical care would have been a state and not a national function?"

THE WHOLE social security and public health system of the United States stems constitutionally and socially from a remark Madison made in the Federal Convention of 1787, that one of the purposes in laying federal tonnage taxes was "the support of seamen."

To implement that power and responsibility, Congress within a decade made deductions from the wages of seamen to establish and maintain maritime hospitals. After the purchase of Louisiana Territory transferred control of the Mississippi river to the United States, the grand old State, Righter Thomas Jefferson signed a bill extending the tax and medical benefits to Mississippi river boatmen.

HISTORY, it is said, repeats itself. It does so remarkably in this very instance of the 1830 letter of James Madison to Speaker Stevenson. It is employed now to create an impression that Madison would have regarded federal health insurance as a portent of the nation's collapse.

It was used in 1832—two years after it was written—to make people believe that Madison regarded the protected tariff as unconstitutional.

On the present-day subject I would say to the reactionaries of the American Medical Association what Congressman John Quincy Adams (the former President) said to the Southern nullificationists in the House of Representatives:

"If you appeal to Mr. Madison as authority you must submit to his authority . . . The authority of Mr. Madison upon this question is against you; clearly and unequivocally against you. Not merely the authority of his name, but authority illustrated by lucid argument—by impregnable demonstration."

Morgan Says:

'Right-Wing Romanticists' See World Struggle as Ball Game

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

AN INTERESTING and important two-man debate has been going on almost unnoticed in the U.S. Senate. Its protagonists represent two strikingly different schools of thought on how we should approach world problems.

Sen. Goldwater of Arizona takes the tough, simple line of the cop or the football coach: you win by winning. If the enemy misbehaves you punish him. If he outsmarts you in the first half, you come back in the second and clobber him. None of this truce or scoreless tie stuff. What you want, and of course you get, is total victory.

Morgan

Sen. Fulbright of Arkansas takes the complicated line of the worried professor or the sensitive historian who isn't sure of all the answers. He collects a clutter of ideas that fits neatly into a fascinating jigsaw puzzle but is hard to sweep up into a bold, black headline.

In a Senate speech several weeks ago, Goldwater blasted Fulbright for representing what he interpreted as an "outmoded weak-kneed foreign policy which accomplishes nothing but more and greater losses of freedom's territory . . . [and is] a plea for more useless expenditures in the name of more hopeless objectives."

He scorned present Administration policy as resting "on theoretical dreaming that the way to fight Communist bullets is with relief packages, Communist tanks with plows, Communist bombs with elaborate charts for monetary reform." He demanded a policy committed to complete and total victory over the Communists.

He all but advocated by implication that we ought to go into Cuba and cook Castro's goose and let that "ephemeral something called world opinion," as he termed it, be damned. Goldwater's opinion of world opinion was particularly low because, in his view, it seemed to give the Communists more prestige and respect than it gives us.

IN A SHORT but pointed Senate speech July 24, Sen. Fulbright asked his colleague (whom he did not address as "distinguished" but simply as "the junior senator from Arizona") to clarify a few items including what Goldwater meant by "total victory" in this age of ideological conflict and nuclear weapons.

"In the Middle Ages," Fulbright said, "when military combat took the form of jousts between chivalrous knights, total victory was perhaps a reasonable objective. . . . In our own time the chivalrous encounter has been relegated to the football field or the boxing arena, and it is a dangerous illusion to confuse the rules of a college football game with those that apply to the arena of world politics."

One of the principal lessons of two World Wars, he added, both of which ended in "total victory," is that wars and total victories generate more problems than they solve. "The world is far less safe for democracy today than it was in 1914. . . . Apparently," Fulbright went on almost sadly, "we have not yet fully accepted the fact that there are no absolute solutions, that we can hope to do little more than mitigate our problems as best we can and learn to live with them. . . .

"Our proper objective," he concluded," is a continuing effort to limit the world struggle for power and to bring it under civilized rules. (But) such a program lacks the drama and romance of a global crusade."

How right he is! How closely attuned to the outraged heartbeat of America was Indiana's Sen. Homer Capehart who, after a Cuban had hijacked a U.S. airliner, wrapped himself in a senatorial toga of red, white and blue prose and cried that we should give Castro 24 hours to return the plane "or go in and get it." He neglected to say whether he or the DAR should lead the expedition.

Admittedly it is maddening to sit by and watch Castro play the brigand and get away with it. What a trim, orderly world it would be if the delinquents jumped every time the Goldwaters and the Capeharts and other right-wing romanticists cracked the whip.

The trouble is we are not running a trained-animal act, we are trying to help keep a frenzied world intact, a world, I suggest, which has a higher opinion of us than Sen. Goldwater thinks it has, or would have if we adopted his ring-mastering tactics.

Washington Reports:

Senators See Urgent Need for Community Health Facilities Bill

CONGRESS SHOULD speed final passage of legislation to supply badly needed nursing home facilities and more public health nurses for the aged and chronically ill, a Democratic senator, Ralph Yarborough (Tex.), and a Republican, Sen. Jacob K. Javits (N. Y.), asserted in interviews on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program, heard on 450 radio stations.

"Of the 307,000 nursing home beds in the country, 134,000 are classified as non-acceptable because of fire and health hazards," Yarborough declared. He quoted from a Senate report by a committee that inspected such homes:

"The rooms were dark and cheerless, small and crowded with faded curtains and torn window shades and some had no curtains at all. The windows were grimy and unwashed, letting in little light. The beds were old and not properly made up."

Some communities have no nursing homes at all, Javits said. He stressed their importance because of the lack of availability of hospital beds, the cost of hospitalization if it can be obtained and the importance of keeping patients ambulatory. Public health nurses could help take care of patients in their own homes, he pointed out.

BOTH SENATORS spoke in favor of a pending community health services bill, sponsored by Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.) and Rep. Oren Harris (D-Ark.), which would provide up to $40 million in annual grants to states to extend the number of and improve the quality of community health services, including nursing home, public health nurse and out-patient diagnostic care for the aged and chronically ill outside of hospitals.

The House has passed the bill and final action now is up to the Senate.

Javits is sponsor of his own bill, revived from the previous Congress, which is similar to the Hill-Harris measure. Both he and Yarborough agreed that if nursing homes and public health nurse care for patients in the homes were available the cost of the care for many aged and chronically ill would be drastically lessened.

"Unless the case is an emergency, there are few communities where you can get into a hospital except through a waiting list of weeks and sometimes months," Javits remarked. "They just don't have the beds."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

CONGRESS IS APPROACHING its home stretch—the period of the last several weeks when all the bills piled up previously, and urgently requested by the Administration, must be pulled from committee and moved to House and Senate floors—or dropped temporarily to "wait for next year."

One observer's guess may be as good as another's on the actual adjournment date—but the consensus here is that the legislators will not go home until the middle of September, which would give a minimum of about five weeks for the remainder of the session.

The general picture shows Pres. Kennedy still seeking action on a number of major bills and Congress involved in fierce battles on the essentials of the Administration's foreign and domestic program.

Congress moved quickly to grant the President authority to call up reserves and to increase defense spending on the basis of the Berlin crisis. The foreign aid issue is something else.

A major drive was launched by the Republican leadership, with the backing of some conservative Democrats, to kill the key section of the foreign aid program—the authorization of long-term economic development loans financed by Treasury withdrawals.

Scores of billions have actually been expended on domestic programs through Treasury withdrawals authorized in advance, and the argument that specific annual appropriations are the only legal way to finance a government program is sham. The battle nevertheless involves the effectiveness of the foreign aid plan and the prospect is for very close votes.

STILL HOGTIED in the House Rules Committee are all three school bills approved by the House Education Committee—general aid to the public schools, aid for higher education and extension of the National Defense Education Act. Included in this package is also an extension of the existing program for federal grants to "impacted" area schools—schools in areas with a heavy influx of families drawn by federal activities.

A Republican effort to extend the impacted areas program, without any action on general school aid or higher education, was beaten on the Senate floor.

The presumption must be that the Administration will find a way to attach a somewhat scaled-down aid bill to eventual legislation on the "impacted" areas—or to find some other means of pushing through what Kennedy has labeled the public school bill, the "most important" part of his domestic program.

The Anderson-King bill for social security health care for the aged has been the subject of hearings in the House Ways & Means Committee. A similar proposal was beaten last year, though this was at a time when Pres. Eisenhower's White House opposed it. Kennedy's White House is for it, but no test votes have yet been taken in committee.

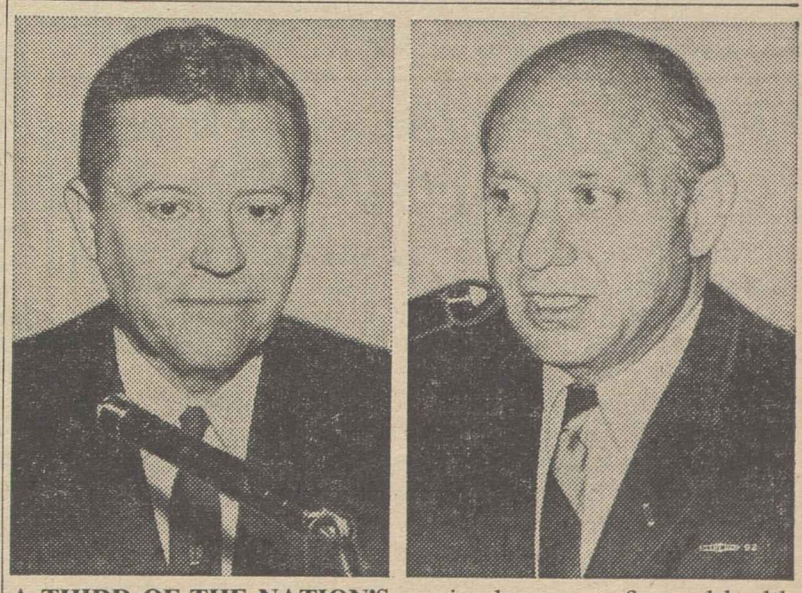
THE CATALOG of other pending legislation is long.

The Senate has passed a bill authorizing the development of nuclear electric power facilities at Hanford, Wash., using great quantities of byproduct heat that otherwise will continue to be wasted. House Republican Leader Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) has sought to prevent a conference committee report that would keep a revived coalition of House Republicans and conservative Democrats from voting to kill the Senate version.

The President's program for the training and retraining of workers dropped from their jobs because of automation or other changes has been approved in a scaled-down form by committees of both houses but has not yet reached the floor.

A permanent program for improving the unemployment system —of major importance in view of the high level of continuing long-term joblessness—has not yet had formal consideration by the key committee, House Ways & Means.

A bill to extend the Mexican farm program faces Administration opposition because of insufficient reforms to eliminate abuses. A community health services program has passed the House but not yet the Senate. A limited tax reform and business "incentive" program has not yet reached the floor.



A THIRD OF THE NATION'S nursing homes are fire and health hazards, Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.), left, asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. He and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) spoke in favor of the Community Health Services and Facilities bill, which would help states build needed nursing homes.

Flexible Taxation Rate Viewed As Tool to Control Recessions

Congress will voluntarily give up some of its control over taxation and will, within one to three years, authorize the President to meet temporary economic maladjustments by raising or lowering the tax rate on the first $2,000 of income by as much as 5 percent, an AFL-CIO spokesman has predicted.

Appearing on Labor News Conference, nationally broadcast public affairs program of the AFL-CIO, Research Director Stanley Ruttenberg said he expects support for the change even from conservatives. The authority given the President, he pointed out, would provide a weapon for use to combat temporary recessions, but would not affect the basic tax structure and would be hedged with qualifications.

Ruttenberg was a member of the Commission on Money and Credit which recently produced a widely discussed report on U.S. fiscal, tax and credit policy. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Eileen Shanahan, Washington correspondent for the Journal of Commerce, and Bernard Nossiter, Washington Post reporter.

Besides recommending limited power to adjust taxes for the Chief Executive, the commission set up three basic goals—the attainment of an adequate rate of economic growth, low levels of unemployment, and reasonable price stability.

The commission would require the President to consult with his advisers, including the Federal Reserve Board chairman and the Secretary of the Treasury, and to tell the public what he has done when economic trends run contrary to the achievement of the basic goals.

Ruttenberg said he supported this proposal but "vigorously dissented" from the commission's decision not to state a specific rate of growth for the American economy. He argued that the growth rate should be 5 percent and "we ought to fight" to attain this objective.

The federation research director reminded his listeners that the Congress voluntarily gave up some of its power when it gave the President authority, in the mid-1930s, to set tariff rates and duties after negotiation with other nations.

What the commission proposed on taxes, Ruttenberg recalled, was that a "very limited power" be granted the President.

"The tax is now 20 percent," he said, "so the President could raise it to 25 percent in a period of inflation, or lower it to 15 percent in a time when unemployment is exceedingly high," as it is now.

This would be an ideal time, Ruttenberg told the reporters, for the President to have "discretionary authority" to increase the tax.

Limitations Proposed

The commission limited that discretionary authority by recommending that:

- The President could increase or decrease the tax on the first $2,000 of taxable income for six months, with a possible extension for another six months after which his authority in this field terminates.
- The President's decision would go into effect only if it was not vetoed by either house of Congress. He would be required to submit the decision to Congress, where it "sits on the desk" for 60 days before becoming effective.

Ruttenberg backed up his prediction of support for the proposal by fiscal conservatives by emphasizing that some 20 members of the 25-member commission voted for the recommendation. This included some of the "most responsible" banking and insurance company executives in the nation, he said.

"We did discuss at some length," Ruttenberg said, "an across-the-board change in the tax structure, and this was rejected by the commission as a whole. Instead we decided to hold it to the easiest thing that can be done—change the first-bracket tax either up or down."

The commission's report makes clear, he said, that there is a difference between long-term changes in the tax structure, such as those wanted by conservatives, and the kind of tax changes wanted by Ruttenberg and others—closing tax loopholes and increasing the income tax base.

The commission majority also made it clear, Ruttenberg continued, that it would not be wise to continue the complete independence of the Federal Reserve Board from the government and the Administration. Therefore it recommended that the President be empowered to appoint the chairman of the FRB at the beginning of the President's term, and that the chairman be irremovable for four years.

Ruttenberg said he and one or two other members proposed that the chairman serve at the discretion of the President, subject to removal after one year. This view did not prevail.

He also dissented from the majority's finding that control of mutual savings banks and savings and loan associations should not be given to the Federal Reserve System, Ruttenberg said. A few commission members felt, he said, that it is necessary to have some control over non-commercial banks as well as commercial banks "if we are going to regulate the level of money supply."

TV Raffle OK, but Other Company Acts Held Illegal

Austin, Tex.—A concrete firm here avoided breaking the Taft-Hartley law when it announced that it would raffle off a television set immediately after a representation election, but it used unfair labor practices in other ways, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

Three board members rejected a trial examiner's finding that the Austin Concrete Works, Inc., was trying to influence workers to vote against the Carpenters when it announced that all who voted in the election July 29, 1960, would get a chance in the drawing. The vote was 26-21 in favor of the union, with three challenged ballots.

The NLRB panel agreed with the examiner that management broke the law by hiring one Roy Winans to try to defeat the union; and by giving wage boosts to influence workers against the union. The company was ordered to stop threatening employes or otherwise interfering.

Biemiller Tells Senate:

New Tax Loophole Seen for 'Self-Hired'

The AFL-CIO's "determined opposition" to a bill allowing self-employed persons to avoid taxes on income set aside for individual self-pensions has been voiced by Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller.

Biemiller renewed objections to the bill in a letter to Chairman Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.) of the Senate Finance Committee, which has been holding hearings on the measure.

The bill ran into trouble in the Senate after the House passed it. Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) voiced opposition, and Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.) suggested a scaling-down amendment after Rep. Eugene J. Keogh (D-N. Y.) said he believed the House would accept "almost any" modification.

The bill, passed by the House in 1958 and 1959 and again this year, would permit self-employed persons such as doctors and lawyers to defer payment of taxes on 10 percent of their income up to a maximum of $2,500 a year, set aside as retirement funds.

The Kennedy Administration has condemned the bill. The American Medical Association has endorsed it, saying its passage would "make self-employment as financially attractive as employe status."

Biemiller, denying that present tax laws deprive the self-employed of benefits for private retirement plans, said the legislation would not correct any genuine inequities.

Instead, he said, it would "create new and extensive tax benefits" for a relative few and such benefits would "far outweigh any meager tax advantages" now available to some wage and salary workers.

Inequities Listed

The bill would give the self-employed person the following advantages, Biemiller told the committee:

- He could set aside 10 percent of his earnings up to $2,500 a year toward a retirement fund, compared with much smaller amounts, normally 4 to 6 percent, for employer-financed pensions for wage and salary workers. If workers are required to contribute to their own pensions, their contributions are not tax deductible.
- He could make his own decision on whether to take a tax advantage or not, while wage and salary workers must wait for their employer to grant a pension system, through collective bargaining or otherwise.
- The definition of income for the self-employed includes both earnings and return on money invested in a business, but for other workers contributions are a proportion of earnings alone.
- A self-employed person who employs three or fewer employes would not have to provide a pension plan for them, but could set up a benefit plan for himself.
- The bill gives the self-employed person a non-forfeitable right to the amounts he has set aside—they belong to him alone, or to his estate, whereas wage and salary employes must meet many age and service requirements before claiming any money set aside for them.

Biemiller also pointed out that self-employed individuals already receive "many specific tax advantages" that allow them to accumulate savings toward retirement benefits. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury have indicated, he said, that they plan to suggest general tax reform to Congress next year.

Assistant Treasury Sec. Stanley S. Surrey testified that the Administration opposed the bill because it "creates inequities and unjustifiable differences" in tax treatment. It would involve an annual loss in revenue of about $358 million and would "clearly not be appropriate," he declared.

Sample Drug Resales Under Probe by FDA

The Food & Drug Administration has launched a nationwide crackdown against the repackaging for sale of hundreds of thousands of "free" drug samples—including potentially dangerous prescription drugs—initially prepared for distribution to physicians.

The investigation into the handling of physicians' samples was ordered by FDA Commissioner George P. Larrick in the wake of seizure actions, filed in U.S. District Court, against two New Jersey drug wholesalers.

The government charged that Marshel Sales Co. of Palisades Park, N. J., and Fall Drug Co. of Jersey City had in their possession drugs for treatment of high blood pressure and heart conditions, antibiotics, tranquilizers and hormones originally supposed to be samples for use by doctors.

The repackaged drugs, the FDA charged, were not labeled in accordance with federal law; did not bear the required statement that they cannot be dispensed without a prescription; did not give the generic name of the drugs; and did not indicate the identifying control number under which the drugs were packaged.

Larrick emphasized that sale of doctors' samples is "not illegal when properly labeled and used as such," but warned that some of the products are new drugs which the government permits to be marketed only under stringent systems of safety control.

The samples usually are distributed to doctors by so-called "detail men," hired by drug firms to help persuade doctors to recommend their particular brands of drugs. The role of "detail men" was examined at length in 1960 at hearings before a Senate Anti-Trust subcommittee, headed by Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.), which was probing the high cost of drugs.

The FDA said there were no accurate statistics as to the total number of samples annually given physicians by the industry. It indicated that although records show one Brooklyn, N. Y., physician was selling $10,000 worth of drugs to repackers each year, it has no evidence that doctors generally dispose of their samples improperly.

Larrick pointed out that the mushrooming repackaging practice poses the constant threat of "mix-ups in the drugs," and that the removal of labels prohibiting the sale of some drugs without prescription "may cause a dangerous drug to be used without medical supervision."

Delegates Meet in Ottawa:

Canada's New Party Born With High Hopes, Oratory

By Gervase N. Love

Ottawa, Ont.—A new party of the democratic left was being tortuously pounded into shape here at the largest political convention in Canada's history.

Some 1,800 voting delegates were laboring long—and loudly—in the historic Coliseum to bring into being a political party that could offer Canadians a "meaningful alternative" to the older major parties, Conservatives and Liberals, and to their scarcely distinguishable philosophies.

The dream began to take shape at the 1958 convention of the Canadian Labor Congress in Winnipeg, Man. Delegates at that assembly instructed the officers to discuss with the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, Canada's only liberal political group, with farmers, intellectuals and with liberals generally, the possibility of forming from the grass roots up a new party, progressive in nature, which would serve the interests of all Canadians.

The CCF quickly assented. Other groups and individuals were drawn in, and soon a broad New Party drive was under way. At the 1960 CLC and CCF conventions formal approval of the proposed party was voted and officers of both bodies were authorized to call a founding convention.

The creative process has been a slow one. Delegates created traffic jams around floor microphones and proceeded to oratory that was sometimes lengthy and often fiery.

Partial reports were repeatedly returned to the committees for revision. Even the rules of order, which most conventions adopt in 15 or 20 minutes, required 1 hour and 40 minutes for approval.

Basically the debate reflected differences between the traditional Socialist element in the CCF, most of it from the West, and the more moderate liberal approach of the big organized labor group and many of the intellectuals and independents. In every test on which any conclusion was reached, the Socialists were defeated.

Typical was the preamble to the program, a statement of principles that was adopted without change despite efforts to remand it with instructions for amendments—one for a planned economy—that would have brought it more into line with doctrinnaire Socialist ideology.

One section of the program approved by delegates guaranteed "a job for everyone." It would be implemented by a Guaranteed Employment Act which "will enable jobless Canadians to claim a job as a social right by applying to the local employment office."

Some skepticism was expressed, particularly by labor representatives, as to the feasibility of such a guarantee, but proponents cited a section pledging the party to "undertake to create" new job opportunities by industrial growth, development of resources and major construction projects.

An amendment to the Organization Committee's report which would have opened the door to Communist-dominated unions was easily defeated.

Gives Labor's View

Organized labor's views as to what the New Party should stand for were aired by CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin, who gave one of three keynote speeches.

Jodoin recounted political activity by Canadian workers over nearly a century, declaring that "a labor movement that is without interest in political matters is a labor movement that is evading one of the most fundamental responsibilities."

He noted Canada's continuing high unemployment and declared it is the "responsibility of governments, and particularly of the [federal] government in Ottawa," to provide leadership to find jobs for the idle. New approaches are essential, he asserted.

"The decisions that need to be taken are political decisions," Jodoin observed. "It surely follows that labor must, if it is to fulfill its functions, have a real interest in politics."

Took Issue With Socialists

On international affairs he took sharp issue with Socialists who want to write Canadian neutralism into the New Party's program and to get out of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

"We do not regard NATO as an article of faith or a way of life," he said, "but we do believe that at the moment it is a means by which we can cooperate with those who have proven to be our friends."

The idea of complete neutrality in today's world, he declared, "is a complete illusion—there are no completely neutral countries and there can be none."

Jodoin re-emphasized the position he and the CLC took at the 1960 convention in Montreal—that "there is no desire and no intention on the part of the CLC to dominate the New Party."

"I most solemnly declare that once the New Party is formed, as it will be at this convention," he said, "the CLC will not try to interfere or try to influence the internal affairs of the New Party, just as we will most strenuously oppose any interference on the part of the New Party in our internal affairs."

The CLC is not formally affiliated with the new party, but as a matter of policy encourages its member unions and their locals to join.

CLC Executive Vice Pres. Stanley Knowles, also a CCF vice president, opened the convention as chairman. Three presiding officers rotated in the chair: CLC Vice Pres. Roger Provost, president of the Quebec Federation of Labor and a member of the United Textile Workers; George Grube, professor of classics at the University of Toronto; and Walter Pitman, 31-year-old Peterborough, Ont., history professor who was elected the first New Party member of parliament several months before the party was officially formed.

Nominated for the party leadership at a colorful night session were Premier T. C. Douglas of Saskatchewan, Scottish-born Baptist minister and Typographical Union member who has most of labor's support, and Hazen Argue, CCF parliamentary leader and a Saskatchewan farmer.

Preamble to Program Lists Goals for Canada

Ottawa, Ont.—The text of the preamble to the program adopted at the founding convention of Canada's New Party here follows:

Canada is a land of abundant resources—moral, cultural and material—yet unemployment, waste, political corruption and commercialization of taste and values continue and have even increased. The reason is not that Canadians do not want a better society, but because economic development is still unplanned, unstable and operated chiefly for the benefit of the few owners of great corporations.

Moreover, we face new challenges everywhere. Our relations with North and South America, with the Commonwealth and Europe, with new states in Asia and Africa, as well as our defense policies, have to be reassessed in the light of new factors.

Our contribution to world peace must be more positive and more original. The partnership between English and French-speaking Canadians must be made more meaningful and valuable to both. To meet these challenges we must infuse a new spirit of social purpose and world responsibility into our national policies. New ways are needed.

For these great tasks this New Party has been founded. It seeks to unite for democratic political action all Canadians who put human rights and human dignity above the mere pursuit of wealth, and public welfare before corporate power. It adopts and will carry forward to new levels of achievement the best objectives of the farmer and labor, co-operative and social democratic movements, for which so many progressive Canadians have striven in the past. Democratically organized and financed, prepared to apply new methods of social and economic planning, the New Party will translate into practical federal and provincial programs the idealism and democratic faith that are now so frustrated.

This is why the New Party has been founded and why it invites all Canadians to join its ranks.

Occupational Safety Parley Head Picked

Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg has announced the appointment of Reed O. Hunt, president of the Crown Zellerbach Corp., San Francisco, as general chairman of the President's Conference on Occupational Safety.

Hunt will direct the planning of the safety meeting Pres. Kennedy has called for Washington on Mar. 6-8, 1962, which is expected to draw some 3,000 labor, business, government and community leaders. The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Standards is serving as the conference secretariat.

VOICE OF AMERICA's veteran labor editor Liston Oak, right, gets congratulations and a meritorious service award from Director Edward R. Murrow, United States Information Agency. Oak is a vice president of Government Employes' Lodge 1812. He has written labor scripts for VOA since 1948 and regularly covers AFL-CIO conventions and ICFTU sessions.

Per Capita Hike Vetoed By Guild Convention

Vancouver, B. C.—Delegates to the 28th annual convention of the Newspaper Guild voted down a proposal by the union's top executive board to increase the payments by locals to ANG by 10 cents per member per month. The sessions closed here July 28.

In the rollcall vote on the financial issue, the convention voted to continue the present per capita rate at $1.80 per month, but directed that $1.30 of that amount be allocated to general fund operations, which last year had shown a deficit of $18,000, and only 50 cents for bolstering the union's defense fund. The previous division was $1.20 and 60 cents between the two funds.

The new general fund allotment will accomplish the purpose sought by the IEB, sufficient anticipated revenue to balance a budget, approved by convention action, of $486,733.

Another floor issue involved the convention's earlier action in setting a cut-off date of Aug. 11 for strike benefits to 49 Guild members now working on a commercially-sponsored daily in Portland, Ore. The group is composed of workers who refused to cross picket lines at the Oregonian and Journal, struck by the Stereotypers in November 1959. The new daily is directly competing with the afternoon Journal, now published by non-union labor.

Supporters of the minority group at the convention, who backed the Portland Guild local's plea for an extension of defense fund benefits to Dec. 1, announced their intention to carry the issue to membership referendum. This requires affirmative membership action by 11 additional locals located in at least five states or provinces.

Two new members of the IEB were in the group of 15 nominated without opposition to two-year terms beginning Oct. 15.

Reelected were Pres. Arthur Rosenstock, New York City; Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson, Philadelphia; Sec.-Treas. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., Buffalo. The latter two are full-time salaried officers.

Regional vice presidents returned to another term were Daniel A. McLaughlin, North Jersey; Richard Lane, Memphis; James B. Woods, St. Louis; Robert J. Hickey, San Jose; James B. Egan, New York City, and Eric R. I. Cawdron, Ottawa.

Four of the six vice presidents at large were renamed—Joseph F. Collis, Wilkes-Barre; Jack Dobson, Toronto; Kenneth Rieger, Toledo, and Harvey H. Wing, San Francisco. The two newcomers are Mike Mastrullo, Cincinnati, and George Muldowney, Wire Services. They replace Richard P. Davis, Baltimore, who had resigned as of last May 31, and Frances D'Hondt, Detroit, who announced at the convention that she was not a candidate for re-election.

'Superseniority' Barred For Strikebreakers

ination in regard to conditions of employment and refusal to bargain collectively on the "superseniority" issue.

Trial Examiner Reeves R. Hilton, who heard the case at Erie, recommended dismissal of the complaint, but the board overruled him, ordering the company to rescind the superseniority policy to offer reinstatement and back pay to employes laid off because of the superseniority plan, and to bargain collectively with the IUE local.

"Superseniority effectively divides the strikers against themselves," the board said. It held that "an offer of superseniority is not merely an attempt to secure new 'replacements,' but more accurately an offer of benefit to individual strikers to abandon the strike and return to work."

The decision also held that "superseniority renders future bargaining difficult, if not impossible, for the authorized collective bargaining representatives.

"Employes are henceforth set apart into two groups: those who stayed with the union to the end and lost their seniority, and those who returned before the end of the strike and thereby gained extra seniority.

"This difference is re-emphasized with each subsequent layoff, for those who supported the union most faithfully are likely to be the first laid off. . . . The effective reward of nonstrikers and punishment of strikers inherent in superseniority stands as an ever-present reminder of the dangers connected with striking, and with union activities in general."

Unemployment Rate Hovers Near 7%

High Level Continues For 8th Month in Row

in July, unchanged from June. This group totaled 37 in July a year ago.

The number of "smaller areas of substantial unemployment" totaled 230 in July, compared to 116 in July 1960.

Goldberg commented that while the economy might be picking up, "it is not picking up among the hard-core unemployed."

The long-term unemployed — those jobless 15 weeks or longer— increased by 59,000 to a total of over 1.6 million in July. This was about double the 834,000 in this group in July a year ago and nearly equaled the postwar high for the month reached in 1958.

Long-Term Joblessness Up

The ranks of the worst-off jobless—those out of work 27 weeks or longer — increased by nearly 100,000 to a total of one million. This group totaled 416,000 a year ago.

"Unfortunately," Goldberg said, "all indications" are that the hard-core jobless will remain at these levels on into September and October.

This is "a problem of great concern to Pres. Kennedy and the Administration," Goldberg declared.

Goldberg said the unemployment figures "re-enforce the necessity for the job training and retraining program" now pending before Congress. Bills to set up programs to provide new skills and upgrade skills of the unemployed have been reported out of committee in both houses of Congress.

However, the Administration has looked on the training programs as part of a "one-two punch" which would require an economy on the upswing to be most effective.

Kennedy 'Concerned'

Goldberg, asked whether the Administration is planning expanded proposals to deal with the unemployment problem, replied that Kennedy is "continually concerned with this unemployment situation."

He said things would have been "much more serious" without programs which have been enacted and noted that others, such as aid to school construction, would spur employment.

"If all the programs of the Administration do not lead to a substantial impact on the unemployment situation — particularly the hard-core unemployed — the Administration will make other proposals to the Congress," Goldberg declared.

The employment report showed that non-farm jobs remained at 62 million, about equal to previous highs reached in June and in the summer of 1960.

Report Urges Reforms in Fund-Raising

ment has helped to raise millions of dollars to support worthy causes. Perlis said in his comment that "in the field of voluntary health and welfare, there has been too much chaos, confusion and competition."

He said the AFL-CIO "has felt for some time that the people can best be served if the health agencies would federate voluntarily into something like a national health fund to raise funds once a year for all instead of continuing the multiplicity of campaigns." Perlis expressed disappointment that the Rockefeller Foundation report stopped short of such a recommendation.

He added, however, that its proposals for uniform accounting and financial reporting by agencies which obtain their funds through public solicitations should be "welcomed" by the health and welfare foundations.

A second major recommendation —for establishment of a national citizen's commission as a coordinating group and watchdog in the field—"can be helpful," Perlis commented.

He called for "continued effort" to make both fund raising and spending in the health and welfare field more efficient. The Rockefeller Foundation report noted that nearly 25 percent of the money collected by voluntary groups went for the expense of fund-raising and for informational programs.

L-G Bond Surcharge Lashed by Schnitzler

Unions have proved to be "the best bonding risks in America" although since passage of the Landrum-Griffin Act they have been compelled to pay a premium price for the coverage required by law, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler has told a Senate Labor subcommittee.

Schnitzler, testifying on proposed amendments to the Welfare & Pension Plan Disclosure Act, urged that the law be modified to allow persons handling such trust funds to be covered by standard honesty bonds under criteria set by the Secretary of Labor.

He said an apparently innocuous phrase in the Landrum-Griffin Act, requiring persons handling union funds to be bonded to cover "faithful discharge of duties," had resulted in a 50 percent increase over the cost of standard bonding protection against losses from fraud or dishonesty.

The language required in the bonds was something "entirely new" to the surety companies, Schnitzler declared. Not having any data on which to base an experience rating, they boosted the cost by half.

In recent months, Schnitzler said, meetings between committees of the AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurers Conference and the Association of Surety & Casualty Companies of America have been held to discuss reduction of the surcharge on "faithful discharge of duties" bonds.

The surety firms, he said, conceded that the favorable claims experience of the companies in this area warrants a reduction.

A survey of AFL-CIO affiliates, now 80 percent complete, has not uncovered a single case where a bonding company has had to pay a claim under this provision, Schnitzler added.

While gratified at the promise of a reduction and at the fact that experience ratings show unions to be "better bonding risks than banks," the AFL-CIO sees no reason why any unnecessary premium charges should be required, Schnitzler said.

He told the subcommittee that standard commercial-type bonding would sharply cut the cost to unions—and union members —without reducing in any manner the protection of union funds or funds held in trust for workers.

In fact, he added, coverage could be increased and the premium cost would still be below the present charge.

DiSalle Again Vetoes GOP Jobless Aid Bill

Columbus, Ohio — Gov. Michael V. DiSalle has vetoed—for the second time this year — a Republican-sponsored unemployment compensation bill which the State AFL-CIO opposed because restrictive provisions outweighed liberalizing clauses. An attempt to override the veto failed in the House.

The new GOP bill would have raised employer unemployment compensation taxes, but would also have reduced benefits for some lower-paid workers and would have deducted "vacation pay" from benefits received by a jobless worker.

Earlier this year, DiSalle vetoed a bill extending duration of benefits because it also contained harsh disqualification provisions.

Labor Urges 'Strong' Welfare Report Law

thority, including the right of subpoena, to uncover abuses of reporting requirements.

- Authorize the Secretary to bring civil actions to enjoin violations, instead of relying on private suits by individuals.
- Require the retention of records for a minimum five-year period.
- Make both the payment and receipt of bribes or kickbacks a federal felony.
- Make it a felony to steal or embezzle from any employe benefit plan.
- Require each administrator to submit reports to the Labor Dept. on a prescribed form to insure detailed information on all phases of a plan's operation. At present, use of Labor Dept. reporting forms is optional.
- Eliminate the present requirement that statements of assets, liabilities, receipts and disbursements need be only in "summary" form, in order to insure more detailed disclosure of many key aspects of these financial operations.
- Establish new criteria for coverage so that all welfare and pension plans claiming federal tax exemption will be required to report on their activities.

A House subcommittee modified the Administration bill to limit the Labor Dept.'s power to investigate welfare plan reports to cases where a complaint has been made or where the Secretary of Labor "finds reasonable cause to believe investigation may disclose violations."

Labor Dept. Solicitor Charles Donahue urged the Senate group to retain the broader language of the Administration-drafted bill. McNamara commented that he considered the House subcommittee provision "attractive" and adequate.

'No Protection'

Donahue, presenting a statement on behalf of Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, said the present Welfare & Pension Plan Disclosure law provides "virtually no protection" for funds held in trust for workers. He added:

"Not a single one of the crimes and misfeasances which led to passage of this legislation would have been revealed by the reports which we can now require . . . What plan administrator or other interested party will convict himself out of his own mouth? Who will report that a plan ought to have $10,000 cash on hand but that he stole most of it? . . . As the law now stands, we must extend the same faith and credit to a report filed by a known crook that we extend to an administrator of impeccable reputation."

James B. Carey, testifying as secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, declared that pension and welfare funds "are becoming a big pool of business funds, to be used as the business and financial community see fit."

Carey asserted that dividends returned to employers as the result of favorable experience rating on group insurance policies should be used to improve benefits. He said corporation retention of these dividends has been "standard procedure" for years.

Management opposition to the proposals was expressed by A. D. Marshall on behalf of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

He charged that the proposed amendments would give federal officials "extreme authority to invade privacy" and "to conduct witchhunts."

Handicapped Aid Program Outlined

Labor's program for rehabilitation of the handicapped is the subject of a new pamphlet published by the AFL-CIO Community Service Activities.

It relates the role organized labor has played in development of rehabilitation services and lists a three-step program for local central bodies and Community Services Committees.

AFL-CIO publication No. 119 is called The Seventeen Million, and may be ordered at 10 cents a copy, $7.50 per hundred, from AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, 9 E. 40th Street, New York 16, N. Y.

Last Three Henderson Leaders Free

Raleigh, N. C.—Boyd E. Payton, Lawrence Gore and Charles Auslander, last of the Henderson union leaders jailed during the strike at Harriet-Henderson mills, have returned to freedom.

Payton and Gore were released from Raleigh Central Prison and Auslander from Caledonia Prison on Aug. 3, all on parole after serving the legal minimum of their sentences.

This means the release of all officers and members of the Textile Workers Union of America convicted in November 1960 on charges of conspiracy to blow up the struck mills.

Principal witness against the union officials was an undercover informer who later was involved in a Virginia gun charge.

Payton is the TWUA's Carolinas' director and Gore and Auslander are international representatives.

In an act of executive clemency, Gov. Terry Sanford (D) a month ago ordered a three-year reduction in the sentences. The trio just released had received six to 10-year sentences; Sanford's action permitted their release after they served the nine-month minimum required by law.

Labor Pledges President Unstinting Berlin Support

DELEGATION OF AFL-CIO OFFICIALS, with Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, visits Pres. Kennedy to express backing for U. S. stand on Berlin and for the President's foreign economic aid program. Left to right: Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, Communications Workers; Goldberg; AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany; Railway Clerks Pres. George M. Harrison; Kennedy; Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther; Letter Carriers Pres. William C. Doherty; Retail Clerks Pres. James A. Suffridge. Also present although not shown were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, Bricklayers Pres.-Emeritus Harry Bates, Machinists Pres. Al J. Hayes.

Endorses Long-Term Aid Plan

The AFL-CIO has given Pres. Kennedy assurance of labor's "full and unstinting support" of the Administration's policy on the freedom of Berlin and on foreign economic aid.

The assurances were given at an hour-long meeting in the White House between Kennedy and a group of federation Executive Council members, including Pres. George Meany, Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and seven vice presidents.

The group was accompanied to the meeting in Kennedy's office by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg.

JFK Thanks Labor

Discussing the meeting with reporters as the group left the White House, Meany said that Kennedy was given the "full and unstinting support" pledge following a briefing on the international situation. Goldberg said the President, in turn, had expressed his thanks for labor's support on the foreign aid program.

The foreign aid issue, Meany told the press, was discussed in the context of the critical international picture. Labor backed the President's program on long-term economic development loans, he said, "because long-term programs were the only sensible manner" in which the needs of underdeveloped nations could be met.

The President was still hopeful, Meany declared, that differences with the Soviet Union over Berlin might be peacefully negotiated, but indicated again we "won't surrender the freedom of a couple of million people."

School, Health Bills Backed

Meany said in reply to questions that labor still hopes Congress will move this session to pass a federal school aid bill and health care for the aged under the social security system. He said that on some other programs backed by labor, "We think we've done pretty well."

Meany and Goldberg said that no issues of labor legislation were taken up, but Goldberg said he had reviewed the industrial scene for the President and added, "I'm glad to report that strikes are at an all-time low."

Those at the meeting were members of the federation's Executive Committee plus AFL-CIO vice presidents resident in the Washington, D. C., area. Present in addition to Meany and Schnitzler were Executive Committee members Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison and Harry C. Bates, with James B. Carey, David J. McDonald and David Dubinsky unable to attend.

Other AFL-CIO vice presidents present were Al J. Hayes, Joseph A. Beirne, William C. Doherty and James A. Suffridge.

Senate Near Key Vote On Aid Bill

The Senate neared a key vote on the foreign aid program as the first session of the 87th Congress came to the showdown period on major issues involved in Pres. Kennedy's legislative program.

Senate debate on the foreign aid bill, carrying authorization for expenditures of $4.4 billion in the current fiscal year, centered on the section authorizing an additional $8.8 billion for long-term development loans financed across a five-year period by revolving funds from the Treasury.

The long-term loan section, permitting firm commitments to aid underdeveloped nations in strengthening the foundations of their economies, was under heavy attack by Republicans and southern conservative Democrats.

Sen. J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.), chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, which approved the program, sought additional support through a plan requiring the Administration to make advance reports to Congress on any loan exceeding $10 million. This would allow House and Senate committees to review costly projects and urge reconsideration of loans they believed unduly risky.

The showdown was expected on an amendment by Sen. Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.) to require the President each year to seek appropriations for all projects. Byrd charged that the Treasury borrowing approach was "back-door" spending.

The effect of the Byrd amendment would be to give extraordinary control of the economic development plans to House and Senate subcommittees on State Dept. appropriations which usually have a dominant influence in Congress. Rep. Otto E. Passman (D-La.), chairman of the House subcommittee, is an open enemy of foreign aid.

Other Actions

In other major actions in Congress:

- Senate and House conferees reached a compromise final agreement on record peace time defense appropriations of $46.6 billion. The House accepted, after resistance, a $207 million item for civil defense.

The defense appropriation included practically all the $3.5 billion Pres. Kennedy asked in additional funds after his speech to the nation on the Berlin crisis.

- House and Senate conferees began work on a $400 million authorization bill for the Atomic Energy Commission after the House, for the second time, turned thumbs down on a $95 million item

Meany Addresses Plumbers:

Joblessness Seen Weakening Nation

Kansas City, Mo.—The continuing problem of unemployment ranks in gravity on the domestic front with the problem of Berlin on the international front, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the Plumbers and Pipe Fitters convention here.

The failure of the economy to provide enough jobs, he warned, is the "one weak spot in America's armor" and cannot be remedied with "half-way measures." The proposals advanced by the President and Congress are in the "right direction but too modest in scope," he added.

Meany told the 2,600 delegates that the nation is in for a long period of "tension and struggle" that will be marked by threats, bluffs, brush-fire wars and infiltration. Every segment of society in America, he declared has "everything at stake" in the current crisis.

If the free world loses to the Communists, he said, it will be the end of the free way of life not only for the trade union movement but an end to "profits for employers and the coupon-clipping wealthy."

He pledged again that labor will do its part in this struggle and said he was confident that the Plumbers

Profits Rise 12 Percent in 2nd Quarter

Corporate profits increased an estimated 12 percent between the first three months and the second three months of 1961, a six-month period during which unemployment remained near a critically high 7 percent level.

The Wall Street Journal reported on the basis of a quarterly survey of corporate profits that after-tax earnings for the second quarter of 1961 ran at an annual rate of $22.4 billion compared to an annual rate of $20 billion for the first quarter.

The Journal, projecting the profit outlook for the current quarter, said there was a "possibility of an overall gain for corporate profits in the current three months."

The rising profits situation contrasted sharply with the unemployment situation which has remained static for the past eight months at just under 7 percent of the labor force. Unemployment has remained chronically high during a period of sharp increase in overall production as the nation began to emerge from the 1960-61 recession.

The Journal survey of 453 companies showed total profits down 3.7 percent from the second quarter of 1960 but explained that "a decline in sales was mainly responsible."

"The small decline in second quarter earnings from a year earlier," the Journal said, "indicates a substantial increase in the season-

Back Pay Ordered After 11 Years, But NLRB Case Isn't Closed Yet

Eleven years of legal maneuvering over a union charge that an employer committed an unfair labor practice have resulted in a National Labor Relations Board decision awarding almost $55,000 in back pay to 54 building trades workers—but further delay is possible.

The case, which has kept lawyers busy since workers walked off the Bull Shoals Dam near Mountain Home, Ark., on Dec. 3, 1948, involves a refusal-to-bargain charge filed in 1950 by the Fort Smith, Little Rock & Springfield AFL Joint Council against Brown & Root, Inc., and eight other companies doing business as the Ozark Dam Constructors.

The dam project was completed years ago, workers have scattered to other jobs, and the AFL has been merged with the CIO, but the strikers have not yet received the back pay the courts and the NLRB have said the contractor owes them.

Three members of the NLRB made the latest decision in a series stretching back to 1951. Members Philip Ray Rodgers, Boyd Leedom and John H. Fanning signed an order to this effect:

- The rulings of a trial examiner on Jan. 8, 1960, are affirmed.
- The pay formula worked out by the NLRB General Counsel is upheld for 54 carpenters and other workers.
- Thirteen members of the Machinists who struck in 1949 were not discriminated against and are not entitled to back pay.

The case has been so prolonged, and employer appeals have caused so many delays, that the three-man NLRB panel noted in its Supplemental Decision and Order:

"The present case has been in litigation for an inordinate length

TRADE UNIONISTS learn time study techniques bearing on management claims in negotiations, grievances and arbitration cases. The scene is a class at the annual training institute sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and the University of Wisconsin School for Workers, where the program is held. Bert Gottlieb, industrial engineer with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, and Norris Tibbetts of the School for Workers served as directors.

Union Staffers Learn Time Study Techniques

Madison, Wis.—Stop watches and slide rules were used extensively in recent special classes on the University of Wisconsin campus here—but the men and women manipulating them weren't in training for jobs as management efficiency experts.

They were trade unionists—veterans of many a collective bargaining, grievance and arbitration session—who were sharpening their knowledge of time study, job evaluation and work measurement systems at three industrial engineering institutes sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and the University of Wisconsin School for Workers.

Thirty-five staff representatives and local union officers took part in the two-week training programs. This is the third year the institutes have been operated for AFL-CIO affiliates.

In a letter to affiliates announcing the institutes, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler warned that unions are being increasingly faced with management use of industrial engineering techniques "to try to limit or reduce legitimate collective bargaining gains. Wage increases are negated by downgrading jobs, increasing work loads and lowering incentive earnings. . . ."

The institutes, Schnitzler said, are intended to "provide the training that union staff must have to effectively represent workers faced with management's use of industrial engineering methods."

The students came from 13 international unions: the Auto Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Flint Glass Workers, Steelworkers, Communications Workers, Boilermakers, Textile Workers Union of America, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Rubber Workers, Machinists, Meat Cutters, and Pulp-Sulphite Workers.

The institutes were under the direction of Bert Gottlieb, industrial engineer with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, and Norris Tibbetts of the School for Workers.

Other instructors at the institutes were: Russell Allen, education director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Richard Humphreys, education director, Allied Industrial Workers; William Kuhl, research director, Boilermakers; David Lasser, research director, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Kermit Mead, time study director, Auto Workers; Fred Simon, Auto Workers time study engineer; Don Wasserman, research associate, Machinists, and George Hagglund of the School for Workers.

A visiting German trade union educator, Hans Pornschlegel, served as a guest lecturer in several of the institute sessions.

URW Opens New Drive In Politics

Akron, O.—The Rubber Workers will take an active interest in community affairs, including politics, from now on, Pres. George Burdon has announced.

Burdon demonstrated the break with the "hands off politics" tradition by scheduling a series of meetings of URW officers, committeemen and stewards with Edward Erickson, one of two Democratic candidates for mayor in the Sept. 12 party primary.

Burdon and Erickson addressed meetings in two local union halls and first steps were taken toward eventual organization of ward and precinct organizations.

To be a good unionist, Burdon advised members of seven URW local unions, a citizen must be interested in and active at the local, state and national levels.

On the legislative front, he stressed the importance of working for the passage of the AFL-CIO national program, including medical care for the aged under the social security method of financing.

Said another URW officer: "Our active people just got fed up with sitting on their hands. Now they will start looking and working for liberal candidates."

Rep. William H. Ayres (R), a leading figure in the House Republican-Dixiecrat coalition that has defeated liberal legislation for years, has represented Akron and the 14th Ohio District in the House since 1950. He was co-sponsor of the coalition's Kitchin-Ayres minimum wage bill this year and last, a bill denounced by the AFL-CIO.

Fisk Aide Given Job Bias Position

John Hope II, an economist at the Fisk Race Relations Institute, Nashville, Tenn., has been named director of federal employment for the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunities.

Hope has been director of industrial relations at Fisk since 1945 and during World War II served on Pres. Roosevelt's Fair Employment Practices Committee.

NLRB Cases Closed by Settlements

Two of every three unfair labor practice complaint cases filed with the National Labor Relations Board are being settled without litigation, according to a report by Stuart Rothman, NLRB general counsel.

In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, 2,568 unfair practice cases were closed by voluntary agreement of the parties—an increase of 160 percent since 1958 and the greatest number of such settlements since 1938, Rothman told the Southwest Conference of Operating Engineers at a Galveston, Tex., meeting.

Unfair labor practice charges filed with the agency are at an all-time high, the general counsel said, adding that he has encouraged regional directors to help employers, unions and individuals work out settlements to relieve the administrative and judicial processes of unnecessary litigation.

Despite an "unprecedented" caseload, Rothman said, the average number of "unfair practice" cases under investigation dropped from a high of 2,286 in fiscal 1959 to 991 in fiscal 1961.

Since new unfair practice cases now average 1,000 a month, Rothman said this indicates that "the backlog has been eliminated" and regional case handling is on a "current" basis.

Unionists with U. S. Delegation:

Latin Parley Seeks Higher Standards

Three representatives of American labor are attending the Inter-American Economic and Social Conference at Punta del Este, Uruguay, as official observers with the United States delegation headed by Treasury Sec. Douglas Dillon.

Named by Pres. Kennedy as observers were Stanley Ruttenberg, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. William C. Doherty and AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Serafino Romualdi.

The Punta del Este conference, bringing together the ranking finance ministers of the Latin American nations and of the United States, marks a major initiative by Pres. Kennedy to bring into being his "alliance for progress" with other western hemisphere countries.

Launching a drive to pour capital investment funds into the Latin nations to raise the people's standard of living, the Kennedy Administration has also made it clear that it believes a major effort must be made by the Latin governments to reform their tax and land-tenure systems.

Goal Is Higher Standards

The objective is to raise standards of education and literacy, to improve the health of the Latin American people and to promote an equitable distribution of wealth in countries where the gulf between the richer families and the great bulk of the people has been extremely broad, U.S. observers say.

Dillon's formal presentation to the conference of the U. S. program set forth a proposal for long-term loans of up to 50 years "at very low or zero rates of interest," and suggested a goal of $20 billion within a 10-year period for Latin American investment.

Latin Plans Needed

The problem, the U.S. Treasury Secretary told the delegates, would not be a shortage of capital investment—which he proposed in full measure from the United States, Japan, European nations and international development sources—but in the manner in which Latin American nations organized their own development program to take full advantage of the funds available.

"We welcome the revolution of rising expectations among our [American] peoples and we intend to transform it into a revolution of rising satisfactions" by these peoples with their progress toward an acceptable way of life.

Dillon told the delegates that the U.S. believed the problem of Latin American exports and imports should be met by such stabilizing efforts as a new agreement on coffee exports and possible U.S. adherence to an international tin agreement, plus the elimination of tariff preferences that work against Latin American exports.

Labor Provides Balance

The economic czar of Premier Castro's Cuba, Maj. Gen. Ernesto (Che) Guevara, was seated close to Dillon during the U.S. presentation. He declined comment when other Latin spokesmen welcomed the Dillon program.

The labor observers named by Kennedy gave the U.S. delegation a balance in its approaches to leaders of labor organizations and other forces for economic justice in the Latin American nations.

Business observers also were named to accompany the U.S. delegation.

of time; it must finally be brought to a close."

Nevertheless, the panel said, it desires to afford the company "some reasonable opportunity to examine these claimants"—those who were awarded back pay though they were not called to testify—before their pay is turned over to them.

The panel instructed the NLRB regional director to hold some back pay in escrow, to deduct some sums for earnings while awaiting recall, and to report back "no later than one year from the date of this decision." In addition, the Ozark Dam firm has the legal right to appeal the decision to the U. S. Court of Appeals, as it did once before, in 1953.

Beirne Sees Need for Check on Voluntary Health, Welfare Groups

New York—Organized labor would give its "wholehearted support" to the establishment of a National Commission on Voluntary Health and Welfare Agencies, Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, has declared. Such a commission was proposed in a recent Rockefeller Foundation report.

Beirne, who is also president of the Communications Workers, said critics of the plan miss the point that its "principal purpose is to produce action by the American people in a crucial area of our national life, where inaction has been the rule." This has "led to widespread confusion and mistrust of all voluntary health and welfare services," he declared.

Organized labor cannot agree that the danger of loss of confidence in voluntary health and welfare is "imaginary," as some have claimed, Beirne said. In the process of raising "millions of dollars" for both independent and federated agencies, he pointed out, "we can honestly report a growing discontent among our membership with the confusion and competition which seems to permeate the entire voluntary health and welfare movement."

"The Rockefeller Foundation study confirms much that we in organized labor have informally observed for nearly 20 years," Beirne claimed, "specifically: the growing proliferation of agencies (now over 100,000); the conflict and competition among them for the contributor's dollar; the increasing emphasis on the dollar itself instead of on the people the agencies exist to serve; the exclusion, unwitting or deliberate, of major segments of our society from active participation in health and welfare planning; and the subordination of social planning to the 'business' of raising and disbursing money."

He said these are "some of the reasons" why organized labor is for a National Commission on Voluntary Health and Welfare Agencies.

Beirne, who served on the study committee, attacked the charge that the proposed commission would violate "fundamental rights of voluntary association," pointing out that it would have "no legal enforcing powers." He said its chief function would be "to speak directly to the American people," as expressed by the President, the AFL-CIO official pointed out.

As far as present laws being adequate to protect the contributing public, "where were these laws when 56 national agencies filed reports with the National Information Bureau which showed a difference of $58 million between reported income and reported expenditures?"

"We of organized labor would welcome the establishment of a National Commission on Voluntary Health and Welfare Agencies," Beirne concluded, "and would give it our wholehearted support in the belief that the result could restore to voluntarism in America that which it has lost somewhere along the way—the reason for its existence, which is to serve the people, all the people."

Immigrants Win 'Square Deal':

Construction Strike Settled in Toronto

Toronto, Ont.—A strike by Ontario's immigrant construction workers has been settled after residential contractors associations agreed to abide by a government program of a square deal for newcomers to Canada.

The "square deal," the peace formula drafted by Ontario Premier Leslie Frost, is a three-point program to maintain peace in the residential building field until the government can draft legislation in November.

Key to the Frost peace formula is a change in the Labor Relations Act which recognizes the need for speedy and binding arbitration of grievances and contract violations in the house and apartment building field.

Instead of the cumbersome and often lengthy grievance procedures of the Ontario Labor Relations Act, the government is bypassing these procedures through a special board that will hear and adjudicate grievances on a day-to-day basis.

The government also recognized for the first time that in the construction industry management and labor have different problems than those in manufacturing, transport, mining and service industries.

It has established a Royal Commission probe of labor unrest in the industry. The commission is expected to recommend additional changes in the labor law to adapt it to the special problems of the construction industry.

The 49-day strike also saw 10 contractors' trade associations agree to abide by contracts signed last year. This means wage gains of 30 to 50 cents an hour, since the contractors had previously claimed that a slump in building operations made it impossible to pay the union rates and had arbitrarily lowered the rate.

This triggered the strike by the 10,000 immigrant workers—Canda has received a great influx of new residents in recent years—under the direction of a joint strike committee operating under the banner of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Although the government admitted after the first two weeks of the strike that its labor relations act could not cope with conditions in the building field, contractors held out against the government settlement for another five weeks.

The 12 striking unions had enthusiastically accepted the peace formula and the promise of sweeping new laws, but more than 1,000 builders, speculators, developers and subcontractors held out in a futile attempt to break the unions.

Wage Scales Up In Building Trades

Hourly wage scales of union building trades workers rose an average of 2.6 percent during the second quarter of 1961, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics has reported.

The rise was smaller than for the corresponding periods of the four previous years, according to the survey of seven major trades in 100 cities.

Laborers and plumbers led the upward movement with average hourly gains of 10.8 and 10.6 cents respectively. Carpenters' scales advanced 10.2 cents, and the increase in four other trades averaged from 6.3 to 9.7 cents. The other trades are bricklayers, electricians, painters and plasterers.

800 Laundry Workers Win Two-Day Strike

Cincinnati—A short strike of 800 laundry and dry cleaning workers at 16 plants here has resulted in a contract containing wage minimums at least as high as those in the federal minimum wage law, which excludes most workers in the industry.

The three-year agreement cracking the minimum wage barrier was approved by members of Local 248, Laundry & Dry Cleaning Union, who returned to work two days after the strike started.

For the lowest-paid workers, the new minimum of $1.15 an hour represents increases ranging from 32 to 38 percent in the two years since Local 248 affiliated with the AFL-CIO, according to Mrs. Florence Smith, local president-business manager. The union formerly was a part of the Laundry, Dry Cleaning & Dye House Workers, expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957.

The new agreement provides wage increases of 10 cents an hour this year, another 5 cents next year, and a third raise of 5 cents on June 8, 1963, when the minimums will range from $1.25 to $1.65 an hour.

Also provided are vacations up to three weeks after 15 years; paid 10-minute rest periods every morning and afternoon throughout the life of the contract, and sizable improvements in health and welfare benefits and the hospitalization plan.

Another Raise Won

Pres. Winfield S. Chasmar of the international union, here for the contract signing, said Local 248 also has won a 5-cent wage increase and a minimum of $1.25 an hour for 300 employes of the Standard Overall Co. in plants at Norwood, O., and Ashland, Ky., for the third year of a three-year contract under a wage reopener.

The $1.25 minimum represents another "breakthrough" for the union east of the Mississippi River, Chasmar said.

Brownlow Hits Biweekly Pay Plan for Navy

The Metal Trades Dept. of the AFL-CIO is "vigorously opposed" to a proposal that the Navy pay its "blue collar" workers every two weeks instead of every week as at present, Pres. James A. Brownlow of the department has reiterated to a Senate committee.

In a letter to Sen. Carl Hayden, Senate Appropriations Committee chairman, Brownlow urged committee members to reject this "archaic method of payment" recommended in an earlier report by the House Appropriations Committee.

Brownlow said a biweekly pay rule would be in conflict with the laws of eight states which have Navy installations; would seriously affect the continued participation of Navy employes in weekly bond purchase programs, and force many employes to seek loans to pay bills requiring weekly payments.

More than 90 percent of the employes of private industry are paid on a weekly basis, Brownlow said.

AFL-CIO Asks Passage Of Health Facilities Bill

Federal aid for nursing homes and public health facilities is urgently needed to help communities overcome "a major gap in health care for the chronically ill and the aged," the AFL-CIO has declared in testimony before a Senate Health subcommittee.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller and Lisbeth Bamberger, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, urged quick Senate approval of the Administration's Community Health Services and Facilities bill.

The House-passed measure would increase the annual authorization for federal grants to states for public health services from $30 million to $50 million. It would double federal grants for construction of non-profit nursing homes to $20 million and would set up a new $10 million-a-year program of grants for studies and demonstration projects involving improved health services outside of hospitals.

Biemiller told the subcommittee, headed by Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.), that new developments in medical treatment "hold the promise of happier, more fully useful lives for countless victims of chronic disease." He emphasized, however:

"Despite our new knowledge, and despite the increased skills of physicians, nurses and other professional personnel, countless thousands of older people are being denied proper care simply because the needed facilities do not exist, or the necessary services are not adequately organized."

Biemiller said, "the vast majority of the population cannot get simple home nursing or homemaker services because no such services exist in their community. All over the country there are people who never leave institutions, not because their medical needs keep them there, but because there are no alternative facilities."

Biemiller said the community facilities bill is one part of the three-pronged attack which should be made on inadequate medical care. He called for congressional action also on health care for the aged through social security and on legislation to help train additional doctors and other health personnel.

The AFL-CIO spokesman also urged the subcommittee to incorporate in the community facilities bill provisions of a separate bill, introduced by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), which would authorize low-cost, long-term federal loans to non-profit, prepaid group health plans. The loans would be used to construct facilities such as clinics.

More Home Care Seen

A stepped-up program of federal aid, the AFL-CIO spokesman declared, "would return many older people to their own homes where they could be self-sustaining except for needed home nursing care, thus relieving some of the existing pressure on hospital and nursing home capacity."

Apart from financial reasons,

17 Fired, UAW Wins Representation Vote

Nashville, Mich.—The Auto Workers have been certified as the bargaining representative of workers at the Nashville Manufacturing Co. plant here after a campaign during which 17 workers were fired and threats to "move South" were used, according to UAW Reg. Dir. Kenneth W. Robinson.

The vote, in an election supervised by the National Labor Relations Board, was 49 for the union, 4 for no union, with 8 votes challenged by management. The UAW will seek reinstatement of the fired workers through negotiations or legal means, Robinson said.

CWA Raps Rejection of Arbitration

The Communications Workers, in letters to the governors of five New England states, said the rejection of an arbitration clause by the New England Telephone and Telegraph Co. has raised doubts about the firm's ability to operate in the public interest.

CWA cracked the New England subsidiary of the Bell System when it won a National Labor Relations Board election to represent advertising directory salesmen. Arbitration clauses are common to Bell System contracts.

Talks Started in May

Negotiations for a contract have been under way since early May.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne wrote the governors of Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and Rhode Island.

"Arbitration is a cornerstone of industrial peace," he said. "There is no effective substitute . . . therefore, the refusal of local telephone management to accept that safeguard of responsible and stable labor-management relations becomes an open question of interest not only to the employes and to the company but to the public as well."

UAW Board Asked To Set Strike Vote

Detroit—The Auto Workers executive board was scheduled to meet here Aug. 13 in special session to consider authorizing strike votes at one or more of the "Big Four" auto firms.

Union presidents and bargaining committees at General Motors and Chrysler, reporting almost total lack of progress in negotiations, asked the board to start strike-vote machinery well in advance of the contract expiration date of Aug. 31.

Unsatisfactory progress also was reported by union committees at Ford Motor and American Motors. The latter firm has proposed contract changes including a profit-sharing plan, and the union made a counter-proposal which has not been accepted.

UAW members in 131 GM bargaining units held regional meetings in 20 locations and went on record unanimously in favor of asking for strike vote authorization.

After a Detroit meeting of Chrysler local presidents, UAW Vice Pres. Norman Matthews said the union "wants an agreement without the necessity of a strike" but "Chrysler's attitude at the bargaining table has been completely negative."

These other developments were reported:

- The UAW executive board announced that in its July meeting it had voted a $3 increase starting Sept. 3 in strike benefits. They will be at these new levels: $15 a week for unmarried workers, $20 for married, $25 for families, starting the third week of a strike and continuing for seven weeks.
- The UAW is using 23 Motor City billboards for posters in the form of newspaper headlines proclaiming that Ford Motor Co. paid $33.6 million in bonuses to executives last year but intends to "hold the line" in paying its workers. The billboard campaign was in answer to Ford charges that union proposals are "inflationary."
- The UAW announced that Ford negotiations will be moved Aug. 21 from company offices to "neutral ground."

Profits—But Not Jobs

THE NATION'S ECONOMY as it emerges from the 1960-61 recession is still caught in the dangerous paradox of a sharply rising rate of corporate profit and a static, unyielding rate of unemployment persisting at around 7 percent of the labor force.

The over 5 million men and women doggedly searching for non-existent jobs and the millions of others who are working part-time or are on short workweeks are footing the recession's bill in frustration, despair and poverty.

In the past few months production and sales have turned upward with the immediate effect of increasing profits 12 percent from the first quarter to the second quarter of 1961. Contrasted with the unyielding unemployment rate, the scope of job displacement, the impact of automation and the rise in productivity are clearly revealed.

Despite the apparent recovery from the recession, there can be no real economic progress while seven out of every 100 workers are unemployed. The 7 percent unemployment rate means simply that the upturn from the recession can at best be weak and incomplete, setting up the conditions for another recession in a few years.

Chance for the GOP

THE DEBATE on the foreign aid bill in the Senate gave the Republican Party an opportunity to demonstrate its role as a responsible opposition and to renew the support of at least 21 GOP senators for the long-term aid principle.

In 1957 Pres. Eisenhower recommended to Congress the same long-range aid principle urged by Pres. Kennedy in the legislation placed before the Senate with the approval of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Eisenhower had urged a three-year program; Kennedy has supported a five-year approach. This is the only difference.

The 1957 debate produced 21 Republican votes for Pres. Eisenhower's recommendation in the Senate. A coalition of conservative Democrats and Republicans ultimately succeeded in sharply cutting back the long-range program in the House. The lineup on the 1961 aid bill is closer and more support is evident for the long-range approach so essential to the success of any mutual aid program.

If the 21 Republicans who supported the long-range aid principle backed by Pres. Eisenhower will support the same principle advanced by Pres. Kennedy, the nation will have taken a long stride forward in shaping an effective aid program to bolster the free world.

Action to Meet a Need

THE HOUSE Ways & Means Committee has concluded two weeks of intensive hearings on the Anderson-King bill to provide health care for the aged under the social security system, hearings at which the fraudulent and distorted arguments of the opponents of the measure were factually exploded.

The completion of the hearings and the testimony provided at Senate and House hearings held in 1959 and 1960 on similar measures removes any lingering reasons for delay.

It has been conclusively demonstrated that a critical situation exists and will get worse unless the social security system is extended to cover health care costs for the nation's older citizens. The evidence and the arguments provided by a wide cross-section of Americans should satisfy reasonable men.

The time has come then for action by the Ways & Means Committee, action to report out favorably the Anderson-King bill so that the House and Senate can complete action in this critical area as soon as possible.

A Doctor Testifies:

AMA Fears Health Care Bill Threatens Economic Position

The following is excerpted from the testimony of Dr. William A. Sawyer, medical consultant to the Intl. Association of Machinists, before the House Ways & Means Committee on medical care for the aged. Dr. Sawyer was medical director of the Eastman Kodak Co. for 30 years.

AS I HAVE GROWN OLDER, I have become acutely conscious of the great need for timely, good quality medical care for older people. I am repeatedly amazed at the many tragic instances of inadequate medical care amongst our industrial workers and their families, especially in the retirement and near-retirement years. And from my experience I know that the reason that so many older folks do not receive the medical care they need is too often because they do not have the money to pay for it.

The barrier of rising medical care costs confronting many workers is of such proportions as to keep many of them from going to the doctor soon enough.

We have no statistics—and the medical profession has little knowledge—of the people who stay away from them. But we do know they exist—in large and growing numbers. Too often we learn of these people only when it is too late—when early symptoms have progressed to the critical or incurable stage. We do not see them until it is too late and because their means are too little—and their pride is too great.

No one denies that we are going to have an increasing number of older people with medical problems. In fact, advances in medical science have added years to our lives. But these added years will mean little unless they are years of good health and fruitful activity. Without good health our aging population can only be a national liability—placing an unbearable strain on the taxpayers—as their numbers grow greater—and their illnesses more serious.

I need not review here the attitude of the American Medical Association. Their opposition is well known to all. In part, this opposition is born of a desire to be sure that anything new in treatment is safe before it is approved. This is good. But much of it springs from less noble motives—from an unadmitted, but nevertheless real fear that a social security approach will endanger the advantageous economic position that doctors now enjoy.

I DO NOT WANT TO BE unduly critical of the hierarchy set up in Chicago by the House of Delegates because I do not want to be disloyal to what is good. Actually, I am proud of the medical profession. I am proud of the efforts some within the profession have made to bring better medical care for those in the older age group.

However, I am not proud of the obstructionist tactics that a small bureaucracy within the organization has used against those who are objectively trying to find answers to pressing social and medical problems. We are in a rapidly changing social order and need objectivity and mature judgment if we are to move forward in a constructive way.

It has been said by some AMA spokesmen—especially in their publicity—that adoption of the Anderson-King bill would result in a deterioration of the quality of medical service available. Is it possible that doctors have become so callous to the needs of elderly human beings that they would treat them less well because provision had been made for their care under social security? I don't believe it.

From my observation, a doctor's method and degree of treatment is never determined by the way the patient pays for it. Why should a doctor treat a man who pays out of his own pocket differently than one who pays by means of commercial insurance, Blue Cross, Blue Shield or social insurance?

The suggestion that doctors would not give as good care to social insurance beneficiaries as to those with private means is a sad reflection—not on the medical profession—but on those who purport to speak for it.

The AMA also makes the claim that with the enactment of the Anderson-King bill, the traditional doctor-patient relationship will be lost.

THE METHOD OF remunerating doctors has nothing to do with the doctor-patient relationship. If a practitioner is interested in his patient, the quality of care he gives cannot possibly be affected by how he is paid.

Under the program being considered here today—the Anderson-King bill—there would be no interference with the rights of a beneficiary to select his own doctor or of the doctor to treat his patient as he deemed best.

In conclusion, may I re-emphasize that from my contacts with Machinists (through the letters they write), I am convinced that we are confronted with an urgent social problem, and we must do something about it.

Morgan Says:

Right-Wing Generals Confuse Liberalism with Communism

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

THREE SUMMERS AGO, when tensions between the communist and the non-communist worlds were also very high, Pres. Eisenhower's National Security Council secretly issued a cold-war policy paper. Its purpose was to intensify the government's efforts in waging the cold war against the Communists.

Morgan

A massive indoctrination program, of sorts, was launched to alert troops and the general public on the issues of national security. Commanding officers were issued propaganda and speech material and ordered to make regular reports on their "cold war activities."

The operation, however, plainly got out of hand. The most spectacular evidence of this was the case of Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker who was removed from his command of the 24th Infantry Division in Germany and reprimanded in June for, in effect, injecting his own very right-wing political views into the "anti-communist" training courses of his soldiers. But meanwhile other officers in uniform were rapidly and prominently becoming instructors to the public at large on their own versions of the communist menace.

Like angry little bonfires, fed by the impassioned flames of an undoubtedly sincere but very narrow patriotism, anti-communist seminars and study groups flared up in numerous communities across the country. The accent at these gatherings has been almost always the same, smacking of the radical-right approach of the authoritarian John Birch Society.

Although the 1958 NSC directive still, technically, stands, the Defense Department, under Secretary Robert McNamara has been trying gradually and quietly to get the military out of the business of indoctrinating U.S. civilians—and for that matter men and women in uniform narrowly in one direction.

"Our difficulty has been," one Pentagon spokesman said today, "that in these programs of anti-communism the military has been made the shield to protect people expounding one view only." The view he was referring to was that of the "radical right."

That view caused a major collision in the Senate recently. Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, who is perhaps the South's most authentic epitome of the radical right, rose to denounce a lengthy private memorandum another senator had sent the White House and Secretary McNamara on the propaganda activities of military personnel with the public. Thurmond branded the document not only an insidious attack on our military leaders but a clandestine assault on the foundations of the Republic. Sen. Goldwater of Arizona said it was the most shocking thing he had ever seen in the Senate. Sen. Mundt of South Dakota chimed in with the observation that it was "abject appeasement." Whereupon the author had his memorandum printed in full in the record and quickly identified himself as none other than J. William Fulbright of Arkansas, chairman of one of the most august bodies in Congress, the Foreign Relations Committee.

Two things distressed Fulbright the most—the fact that this indoctrination practice ran counter to the principle of military subordination to civilian control and that much of the briefing by individual officers appeared to run counter to basic foreign and domestic policies of the Kennedy Administration.

At these gatherings, Fulbright wrote, social legislation is equated with socialism, and the latter with communism. And there is a central theme that the primary, if not exclusive, danger to this country is internal communist infiltration.

"There is little in the education, training or experience of most military officers," he went on, "to equip them with the balance of judgment necessary to put their own ultimate solutions . . . into proper perspective in the President's total strategy for the nuclear age. . . .

"In the long run it is quite possible that the principal problem of leadership will be, if it is not already, to restrain the desire of the people to hit the Communists with everything we've got, particularly if there are more Cubas. . . . Pride in victory and frustration in restraint, during the Korean War, led to MacArthur's revolt and McCarthyism. . . .

"The radicalism of the right can be expected to have great mass appeal. . . . It offers the simple solution, easily understood; scourging of the devils within the body politic or, in the extreme, lashing out at the enemy.

"The absence of dogma," Sen. Fulbright concluded, "of one way of looking at political and social phenomena, is essential to our governmental process." And he reminded the Senate of the strong American tradition that it is not the function of the military to educate the public on political issues. Happily, Secretary McNamara —a civilian—is of the same mind but he may need some support in getting that tradition reactivated.

Washington Reports:

Bipartisan Support Expressed For Long-Term Foreign Aid Plan

"The Russian space achievements may be spectacular, but certainly our program of assistance in foreign aid is a more firm, more basic form of making an impact on people. I'm sure the people of the less-developed nations are more concerned with their daily food and the fight against disease than they are with trips into space. They haven't conquered the earth yet."

So said Rep. Seymour Halpern (R-N. Y.) in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program, heard on 450 radio stations.

Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.), on the same program, said that the opponents of the foreign-aid bill are making a false issue in fighting the proposed $8.8 billion five-year development lending authority feature. They are claiming that such a provision takes away the right of Congress for annual control and review.

"That simply is not so," he asserted. "The Congress and the legislative committees have not only a right but a responsibility to review every program every year. That's one of the provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act which passed in 1946."

HALPERN SAID that the long-term feature of the bill would permit countries to carry out better-planned programs and help make foreign aid more efficient and reduce the cost. He also said:

"Most of our aid is now tied to U.S. goods and services which will offset any adverse effects on the U.S. balance of payments from capital outflow. Furthermore, the total money requested for economic assistance during the fiscal year 1962 is only one-half of 1 percent of our gross national product.

"Fully two-thirds comes back to the U.S. because we produce the goods. This means that foreign aid means jobs for several hundred thousand American workers."

Bolling said that the long-term feature has another advantage in that the stability thus effected should attract more able people into government to carry out foreign aid.

He said that the proposed shift to economic aid ($9.2 billion over five years) from military aid ($1.8 billion a year) means that we have learned by experience that more stress on economic aid is of greater benefit to the U.S. and the underdeveloped countries.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A CALIFORNIA REPUBLICAN, Rep. Glenard P. Lipscomb, took the House floor the other day to protest a 10-year delay by the National Labor Relations Board in settling back pay claims by some 70 workers found by the board to have been fired in violation of the labor law.

Lipscomb pointed out that the board's decision in the case had been followed by a court order directing the employer to comply. He gave the complicated legal history by which two back pay findings were needed from trial examiners.

He suggested that the hearings and reviews must have run into "many, many thousands of dollars" of taxpayers' money. He said he was not passing judgment on the issues, but he did think the fired workers—some of whom were his constituents—were entitled to "justice through timely decisions."

"When the matter of salaries is involved—the very means of livelihood of many people concerned—every reasonable attempt" should be made to reach a "speedy conclusion," said the congressman.

He ended his speech by saying it was time for "complete reapraisal" of the NLRB procedures that allow such "incredible" delay and needless expense.

This sounds fine, but the record shows that the California legislator on July 22—just 12 days before he made his touching speech —had voted with a House coalition majority to kill Pres. Kennedy's reorganization plan designed to speed up NLRB procedures.

On the telephone Lipscomb explained he thought NLRB changes should be made legislatively rather than through executive reorganization plans. But he also said he was opposed to delegation of board authority to regional boards, subject to review by the national board in major cases.

It isn't clear how processes can be speeded up if neither by executive nor legislative action the board is allowed to shed its present burden of full review of each and every contested trial examiner's report.

ANOTHER TROUBLE in speeding up NLRB work is that a great many employers seriously object to unions and use every device of evasion, avoidance and delay to resist compliance with the law that says it is national policy to support collective bargaining.

Many employers have exactly the same attitude toward the basic labor relations law that Associate Supreme Court Justice Tom C. Clark told the American Bar Association they show toward the anti-trust laws—to violate them is a "way of life."

The anti-trust law violators in the recent electrical industry conspiracy showed their contempt for the statutes by deliberate violations. And Justice Clark commented that "in truth many [other businessmen] saw nothing wrong" in this.

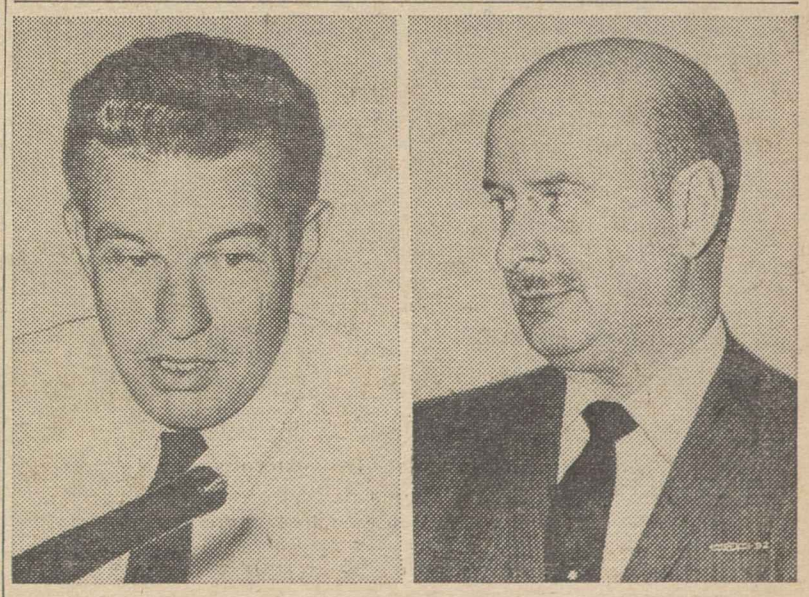
The anti-trust law violators now stand on notice that they may very well go to jail "with common crooks," Clark warned, no matter how "reputable" they may be otherwise.

In the labor law, no criminal sanction whatever is available to keep in line the businessman who deliberately sets out to break a union, even if his employes have scrupulously relied on strict legal processes to prove their union bargaining rights.

Lawyers adept in advising the employer in the labyrinths of resistance can stall off recognition, stall off bargaining, employ techniques of intimidation. What is the worst penalty the businessman will suffer if he loses in years of NLRB and court actions? He can be ordered to rehire a few workers with back pay—and fight the back pay order.

The back pay he may eventually be liable for will always be below what he would have had to pay in a wage increase negotiated in good faith under the law. And he will never face the risk of jail except through a contempt citation for defiance of a federal court's compliance order, which doesn't really happen.

It is a problem that deserves more thought by Rep. Lipscomb.



FOREIGN AID is the best means of fighting communism and building democracy abroad, Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.), left, and Rep. Seymour Halpern (R-N. Y.), asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

LARGEST POLITICAL CONVENTION in Canada's history saw birth of New Democratic Party, a broad-based alliance of labor and liberal forces. Shown at the rostrum is Stanley Knowles, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, who served as chairman of the National Committee for the New Party. Emblems of Canadian provinces and slogans in French and English form the backdrop. The Ottawa convention was attended by more than 1,800 delegates.

Alliance of Workers, Liberals:

Canadians Launch New Political Party

By Gervase N. Love

Ottawa, Ont.—A new political party, formed by Canada's workers and liberals, was born in Ottawa's historic Coliseum after a week of intensive debate and promptly began what its supporters hope to make a march to control of Parliament and the governments of the 10 provinces.

About 1,800 delegates to the largest political gathering in the country's history dipped their new child lightly in socialism and christened it the New Democratic Party.

They picked as leader the "Prairie Bantam," Premier T. C. (Tommy) Douglas of Saskatchewan, and staged a spectacular shouting, sign-waving two-language demonstration and parade of the type not unusual in the United States but unprecedented in Canadian politics.

Douglas was led before the convention on the uneven shoulders of Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress, 6 feet 3 inches tall, and David Lewis, national president of the co-operative Commonwealth Federation, about 5 feet 6 inches.

Douglas, who pledged himself to carry the progressive democratic program of the NDP to all parts of the country, won the leadership in a spirited contest with Hazen Argue, CCF national leader and a Saskatchewan farmer, by a count of 1,391 to 384.

The victor, a member of the Typographical Union, was supported by most of the delegates from unions in the CLC, which with the CCF conducted a three-year drive to build the new party. He was nominated by M. J. Coldwell, retired CCF leader, a veteran former member of Parliament and one of Canada's most respected figures.

The convention completed drawing up its constitution and declared the NDP formally organized less than a half hour before scheduled adjournment. It reached agreement on most elements in a proposed program—sometimes acting twice as committee recommendations were sent back with instructions for amendment—but was forced to leave some matters to the incoming council.

The far-left Socialist element, which took one defeat after another during the proceedings, suffered its greatest rebuff when the delegates rejected its demand that Canada get out of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The vote, by show of hands, came after more than four hours of debate and, while not counted, was decisive.

The pro-NATO forces brought up their heaviest artillery in support of their position that Canada should stay in NATO and use its influence to work for something better in the way of collective security.

Professor Elected

Speakers favoring the majority position included Douglas, Coldwell, Lewis, Michael Oliver, professor of political science at McGill University, who was elected NDP president and who served as chairman of the convention program committee; and Intl. Affairs Director Kalmen Kaplansky and Education Director Max Serdlow of the CLC.

The convention chose as additional officers Gerard Picard, Montreal, of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, formerly the Canadian & Catholic Confederation of Labor, co-president; and Eamon Park, Toronto, a Steelworkers' staff member and former CCF member of the Ontario legislature, treasurer. Vice presidents chosen included Fred Dowling, Toronto, Packinghouse Workers Canadian director, and Romeo Mathieu, of the same union's staff in Montreal.

Carl Hamilton, who has been secretary of the National Committee for the New Party, was slated for appointment as NDP secretary. A French-speaking Canadian will be named associate secretary.

The delegates also:

- Adopted a membership fee of $1.50 a year for individual members and 5 cents per month per member of affiliated organizations, such as unions, with 3 cents retained by the federal party and 2 cents going to the provincial party. A member of an affiliated organization may stop per capita payments to the NDP on his behalf by notifying his organization at any time.
- Called for legislation making all companies operating in Canada "more effectively Canadian by insistence on a minimum percentage of their capital and membership of their boards of directors being held by Canadians resident in Canada."
- Heard Hugh Gaitskell, leader of Great Britain's Labor Party and vice president of the Socialist Intl., extol Socialism but warn NDP leaders not to get too far ahead of their followers.
- In a program which one farmer said must be good "because 200 farmers couldn't find anything wrong with it," pledged to lower production costs by "ending monopoly control" over farm machinery, fertilizers and other supplies. It also promised a parity price policy, crop insurance and more effective use of lands.

Area Redevelopment Sought

- Adopted a program of area redevelopment aimed at renewing economic strength in economically lagging sections and cited the harnessing of tidal power in the Bay of Fundy as an example of the programs that would be undertaken. Both the Canadian and U.S. governments have called such a development impractical at present.
- Placed Canada squarely on the side of freedom in world affairs, overwhelming a small but vocal group which sought to pledge the party to neutralism.
- Authorized a council composed of the officers and 15 members chosen by the convention; the leader, president and secretary of each provincial party plus two members to be elected by each provincial convention; and five representatives of the Young People's Section.

Andre Philip, French Socialist leader, told the delegates the peace and future of the world depend on how well the responsibility of the developed toward the underdeveloped nations is carried out.

Leo McIsaac of Charlottetown, New Brunswick, a farmer and businessman, one of the "independents" who joined with the CLC and the CCF to form the new party, warmly praised "the sincere and democratic approach of labor" in helping create the new political grouping.

"Your determination for action is an inspiration to us," said McIsaac, elected a vice president. "The good will of your representatives on national committees, without any suggestion of trying to dominate the proceedings, is certainly appreciated. I am confident that this constructive and democratic point of view will always obtain."

Carpenters Hail Early Leaders On Union's 80th Anniversary

The Carpenters celebrated their 80th birthday Aug. 11 with a salute to the founders of the international union and a pledge to "use all their resources" in the coming "fight for freedom" against America's foes.

Pres. M. A. Hutcheson, tracing memorable dates in the union's history, said the brotherhood is "very proud" of its record but has no intention of resting on the accomplishments of the past.

"The next 80 years," he wrote in The Carpenter, monthly publication of the union, "will bring even more momentous changes. Dangers, challenges and responsibilities our fathers never dreamed of will be the lot of our sons and daughters."

Asserting that every segment of our free society must "rise to the great needs of freedom" in the coming years, the Carpenter leader reminded his 800,000 members that trade unions have a special role to play.

"We have our vast experience to draw from," he said. "We have learned our lessons and I hope we have acquired some wisdom."

McGuire's Role Cited

The union publication credits Peter J. McGuire, its founder and first editor, with asking a question in the May 1881 issue of The Carpenter that led to formation of a national union of carpenters. The question was: "If the strong combine, why should not the weak?"

McGuire was a New York cabinetmaker who led a march of the unemployed in 1874, moved to St. Louis in 1878 and became active in the St. Louis Trades & Labor Alliance. He is known also as the "father" of Labor Day.

At a meeting of the St. Louis Carpenters' Union Apr. 24, 1881, a five-man "Provisional Committee of the Carpenters and Joiners National Union" was formed with McGuire as secretary and editor of its journal.

The first issue of The Carpenter carried a McGuire editorial headed "Organize a National Union." So much interest was shown that a meeting was set for Chicago, and 36 delegates from 14 local unions established the union on Aug. 11, 1881, with Gabriel Edmonston of Washington, D. C., as president and McGuire as secretary.

The 14 founding locals represented 2,042 members in Buffalo, Cincinnati, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, Indianapolis, Kansas City, Mo., New York City, Philadelphia, St. Louis and Washington. Today the union has more than 2,500 locals all over the U.S. and Canada.

Honored in addition to McGuire and Edmonston are two other Carpenter stalwarts—Frank Duffy, secretary from 1901 to 1948, and William L. Hutcheson, president from 1915 through 1951. All are deceased.

The anniversary issue of The Carpenter contains a message from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pointing out that the movement which began with little groups of craftsmen, banded together "to protect their immediate interest," has grown to include workers of all kinds, united to "promote the interests of the people as a whole."

"To have survived for the last 80 years was an achievement," Meany said; "to survive for another 80 years is a challenge that will demand far more courage, devotion and statesmanship than any crisis" of the past.

Highlights in union history range from the campaign for the eight-hour day launched in 1884; the founding of the American Federation of Labor by the Carpenters and other unions in 1886; merger between the AFL and the Congress of Industrial Organizations in 1955 to form the AFL-CIO.

Molders Union Holds Centennial Convention

Cincinnati—The Molders and Allied Workers Union finds this city a great place to hold a convention—every 100 years.

Delegates of the then newly-founded Iron Molders Union met here in 1861 and delegates are back again this year—the same union with a different name.

Claiming to be the oldest "international" union still in existence, the organization of 85,000 members has seen many changes from the hand-ramming operations of a century ago to the highly automated foundries of today.

Moving with the changes, 400 delegates to the 33rd convention in opening sessions here approved changing the name of the organization from the Intl. Molders and Foundry Workers Union to the Intl. Molders and Allied Workers.

Also early in the convention, which was scheduled to run through Aug. 13, delegates re-elected incumbent officers and passed a number of resolutions of a "housekeeping" nature. They voted:

- To raise dues to a straight $5 a month, replacing a split dues structure of $3 and $4.
- To freeze funeral benefits as of Oct. 1, 1961. Families of members who die will get whatever sum has accrued to a member's account as of that date.
- To increase strike benefits from $18 to $25 a week.

Officers re-elected are: Pres. William A. Lazzerini, Vice Presidents Robert Y. Menary, Draper Doyal, Anton J. Trizna, Carl Studenroth, Carl Maddox, Camiel J. DeVriese, Thomas Shea, Bernard Butsavage and Mario Belmessieri.

Sec. Walter Griffiths, Treas. Roland O. Belanger, Financier Auditor John P. Warner, Assistant Sec. Reginald C. Bigsby, Assistant Financier Auditor Merlin D. McCune, and Editor Edward W. Wulf.

Foe of Reds Wins in Big Mine-Mill Local

Sudbury, Ont.—Donald Gillis, who two years ago sparked the revolt in Mine-Mill Local 598 that ousted supporters of the Communist-dominated international union, has been re-elected to another term as president.

High Ordered to Serve Sentence

Ernest Mark High, who had been branded by the Intl. Labor Press Association as publisher of a "racket sheet," has been ordered to a federal penal hospital at Springfield, Mo., to begin serving a 5-month sentence imposed for contempt of Congress.

High was convicted of contempt for refusing to testify before the McClellan special Senate committee on an unsubstantiated claim that he was too ill to appear. After losing an appeal from his conviction, High entered a private New York hospital and pleaded he was to ill to serve his sentence.

His claim was denied after examination by a court-appointed physician.

Hope, Faith Mark Henderson Aftermath

New Beginning Seen After Long Ordeal

By Robert B. Cooney

Henderson, N. C.—The last of the imprisoned Harriet-Henderson strike leaders has been freed. The strike has been officially terminated.

And yet—in the struggle and trial which seem to bring man closer to truth and to renew his faith—this appears to some here as not the end but rather a new beginning.

These recent events suggest the new beginning:

● The Textile Workers Union of America, welcoming the release of the last of the eight leaders convicted on charges of conspiring to blow up the struck mills, pledged to help win the men full pardons.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock, in welcoming the release of Payton and international representatives Charles E. Auslander and Lawrence Gore, declared "the scales will not be in full balance, until their innocence has been officially recognized, and we shall persist in our efforts toward this end."

The union urged "a dispassionate study" of the case by the state of North Carolina. The union said Gov. Terry Sanford's reduction of the prison sentences and the end of the strike have dissipated the emotion and controversy. An impartial study would, the union asserted, "fully support our conviction that these men are innocent."

● Boyd E. Payton, TWUA's Carolinas' director, upon his release again declared he was unaware of any "conspiracy" until his arrest in June 1959. He expressed the hope for a full pardon to erase the brand of "ex-con."

Payton said his nine months in prison—the legal minimum after the governor reduced the original sentence—brought him a "wonderful personal experience . . . with God" and an appreciation of the support which came from his union, the labor movement, his family, his fellow prisoners and others.

● Mrs. Mae G. Renn, president of Local 584, wrote that while the end of the strike and the relief program on July 1 caused some to regard the cause as "lost," a summing up of "gains" brought second thoughts.

Payton and seven other union leaders and members were convicted in state court after the strike at the Harriet-Henderson Cotton Mills had gone on for eight months, after strikebreakers had been imported by the scores and the National Guard had entered the town.

Payton and his fellow defendants were convicted largely on the testimony of a prosecution witness, Harold Aaron, labeled an agent provocateur. Aaron was later shown to have received payments from the North Carolina State Bureau of Investigation. He has since been arrested in Virginia on a shooting charge.

The strike began Nov. 17, 1958, when after 14 years of collective bargaining experience, the Harriet-Henderson management declined to renew an expired contract except with cancellation of the arbitration clause. Tensions rose when the management brought in strikebreakers and particularly after it broke an agreement on settlement and rehiring that then Gov. Luther H. Hodges had worked out.

Mrs. Renn's summing up showed that Locals 584 and 578 received $128,000 from other unions, $105,000 from TWUA locals across the nation and $1.2 million from national TWUA funds.

This background, she added, has given a good start to a new Relief Committee, formed since the strike's official end to give limited aid to those too old to get jobs, too young for social security and to those with heavy medical bills.

Mrs. Renn wrote that news of the strike's end inspired mixed emotions. But "after the first shock of disappointment," she added, "we have begun totaling up our 'gains' arising out of a struggle which is labeled by some as 'lost'."

Gains Noted

Some strikers secured jobs in Rhode Island, Maryland and elsewhere through the efforts of TWUA staff. Several women, she said, took training to become beauticians and now are working as beauty operators; two others enrolled in nursing courses and are now employed as licensed practical nurses.

Other strikers are employed in a nearby state hospital. The women work as cottage parents to retarded children, as nurses and in the cafeteria. The men work as attendants in wards and in construction work. One man has been trained to administer therapeutic treatments.

Mrs. Renn said many women strikers are now employed as waitresses, salesladies and bookkeepers. Some men have found jobs at a tungsten mine and on the Roanoke Dam project near Henderson. Some families have gone into farming.

Henderson strikers developed a "wonderful fellowship" with their fellow unionists, Mrs. Renn continued, through having representatives visit other unions and receiving visitors from all over America and from Canada, Europe and Japan.

"In the Henderson strikers' ledger, this gain will never be erased," she wrote.

Mrs. Renn then told of the renewal of strength which occurred after "the early weeks of our struggle, when we were stunned at the seemingly cold-blooded, heartless tactics used against us and every union member was asking each other—why?"

"Though our hearts ached" at seeing the strike leaders "going to court and prison in the manner in which it was done," she added, the strikers endured in their faith.

It is "a very huge and gratifying thing" that they have now been released, she declared.

Mrs. Renn concluded that the "gains" totaled up "easily outweigh the 'loss' " when the strike struggle is reviewed, when the benefits of unionization since 1943 are considered and when "our deep-rooted belief in organization for working men and women" is recorded.

2 Strikers Passed High School Exams

Henderson, N. C.—What happens to people made jobless by a long strike?

For two women strikers at the Harriet-Henderson mills here—one 50 years of age and the other 58—it meant a chance to study for and win their high school diplomas.

Long denied the opportunity through force of circumstance, they took advantage of the strike situation to study and then take and pass the necessary examinations.

ROBERT ABBOTT, one of Henderson union leaders freed from prison after commutation of his "conspiracy" sentence, gets a family welcome from Mrs. Abbott, shown holding 10-month-old Michael, and from Richard and Vicki. Abbott and three other Henderson leaders were paroled in July after Gov. Terry Sanford reduced their sentences. The remaining three leaders, including Boyd Payton, were paroled Aug. 3.

Minimum Pay Level Raised For Samoa

Pago Pago—A special industry committee appointed by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, after public hearings, has ordered a higher minimum wage for a variety of industries in American Samoa.

A hike of 15 cents an hour was ordered for four groups of industries.

A new minimum wage of 90 cents an hour, up from 75 cents, will apply in fish canning and processing; in the shipping and transportation industry, except for seamen and in petroleum marketing. A rate of 50 cents an hour will apply for seamen.

A rate of 70 cents an hour, up from 55 cents, will apply in miscellaneous industries.

Samoan workers were represented on the tripartite industry committee by George J. Richardson, AFL-CIO special representative, and High Chief Philip J. Nomura.

AFL-CIO Film Recommended For Schools

The nation's leading social studies film magazine, "Educational Screen and Audiovisual Guide," has strongly recommended the AFL-CIO film, "Land of Promise," for use in high school and college social studies classes, and for adult education.

In a page-long description and appraisal, the publication lauded the film for avoiding "name calling and recriminations," and for its "remarkably mature approach to a potentially controversial subject."

"This film can provide a first-rate springboard for a discussion of the many important economic undercurrents of our society," the review said.

"Land of Promise" was originally produced for public service television showing last Labor Day. Prints are available for sale or rent from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

Business Profits Rise During 2nd Quarter

ally adjusted profit rate of all corporate enterprise over the first quarter of this year."

Compared to the second quarter of 1960 the Journal survey registered declines for 17 major groups of companies and increases for 11 groups. In the corporate groups showing declines were autos, chemical producers, steel firms, electrical equipment companies and railroads. For the current quarter the Journal declared that "the steel companies are almost sure they'll do better than last year in this period and the major chemical producers also expect increased third-quarter earnings. In addition, the automobile group may be able to show an over-all gain in year-to-year profits for the current quarter."

In assessing the slight decline in profits from the second quarter of a year ago, the Journal reported that 109 companies reporting sales as well as net earnings showed a drop of 2.1 percent from the 1960 same quarter adding that rising costs were a "secondary factor." These firms showed a profit drop from 6.7 percent to 6.4 percent.

Third NLRB Order Hits Textile Firm

The National Labor Relations Board has once more told a company it has violated the labor law by firing employes, reinstating them at NLRB order, and then subjecting them to an "extraordinary amount of watching" by supervisors to discover some pretext for firing them again.

The company is Threads, Inc., which processes textile products at a plant in Gastonia, N. C. For the third time since the Textile Workers Union of America started an organizing campaign there early in 1958, this has been the sequence of events:

● The board issued a complaint on union charges that the company interfered with its workers' right to organize.

● An NLRB trial examiner issued a report finding the company was in violation and recommending that it be ordered to "cease and desist."

● The labor board affirmed the examiner's findings and ordered Threads, Inc., to stop breaking the law by interfering with its workers' rights.

The latest order in the union's long fight with Threads, Inc., came from a panel of three NLRB members — Chairman Frank W. McCulloch, former Chairman Boyd Leedom and Gerald A. Brown. They ordered the firm to reinstate two fired employes, compensate them for any income loss, and cease discriminating against TWUA and its members.

The NLRB ruled that the company used threats to induce employes, previously "unlawfully discharged," to waive their right to reinstatement.

It also held that the firm had subjected employes, after reinstatement, to coercive "surveillance with respect to their legitimate activities during working hours."

Wage-Hour Posters Sent To Employers

One million employers are now receiving from the U.S. Labor Dept. a mailing brochure including a poster to inform employes of their rights under the newly amended Fair Labor Standards Act.

The official poster must be displayed in each business establishment affected by the 1961 amendments.

Under terms of the amendments, workers previously entitled to a wage of $1 an hour will be guaranteed a legal minimum of $1.15 an hour effective Sept. 3.

Workers not previously protected, but brought under the law by the recent amendments, will be guaranteed a legal minimum of $1 an hour.

Also available as a Labor Dept. publication is a non-technical pamphlet setting out the provisions of the amended law. Individual copies may be obtained from the Labor Dept.'s Wage-Hour and Public Contracts Division. Quantity copies of the amended law itself may be purchased from the Government Printing Office at 10 cents each, with a 25 percent reduction on orders of 100 or more.

As House Hearings End:

Unions Tell of Need For Health Care Bill

House hearings on the Anderson-King bill ended as they began —with labor and liberal groups supporting the Administration proposal to meet health needs of the aged through the social security system and the big business-American Medical Association coalition charging this would mean "compulsory" health care "forced" upon social security beneficiaries.

The bulging transcript of two weeks of daily hearings by the House Ways & Means Committee included testimony and statements by:

● George M. Harrison, president of the Railway Clerks, who represented the 24 rail unions affiliated with the Railway Labor Executives' Association.

Harrison described how the rail brotherhoods had sought to develop a voluntary, moderate-cost group health insurance program to meet the needs of retired railroad workers and their families. He said the benefits are "inadequate to meet present day costs" and that only 9 percent of the 673,000 persons receiving railroad retirement benefits are presently covered by the program.

● Walter P. Reuther, president of the Auto Workers and of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., who gave a point-by-point refutation of the American Medical Association's arguments against the Anderson-King bill. He charged that medical, insurance and business groups "have joined in a coldly calculated, well-financed drive to defeat health insurance legislation."

Reuther described private health insurance plans available to older people as "grossly inadequate" and declared that "millions of older people do not get medical care because they do not have the money to pay for it and they don't want to ask for charity."

● A. J. Hayes, president of the Machinists, who declared that private insurance—the panacea of opponents of the Anderson-King bill —"by its very nature will always be inadequate to meet the health care needs of people over 65 years of age."

● James B. Carey, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, who called the social security system "the ideal mechanism for providing for the health needs of the aged."

● George H. Ellison, president of the Arkansas State AFL-CIO, from the home state of Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills, who said 80 percent of the people in Arkansas over 65 have an income under $1,500 a year; 60 percent have incomes under $1,200. "I know of no company in the state of Arkansas that allows its retired workers to participate in its plant group hospitalization plan."

● Aubrey E. Gaylon, business representative of the Knoxville, Tenn., Building & Construction Trades Council, who said local efforts have failed to solve the problems of health care for aged person "whose needs must be met if we . . . claim a belief in the brotherhood of man."

● Julia C. Thompson, representing the American Nurses Association, who charged that doctors have exerted "pressure" on nurses in an unsuccessful attempt to get their association to drop its support of social security health care. She said the nurses defied this pressure and have reaffirmed their position.

● John E. Carroll, representing the National Association of Manufacturers, who asserted that "any unnecessary generosity to the older generation may result in an intolerable tax burden on the younger generation." He added: "We challenge the idea that the aged, as a group, are in financial difficulty and beyond the help of self and family."

In earlier testimony, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had emphasized labor's solid support of the Anderson-King bill, describing it as the only feasible means of preventing the cost of illness from "pauperizing" millions of retired citizens. Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff called the need for the program "urgent and pressing" and denounced the American Medical Association for having "played loose with the facts" by seeking to brand the program "socialized medicine."

Administration support of social security health care may become the key difference between the current committee consideration and the 1959 hearings when the Eisenhower Administration was in office. At that time, only about a third of the committee members lined up behind the Forand bill, predecessor of the Anderson-King proposal.

MISSILE SITES LABOR COMMISSION, checking on progress of what Pres. Kennedy called America's "highest priority" program, visited Strategic Air Command at Omaha. Members hear Gen. Thomas S. Power, SAC commander, explain control system. Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, second from left, announced on group's return from four major sites that man-days lost due to work stoppages reached "an all-time low" in July. Commission members on tour included Pres. C. J. Haggerty of AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Dept. (far left); Goldberg; Nicholas Zonarich, organizational director, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. (to Power's left) and Steelworkers' Pres. David J. McDonald (second from right).

and Pipe Fitters would give complete support to the trade union movement's fight to preserve justice, freedom and human dignity.

Meany's speech highlighted the opening of the convention here keynoted by Pres. Peter T. Schoemann's declaration that labor will help America forge ahead of Soviet Russia in space.

"But we have a right to expect encouragement from our government in this effort, not threats of punitive legislation," the AFL-CIO vice president said.

Labor Secretary Arthur J. Goldberg drew prolonged cheers from the delegates when he said it is a "great source of strength" to the President and the government "that your great organization and its officers and men will continue to support programs and policies that will determine the future for generations to come."

Union Record Praised

Goldberg gave high praise to the almost 100 percent compliance given by union workers at missile bases since the voluntary no-strike pledge more than two months ago. "I think this is a record of which the country and all of us can be very proud," he said.

As for past abuses in missile programs, Goldberg said "the government has been at fault for not appealing to all of us involved to do what we have to do, and by not creating machinery so that what has to be done can be done fairly. The government is also responsible for many of the difficulties which have taken place in the programming of the missile and space developments."

"Manufacturers have been at fault. They haven't maintained their schedules.

"Contractors have been at fault and unions have been at fault. But it is not fair—and here I want to put the record perfectly clear—it is not fair that the responsibility in this area go just to one group."

The delegates, who had previously given evidence of their indignation against magazine articles and newspaper editorials tagging labor with the primary blame for the missile lag, gave Goldberg a standing ovation at the end of his talk and sang "Happy Birthday" to him when informed it was his 53rd birthday.

Schoemann earlier had denounced "misleading Senate investigations" for a deliberate attempt to confuse the public by mixing up the man-in-space program with the inter-continental ballistic missile program.

He pointed out that until recently it had been the government's established policy to invest most of its funds and effort not in space exploration but in retaliatory missiles.

Labor 'Won't Be the Goat'

"We are not going to sit still and let labor be made the goat for the lag in the space program. It is not our fault. It is not our responsibility.

"The lag is due not to any shortcomings of American labor, but to the failure of our scientists and researchers to come up with booster power equal to the Russians'."

"Labor has done its job at the missile bases and done it well."

Meany, noting that he has attended every convention of the union since he first served as a delegate to the 1921 session at Providence, R. I., hailed Schoemann as a "tower of strength," declaring that "he believes in the unity of the American trade union movement. He understands that only the enemies of labor, the enemies of human progress, would be benefited if the trade union movement were to split apart again into warring camps."

Analyzing the international crisis, the federation president warned "America cannot any longer afford to underestimate the Communists. We must be prepared for any contingency . . . America cannot afford to hinge its security to a hunch."

Praising Kennedy for his "courageous" speech on Berlin, Meany said the effect of the President's stand has served to awaken the nation to a "sharp sense of danger."

The AFL-CIO president struck out sharply at the "reactionary leaders in Congress" seeking to cut expenditures for welfare and social programs because of the Berlin crisis, charging that their motto is "austerity-for others."

America is not weak, Meany pointed out, despite the high levels of unemployment and lack of economic progress, and does not have to "plunge into a preventive war to prove its military power. That would be playing right into the Communists' hands."

His confidence in a free world victory, he commented, is based primarily upon the response of American workers to the needs of the nation. He cited the experience in construction of missile bases, noting that after initial government and management mistakes, labor's no-strike policy has slashed lost time at these sites to the "vanishing point."

He said that the missile situation demonstrated, besides the workers response to the country's needs, that "in time of emergency local option must give way to national leadership." This applies, he added, not only to no-strike policies but to the problem of discrimination in membership as well as any other problem of national importance."

C. J. (Neil) Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., also upheld labor's record in the missile program since his department adopted a no-strike policy Feb. 15.

He reported that the missile commission set up under the President's executive order to adjust grievances at missile sites has been doing an excellent job thus far. Haggerty, who serves as a labor member of the commission, also accompanied Goldberg on the recent tour of four missile bases.

Senate Nears Key Vote On Foreign Aid Issue

for building electrical generating facilities in connection with the Hanford, Wash., plutonium reactor.

The Senate approved the power facilities although the House had previously rejected the item. The House then voted again 235-to-164, to "instruct" its conferees to refuse to accept the Senate proposal.

The House conferees, a majority of whom favor the project, may reject the theory that they are bound by this vote and report back a conference bill containing the $95 million proposal.

The House then would be faced with a third vote on the issue.

● In the background, Administration leaders sought some acceptable compromise that would rescue the school-aid programs from the House Rules Committee, where they are now bottled up by an 8-7 vote against clearance to the floor.

Seven of the committee votes against the bills are from Republicans and southern Democrats opposed to federal school aid on economic grounds. The eighth, cast by Rep. James J. Delaney (D-N. Y.), represents his expressed feeling that the total Kennedy program discriminates against private and parochial schools. Delaney on most issues votes with northern liberal Democrats.

In the foreign aid debate, backers of the long-term loan authority pointed out that attacks on so-called "backdoor" spending through Treasury loans ignored the fact that Congress in the past has approved many programs financed by Treasury revolving funds.

The decision in the Senate was expected to swing on the degree of Republican support given the long-term loans. When former Pres. Eisenhower proposed long-term projects in 1957, GOP right-wingers objected but 21 Republican senators voted to support the program. Some of them have now changed to opposition.

Factory Jobs Less Than a Year Ago

The 1 million workers "continuously jobless" for six months or more as of July include a heavy concentration of Negroes, young people seeking their first jobs, unskilled and semi-skilled workers and workers in the auto and steel industries, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The report showed total employment back to the level of July a year ago, but manufacturing industries which suffered recession job losses failed to recover them. The compensating job gains took place in the service and government areas. The 5.1 million now jobless compares to 4 million a year ago.

Liberals Battling to Salvage Long-term Foreign Aid Bill

Perlis Assails Newburgh:

Relief Curbs Held 'Denial of Rights'

Newburgh, N. Y.—This city's 13-point program to curtail welfare spending amounts to "a complete denial of human rights," local union officials were told by Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities.

Perlis met with officers of the Newburgh Central Labor Union to plan counter-measures against the city's tightening of relief payments, the latest step of which calls for the photographing of all ambulatory welfare recipients.

City Manager Joseph McD. Mitchell, who imposed the 13 points, refused a challenge by CLU Pres. Irving Astrow to debate the program with Perlis, stating that his schedule was "'rather full."

Perlis, who also has met with representatives of the National Association of Social Workers and the Council on Social Work Education to discuss joint action on the Newburgh plan, told the unionists that public assistance laws and standards in the U.S. generally are bad enough, but that Newburgh's 13 points succeeds in making them worse.

They would contribute to misery, disease, crime and juvenile delinquency, he charged, without saving, in the long run, "one cent of the taxpayer's money."

"Not a single one of the 13 points bears up under objective scrutiny," he declared, citing the following inconsistencies as examples:

- The rule requiring evidence of employment for new arrivals, which would "consider American citizens as foreign immigrants and would make Newburgh a closed city, a foreign enclave on U.S. soil."
- The rule refusing assistance to mothers of illegitimate children who bear another child while on relief, which would "visit the sins of the mothers and fathers on their children" and would "use public
